(h) Just before the meeting of this parliament, a society of Jesuits were taken at Clerkenwell. Among their papers was found a letter written to their father-rector at Brussels. The substance of this letter is the hopes that the body entertained on the present situation of affairs in England. The foundation of their hopes was in the Arminians, who affected mutation; that the Catholics encouraged them in their schemes of making the king independent, and freeing him of his ward, the parliament; that they had shewed the means how to settle the excise; that it was to be done by a mercenary army of Germans: "In farming the excise, says this letter, the country is most likely to rise; if the mercenary army subjugate the country, then the soldiers and projectors shall be paid out of the confiscations; if the country be too hard for the soldiers, then they must consequently mutiny; which is equally advantageous to us. Our superlative design is to work the Protestants, as well as the Catholics, to welcome a conqueror." Rushworth. Ephemeris Parliamentaria.

ravishing, ravishing, at once, the spheres of all ancient government; destroying all liberty; imprisoning us without bail or bond. They have taken from us——What shall I say? Indeed, what have they left us? By tearing up the roots of all property, they have taken from us every means of supplying the king, and of ingratiating ourselves by voluntary proofs of our duty and attachment towards him. To the making whole of these breaches, I shall apply myself; and, to all these diseases, shall propound a remedy. By one and the same thing, have the king and the people been hurt, and by the same must they be cured. We must vindicate—What? New things? No: our ancient, lawful and vital liberties; by reinforcing the laws enacted by our ancestors; by setting such a stamp upon them, that no licentious spirit shall dare henceforth to invade them. And shall we think this a way to break a parliament? No: Our desires are modest and just. I speak both for the interest of the king and the people. If we enjoy not these rights, it will be impossible for us to relieve him. Let us never, therefore, doubt, of a favourable reception from his goodness."

"Will any give a subsidy," said sir Edward Coke (l), "if they are to be taxed after parliament at pleasure? The king cannot lawfully tax any by way of loans: I differ from them who would have this of loan go amongst other grievances, for I would have it go alone. I will begin with a noble record; it chears me to think of it; 26 Ed. III. it is worthy to be writ in letters of gold: 'Loans against the will of the subject are against reason and the franchises of the land; and they desire restitution.' What a word is that franchise? the lord may tax his villan, high and low, but it is against the franchises of the land for freemen to be taxed, but by their consent in parliament.

Charles, finding that by threats he could neither terrify the commons into submission, nor provoke them into indecorum of speech, thought fit, on the 25th of March, 1628, to send them a conciliatory message by secretary Cook, "That he esteemed the grievances of the house his own, and stood not on precedence in point of honour; he therefore desired that the same committee which was appointed for grievances might, at the same time, take in hand the following propositions: to furnish with men and victuals thirty ships to guard the narrow seas, and along the coast; to set out twenty other ships for the relief of the town of Rochelle, and for the preservation of the Elbe, the Sound, and the Baltic Sea; to pay and supply twenty-six thousand horse and foot for foreign service; to supply the forts of the office of ordnance, and the stores of the navy; to build twenty ships yearly for the increase of the navy; to repair the forts within the land; to pay the arrears of the office of ordnance, the victuallers office, and the treasurer of the navy; to pay the arrears due for the freight of divers merchant-ships employed in his majesty's service; and to provide a magazine for victuals for land and sea service."

On the receipt of this message the house resolved themselves into a committee, to take into consideration the liberty of the subject in his person and property, and the supply of the king's necessities. On the subject of liberty of person, Mr. Creskeld, a young lawyer, made a long, eloquent, and learned speech: he proved that the common law of England guarded both the persons and property of the subject from the prerogative of the crown. With the utmost accuracy and precision he stated both the rights of the king and the subject, and shewed how illegally the judges had acted in remanding the gentlemen to prison who were confined on account of refusing the loan, and had brought their Habeas Corpus (m). It was resolved on the question, that no freeman ought to be committed, detained in prison, or otherwise restrained, by the command of the king, privy council, or any other, without some legal cause of the commitment, detainer, or restraint, be expressed; that the writ of Habeas Corpus may not be denied, but ought to be granted to every man that is committed, detained in prison, or otherwise restrained, though it be by the command of the king, privy council, or any other; that if a free man be committed or detained in prison, or otherwise restrained, no legal cause of such commitment, detainer, or restraint, being expressed, if he is returned upon an Habeas Corpus, that he ought to be delivered or bailed; that the ancient and undoubted rights of every free man are, that he hath a full and absolute property in his goods and estate, and that no tallage, (impost,) loan, benevolence, or other like charge, ought to be commanded or levied by the king, or any of his ministers, without common consent of parliament.

This produced a conference between the lords and commons: the conference was managed by, sir Dudley Digges, sir Edward Coke, Mr. Selden, and Mr. Littleton. The assistants were, sir Benjamin Rudyard, Mr. Pym, Mr. Rolles, Mr. Hackwell, Mr. Herbert, Mr. Whiteby, sir Robert Philips, and Mr. Charles Jones, all of them being men of spirit and learning, the cause was pleaded with great ability. It was clearly proved that the resolutions of the commons were authorized by Magna Charta, six several statutes, and the common law of the land (n).

Whilst the commons were taking these measures to defend (l) Two counties, Buckinghamshire and Suffolk, had returned sir Edward Coke as one of their members to serve in this parliament. Journals of the Commons, vol. i. p. 876.

(m) The Saxon institutions, on which the common law of England is grounded, were so tender of personal liberty, that it was not till 23 Ed. III. the eleventh king from the Conquest, that a statute was enacted to attack the bodies of men for debt. Mr. Creskeld's Speech. Parliam. Hist. vol. vii. p. 379.

(n) The introduction was allotted to sir Dudley Digges: he shewed that the institutions of the Saxons were the fundamental laws of the constitution; that it was an undoubted part of the common law of England, that the subject had a true property in his goods and possessions; that this birth-right had been invaded by pressures more grievous, because they had been pursued by imprisonment, contrary to the franchise of the land; and that the late judgement in the court of King's Bench had rendered the laws and statutes of the realm of no avail towards obtaining redress for these oppressions.

Mr. Littleton, who was appointed to justify the declarations of the house of commons, began with introducing the twenty-ninth article of Magna Charta; "Nullus liber homo capiatur, vel imprisonetur, aut disesietur, de libero tenemento suo, vel libertatibus, vel liberis consuetudinibus suis, aut ut lagetur, aut exuletur, aut aliquo modo destruatur, nec super eum ibimus, nec super eum mittimus, nisi per legale judicium parium suorum, vel per legem terræ." He shewed that there was a corruption crept into this copy, and that the original words were, nec eum in carcerem mittimus. The words, legem terræ, he alleged, must of necessity be understood to be, By due process of law, and not, The law of the land, which would comprehend villans; that these words were so explained in the fourth article of a statute made 25 Ed. III. in which reign was the first invasion of this personal liberty; that the words were yet more direct to the point in a statute made in the twenty-eighth year of this monarch; that in the thirty-sixth year of his reign he gave an answer to a petition, in the form that made it an act of parliament, That no arrest by special command should be made, contrary to the statutes; that a petition of parliament, in the same year of his reign, explain the words, legem terræ, in the same manner; whereas it is contained in the Grand Charter, and other statutes, That none be taken or imprisoned by special command, without indictment or other due process to be made by the law; yet oftentimes it hath been, and still is, that many are hindered, taken, and imprisoned, without indictment or other process made by the law upon them. Besides these, Mr. Littleton quoted two statutes made against informers in the king's reign, the words of them sufficiently explaining the captious expression of legem terræ in Magna Charta. He then finished with confuting a false comment which had been made by the court-lawyers on a statute termed the Statute of Westminster, enacted in 3 Ed. I.

Matters of record and judicial precedents were committed to Mr. Selden, with the remedy of the Habeas Corpus. He began with illustrating this article, and shewed that precedents ought not to be relied on but when they agreed with the express law; he next produced twelve precedents to the point, that persons committed without a legal cause expressed, ought to be delivered upon bail; and lastly offered other kind of precedents, which were solemn resolutions of judges; things not of record, but yet remaining in authentic copies.

Sir Edward Coke demonstrated, that the acts of parliament and precedents produced were but so many affirmations of the common law, and that there was no good reason of state against the shewing cause of imprisonment. He began by proving, that if free men of England might be imprisoned at the will and pleasure of the king, then were they in worse state than bondmen and villans. He then entered upon a very deep discussion of the principles of the constitution in point of personal liberty, and concluded by shewing that no virtuous operation of government could be effected by leaving to subjects that jewel which not only distinguishes free men from slaves, but the living from the dead.

It was agreed by the attorney-general, that the seven statutes urged by the commons were yet in force; and that they did extend most properly to the king; but he said that some of them were in general words, and therefore concluded nothing, but were to be expounded by precedents; and others that were more particular were applied to the suggestions of subjects, and not to the king's command simply of itself.

To this Mr. Littleton replied, that the statutes were as direct as could be; and that though some of them speak of suggestions of subjects, yet others do not; and those that do are as effectual, for that they are in equal reason, a commitment by command of the king being of as great force, when it moveth by a suggestion from a subject, as when the king takes notice of the cause himself. To one of the twelve precedents which had been quoted by Mr. Selden, Mr. Attorney-general objected, that the lords of the council sent letters to the court of King's Bench to bail the prisoners. To this Mr. Selden, with great spirit, replied, that that letter was of no moment, being only a direction to the chief justice, and no matter of record, nor any way concerning the judges: and besides, either the prisoner was bailable by law or not bailable; if bailable by the law, then he was to be bailed without any such letter; if not bailable by the law, then plainly the judges could not have bailed them upon the letter without breach of oath, which is, that they are to do justice according to the law, without having respect to any command whatsoever:

fend civil liberty, they did not neglect the popular subject of religious grievances: a petition against recusants was presented by both houses on the 31st of March. Promises sat so easy upon Charles, that he not only gave his word to perform every article of the petition, but added, that the mildness he had hitherto used had been upon hope that foreign princes might thereby be induced to use moderation towards their subjects of the reformed religion; but not finding that good effect which was expected, he resolved, unless he should very speedily see better fruits, to add a farther degree of severity than that which in the petition was desired. As Charles's conduct was directly opposite to the many promises he had made on this head, there is perhaps no public transaction through his whole reign that throws more contempt on his character than these petitions and answers, nor a more sufficient justification of the commons for their not placing any confidence in his strongest asseverations.

Designation to foreign employments was not forgotten among the grievances under debate: sir Peter Hayman shewed his case; that, on refusing to lend on a privy-seal, he was sent by the lords of the council, at his own expence, to attend on an ambassador into the Palatinate. On this head sir Edward Coke gave it as his opinion, "That a subject, not being a servant of the crown, was not liable to forced service:" and even in the other case, where a servant refused such a command, he shewed, by two several statutes, "That the king could only seize the offices, fees, and lands, he held in consequence of his services, but no commitment could legally ensue."

The power which the crown had lately usurped of inflicting domestic confinement was canvassed in the following manner: Mr. Selden said, "That he could find no traces in former times of confinement to a man's own house, or elsewhere, by way of punishment, except in case of the Jews, who were sometimes confined to the Old Jewry; that a domestic prison was a confinement only for madmen." Sir Thomas Hobby observed, "That he was employed by Elizabeth in the year 1588; that though at that time it was found necessary to confine recusants in strong places, yet it was judged so illegal, that, after the defeat of the Spanish armada, the parliament petitioned the queen to warrant the confinement."

With this business of grievances the commons, according to promise, went on that of supply; they rejected the propositions, as too vast and too complicated, but voted five subsidies for the necessities of the state. The satisfaction Charles felt from this act of the commons drew this speech from him: "He liked parliaments at first; yet since, he knew not how, he was grown to a distaste of them; but was now where he was before, for he loved them, and shall rejoice to meet his people again (o)." Mr. Secretary Cooke related to the house this speech, and a congratulatory one made on the same occasion to Charles at the council-board, by the duke of Buckingham. Though these congratulations were couched in very popular terms, yet several members took offence that Buckingham should be mentioned in that house in so important a manner.

This was not the only vain attempt that was made to restore Buckingham to the good graces of the commons: they had been assured from secretary Cooke that he had first moved and persuaded the king to assemble a parliament (p).

The commons having thus gratified Charles with a vote of five subsidies, they were wholly engrossed in preparing an instrument to explain more fully those parts of Magna Charta, and the six several statutes, which had been so notoriously violated by the late oppressive acts of the ministry. This they called a PETITION OF RIGHT, it containing those privileges which had been already stipulated to the subject.

The house was frequently interrupted in this weighty business by the importunity of Charles; who, though he had given them assurances that he approved of the uniting the grievances with the supply, continued to press them to expedite the latter business. On the 12th of April, secretary Cooke delivered the following message: "That his majesty had long since expected the fruit of that which was so happily begun; but finding a stop beyond expectation, nay, beyond example, after so good a beginning, he commanded that, without any farther or unnecessary delay, the house should proceed in his business; for however he had been willing that his own affairs and theirs should concur and proceed together, yet his meaning was not that one should give interruption to the other, nor the time to be spun out on any pretence to hinder that resolution upon so that such a letter, in any case, was, for point of law, no weight against what the record of the court shewed.

To four precedents which the courtiers had brought against the resolutions of the commons Mr. Selden objected, that, by the constant course of the court of King's Bench, whosoever came by Habeas Corpus, or other writ, into that court, could not be bailed before they were first committed to the marshal of that court; that these were thus committed appeared by the entry; and that this plainly shewed that the court of King's Bench in every of them resolved, that the prisoners so committed were bailable, otherwise they had been remanded, not committed to the marshal of the King's Bench.

According to the direction of the house, Mr. Selden, in this conference, produced the draught of a judgement in the case lately adjudged in the court of King's Bench: "This case is famous, said he, and well known to your lordships, therefore I need no further mention it; and as yet, indeed, there is no judgement entered upon the roll, but there is room for any kind of judgement to be entered. But, my lords, there is a form of judgement, a most unusual one, such an one as never was in any such case before used; for indeed there was never before any case so adjudged; and this drawn up by a chief clerk of that court, by direction of Mr. Attorney-general, as the house was informed by the clerk; in which the reason of the judgement, and the remanding of these gentlemen, is expressed in such sort as if it should be declared upon record for ever, that the law was, that no man could be enlarged from imprisonment that stood committed by any such absolute command. Now, my lords, added Mr. Selden, because this draught, if it were entered in the roll, as it was prepared for no other purpose, would be a great declaration contrary to the many acts of parliament already cited, contrary to all precedents of former times, and to all reason of law, to the utter subversion of the chiefest liberty and right belonging to every free man of the kingdom; and for that especially also it supposeth that divers ancient records had been looked into by the court in like cases, by which records their judgements were directed; whereas, in truth, there is not one record at all extant, that, with any colour, warrants the judgement; therefore the house of commons thought fit also that I should, with the rest that has been said, shew this draught to your lordships." Mr. Selden concluded his discourse by reading out of a book of lord chief justice Anderson's hand-writing, the resolution of all the judges of England upon commitments by absolute command; which report, was in favour of the resolutions of the commons.

"We, her majesty's justices of both benches, and barons of the exchequer, desire your lordships that by some good means some order may be taken that her highness's subjects may not be committed, or detained in prison, by commandment of any nobleman or counsellor, against the laws of the realm; either else to help us to have access to her majesty, to the end to become suitors to her for the same: for divers have been imprisoned for suing ordinary actions and suits at the common law, until they have been constrained to leave the same against their wills, and put the same to order, albeit judgement and execution have been had therein, to their great losses and griefs; for the aid of which persons her majesty's writs have sundry times been directed to sundry persons having the custody of such persons unlawfully imprisoned, upon which writs no good or lawful cause of imprisonment hath been returned or certified; whereupon, according to the laws, they have been discharged of their imprisonment: some of which persons, so delivered, have been again committed to prison in secret places, and not to any common or ordinary prison, or lawful officer or sheriff, or other, lawfully authorized to have or keep a jail; so that, upon complaint made for their delivery, the queen's courts cannot tell to whom to direct her majesty's writs; and by this means justice cannot be done. And moreover, divers officers and serjeants of London have been many times committed to prison, for lawful executing of her majesty's writs, sued forth of her majesty's courts at Westminster; and thereby her majesty's subjects and officers are so terrified that they dare not sue or execute her majesty's laws, her writs, and commandments. Divers others have been sent for by pursuivants, and brought to London from their dwellings, and, by unlawful imprisonment, have been constrained not only to withdraw their lawful suits, but have also been compelled to pay the pursuivants so bringing such persons great sums of money. All which, upon complaint, the judges are bound, by office and oath, to relieve and help, by and according to her majesty's laws. And where it pleaseth your lordships to will divers of us to let down in what cases a prisoner sent to custody by her majesty, or her council, are to be detained in prison, and not to be delivered by her majesty's court or judges, we think, that if any person be committed by her majesty's command from her person, or by order from the council-board; and if any one or two of her council commit one for high treason, such persons so in the cases before committed, may not be delivered by any of her courts, without due trial by the law, and judgement of acquittal had. Nevertheless, the judges may award the queen's writ to bring the bodies of such prisoners before them; and if, upon return thereof, the causes of their commitment be certified to the judges, as it ought to be, then the judges in the case before ought not to deliver him, but to remand the prisoner to the place from whence he came, which cannot conveniently be done unless notice of the cause in general, or else in special, be known to the keeper or gaoler that shall have the custody of such prisoner."

This report does great honour to these judges, who, though at this period entirely dependent on the crown, were the only protectors of the civil rights of the nation.

It is to be observed that the king's council could not bring one clear precedent that any prisoner had been denied bail on the return of their Habeas Corpus, when the cause of the imprisonment had not been expressed in the writ; not but the civil rights of the nation had been continually infringed in the arbitrary imprisonment of its subjects, but few of these unhappy sufferers had courage enough to claim the protection of the laws, in opposition to the tyrannical will of the sovereign.

(o) Charles was in such a hurry to get this vote of five subsidies passed into a bill, that he sent to desire the commons not to make any recess the Easter-holidays. This was unpleasing to the house, lest it should affect their power of adjourning themselves when they pleased: sir Edward Coke moved to have it entered, that it was done ex regatu regis. Parliam. Hist. vol. vii. p. 436.

(p) This was according to sir Robert Cotton's advice.

which the common cause of this kingdom, and even of all Christendom, did so much depend. He bids them therefore take heed that they force him not, by unnecessary and tedious delays, to make an unpleasing end of that which was so well begun."

After sir John Cooke had given the house to understand that they were not to take this message as a threatening to dissolve the parliament, he farther added, "I must with some grief tell you, that notice is taken as if this house pressed not only upon the abuses of power but upon power itself; this toucheth the king, and us, who are supported by that power." The house was so offended at this assertion, that sir John was moved to explain what he meant by the word Power; which, he said, was by them opposed. This he refused, saying, "I cannot descend to particulars, or go from that which his majesty gave me warrant or power to deliver."

On the debate on the king's message it was agreed to nominate a committee to proceed on grievances. Certain instructions were given to the speaker in answer to the message delivered by sir John Cooke; and a petition (q) was sent up to the throne, representing the illegality of billeting soldiers, and the enormities occasioned by that oppressive measure: this was to be the prelude to the Petition of Right. On the 14th of April the judges attended in the house of Lords, to give an account of the reasons of their judgement in the case of the gentlemen who had been imprisoned without an express cause shewn. Sir Nicholas Hyde endeavoured to excuse himself and brethren from this task, by representing it as a thing they ought not to do without warrant from the king. The popular members, being irritated at this refusal, the lord Say answered, "If the judges will not declare themselves, we must take into consideration the point of our privilege." The duke of Buckingham having undertaken to compose this difference, sent a message to the king for leave that the judges might obey the injunctions of the house. An answer having been returned in the affirmative, the judges proceeded to give the demanded satisfaction. The authorities which these corrupt expounders of the law quoted to justify their proceedings were so unsatisfactory that, if there had been any thing wanting to the triumph of the commons, it would have been completed by the lameness of that which was urged in vindication of the questioned judgement.

Although the courtiers were thus foiled, they did not altogether give up the point: the matter was again argued between the two houses, by the attorney-general and the king's council on one side, and a select committee of the house of commons on the other. Though prolixity ought to be avoided by an historian, yet, on the present occasion, we must transgress this general rule, that the reader may form a just idea of those accurate sentiments of liberty, personal and political, which fell from the illustrious personages that argued on the side of their country.

The attorney-general came fraught with authorities to combat the good sense, reason, and learning, of his antagonists. He objected to the construction which the committee had made of the words, per legem terræ; and said, "that it cannot be imagined of the king that he will at any time, or in any case, do injustice to his subjects. It is a maxim in our law, that the king can do no wrong; therefore the king can give no land by disseisin; he can give no advowson by usurpation; and this is so far from being a defect or impotency in the king, that it is held for a point of his prerogative. The reason is, as the king is supreme governor of his people, so he is pater patriæ, therefore he cannot want the affection of a father towards his children."

Serjeant Ashley seconded what the attorney-general had advanced, that kings could imprison their subjects at their pleasure, without shewing the cause. "Divine truth informs us, said he, that kings have their power from God, and are representative gods; the psalmist calling them the children of the Most High, which is in a more especial manner understood of kings than of other men; for all the sons of Adam are by creation the children of God, and all the sons of Abraham are, by re-creation or regeneration, the children of the Most High: but it is said of kings, they are the children of the Most High in respect of the power that is committed to them, who hath also furnished them with ornaments and arms fit for the exercising that power, and given them sceptres and crowns; sceptres to institute, and swords to execute laws; and crowns, as ensigns of that power and dignity with which they are invested: shall we, then, conceive that our king hath so far transmitted the power of his sword to inferior magistrates that he hath not reserved so much supreme power as to commit an offender to prison."

In answer to what had been advanced on the king's side by the attorney-general and the serjeant, Mr. Littleton observed, "that they had never restrained the process of the law to writs original; but by the words, process of the law, they understood the whole proceedings of the law, and so took in the constables, and all those inferior officers, who, notwithstanding, are never used without a cause.—And, continued he, for what that gentleman (serjeant Ashley) objects, that the house of commons think they have gained their cause, because the king's counsel have yielded the statutes to be in force; alas! we do not labour for victory, but truth; convince our understandings by better reasons, and the cause shall be yours."

Sir Edward Coke said, "The common law hath so admeasured the king's prerogative, as he cannot prejudice any man in his inheritance: law doth privilege noblemen in arrests; this new doctrine, like the little god Terminus, yields to none; nay, the judges themselves, when they should sit on the bench, must be walking towards the Tower."

Mr. Glanville said, "We allow the king a liberty to confer grace; but not, without cause, to inflict punishment; and indeed he cannot do injury, for if he commanded to do a man wrong, the command is void in law, and the actor becomes the wrong doer."

Sir Edward Coke concluded with this speech: "My lords, your noble ancestors, whose places you hold, were parties to Magna Charta, so called for weight and substance; and you, my lords the bishops, are commanded to thunder out your anathemas against all infringers of it; and all the worthy judges that deserved their places have ever held Magna Charta in great estimation. Now as justice hath a sword, so it hath a balance: put together, my noble lords, in one balance, seven acts of parliament, records, precedents, reasons, all that we have spoken, and that statute of 18 Edward III. whereto there has been no answer; and, in God's name, put into the other balance, what Mr. Attorney hath said, his wit, learning, and great endowments of nature; and if he be weightier, let him have it; if not, then conclude with us. You are involved in the same danger with us, and therefore we desire you, in the name of the commons of England, represented in us, that we may have cause to give God and the king thanks for your justice in complying with us."

The Attorney-general summed up the arguments, and Mr. Noy rejoined, "That it was agreed on both sides, that the king might commit for a cause, not without. But Mr. Attorney had said, he was not bound to express a cause; to which it was replied, that the judges are to judge between him and his people, therefore, no cause no judgement; and consequently the king ought not to commit for any time, no, not an hour, without expressing the cause."

In a committee of the house of lords on this conference, on a motion of the earl of Warwick, a spirited popular peer, serjeant Ashley was taken into custody for the unconstitutional doctrine he had advanced in behalf of the crown (r). This noble lord displayed a strong and lively talent of reasoning in support of what had been advanced by the commons. "I will observe something out of the law, said he, wherein this liberty of the subjects' person is founded, and something out of the precedents which have been alledged. As to Magna Charta, and the rest, concerning these points, they are acknowledged by all to be now in force; that they were made to secure the subject from wrongful imprisonment; and that they concern

(q) According to the instructions which the commons had given, the speaker alledged, in his preamble to the petition, that the preserving those fundamental liberties which concern the freedom of person, and property of goods and lands, were an essential means to establish the true glory of a monarch, for rich and free subjects were best able to do service, either in peace or war; that this had been the cause of the happy and famous victories of the English, beyond other kingdoms of larger territories and greater numbers of people. Parliam. Hist. vol. vii. p. 445. Charles was much displeased with the petition, and still more with this preamble.

(r) On a petition, expressing his sorrow for the displeasure he had given, and desiring to make such recognition as the lords should enjoin him, he was admitted to make his submission, and ask forgiveness for his fault; this he did upon his knees, and was then discharged from custody. Parliam. Hist. vol. viii. p. 68. &c seq.

the

the king as much or rather more than the subject, Well then, besides Magna Charta, and those six other acts of parliament, in the very point, we know that Magna Charta itself hath been at least thirty times confirmed, so now at this time we have thirty-six or thirty-seven acts of parliament to confirm this liberty, although it was made a matter of derision the other day in this house. The law of Magna Charta is, that no free man shall be imprisoned but by lawful judgement of his peers, or the law of the land."

The conclusion of the debates of this house was, that a commitment by the king or his council is good in point of authority; and, if the cause of the commitment was just, then it was good in point of matter; but that these two concessions were no way to prejudice the king's authority, nor yet the propositions of the house of commons.

The supply, though voted, was not, as yet passed into a law; and the commons resolved to employ the interval, in providing some barriers to their rights and liberties so lately violated. They knew that their own vote, declaring the illegality of the former measures, had not, of itself, sufficient authority to secure the constitution against future invasion. The commons pretended not to any unusual powers or privileges: they aimed only at securing those which had been transmitted them from their ancestors; and their law they resolved to call a PETITION OF RIGHT; as implying that it contained a corroboration or explanation of the ancient constitution, not any infringement of royal prerogative, or acquisition of new liberties.

While the committee was employed in framing the petition of right, the favourers of each party, both in parliament and throughout the nation, were engaged in disputes about this bill, which, in all likelihood, was to form a memorable æra in the English government. That the statutes, said the partizans of the commons, which secure English liberty, are not become obsolete, appears hence, that the English have ever been free, and have ever been governed by law and a limited constitution. Privileges in particular, which are founded on the GREAT CHARTER, must always remain in force, because derived from a source of never-failing authority. They established it as a maxim, "That even a statute, which should be enacted in contradiction to any article of that charter, cannot have force or validity." But with regard to that important article which secures personal liberty; so far from attempting, at any time, any legal infringement of it, they have corroborated it by six statutes, and put it out of all doubt and controversy. Abuses can never come in the place of rules; nor can any rights or legal powers be derived from injury and injustice.

Although the house of lords was by no means insensible to the reasons urged in favour of the pretensions of the commons, they deemed the arguments pleaded in favour of the crown still more cogent and convincing. That assembly seems, during this whole period, to have acted, in the main, a reasonable and a moderate part; and if their bias inclined a little too much, as is natural, to the side of monarchy, they were far from entertaining any design of sacrificing to arbitrary will the liberties and privileges of the nation. Being, however, apprehensive that the commons might go too far in their projected petition, the peers proposed a plan of one more moderate, which they recommended to the consideration of the other house; and archbishop Abbot was employed by the lords to recommend, in a conference, their plan of a petition to the house of commons. The prelate, as was, no doubt, foreseen from his known principles, was not very urgent in his applications; and the lower house was fully convinced that the general declarations recommended by the lords signified nothing, and that they left their liberties in a worse condition than they were before. They proceeded, therefore, with great zeal, in framing the model of a petition, which should contain expressions more precise, and more favourable to public freedom.

The king easily perceived the consequence of these proceedings. Though he had offered, at the beginning of the session, to give his consent to any law for the security of the rights and liberties of the people; he had not expected that such inroads would be made on his prerogative. In order, therefore, to divert the commons from their intention, he sent a message, wherein he acknowledged past errors, and promised that, hereafter, there should be no just cause of complaint. And he added, "That the affairs of the kingdom press him so, that he could not continue the session above a week or two longer: and if the house be not ready, by that time, to do what is fit for themselves, it shall be their own fault." On a subsequent occasion, he asked them, "Why demand explanations, if you doubt not the performance of the statutes, according to their true meaning? Explanations will hazard an encroachment upon the prerogative. And it may well be said, What need a new law to confirm an old, if you repose confidence in the declarations which his majesty made to both houses?" The truth is, the great charter and the old statutes were sufficiently clear in favour of personal liberty: but as all kings of England had, in cases of necessity or expediency, been accustomed to elude them; and as Charles, in a number of instances, had lately violated them; the commons judged it requisite to enact a new law, which might not be eluded or violated, by any interpretation, construction, or contrary precedent.—Charles's predecessors had generally enjoyed too much discretionary power; and by his recent abuse of it, the whole nation had reason to see the necessity of entirely retrenching it.

The king, however, persevered in his endeavours to elude the petition. He sent a letter to the house of lords, in which he made this particular declaration, "That neither he nor his privy-council shall or will, at any time hereafter, commit or command to prison, or otherwise restrain, any man for not lending money, or for any other cause, which in his conscience he thought not to concern the public good, and the safety of king and people." And he farther declared, "That he never would be guilty of so base an action as to pretend any cause, of whose truth he was not fully satisfied." But this promise, though enforced to the commons by the recommendation of the upper house, made no greater impression than all the former messages.

Among the other evasions of the king, we may reckon the proposal of the house of peers, to subjoin, to the intended petition of right, the following clause: "We humbly present this petition to your majesty, not only with a care of preserving our own liberties, but with due regard to leave entire that sovereign power, with which your majesty is entrusted for the protection, safety, and happiness of your people." It is difficult to imagine that the lords could be so totally blind to consequences as not to perceive the weighty objections to this clause; or that the popular lords would have suffered it easily to pass, if they had not been certain of its fate in the lower house. It was rejected there with a warmth equal to the importance of the question. "In my opinion," said sir Edward Coke, "this clause weakens Magna Charta, and all the statutes; for they are absolute, without any saving of sovereign power: and should we now add it, it will weaken the foundation of law, and then the building must fall. Take we heed what we yield unto: Magna Charta is such a fellow that he will have no sovereign."

These obstacles, therefore, being surmounted, the petition of right passed the commons, and was sent to the upper house (s). The peers, who were probably well pleased in secret that all their solicitations had been eluded by (s) The Petition of Right is of so great importance to the liberty of the subject, that we shall make no apology for inserting it by way of note.

"Humbly shew, That whereas it is declared and enacted, by a statute made in the time of the reign of king Edward I. commonly called Statutum de tallagio non concedendo, that no tallage or aid shall be laid or levied by the king or his heirs, in this realm, without the good will and assent of the archbishops, bishops, earls, barons, knights, burgesses, and other freemen of the commonalty of this realm; and by authority of parliament, holden in the five and twentieth year of the reign of king Edward III. it is declared and enacted, that from thenceforth no person shall be compelled to make any loans to the king against his will, because such loans were against reason, and the franchise of the land; and by other laws of this realm it is provided, that none should be charged by any charge or imposition called a Benevolence, nor by suchlike charge; by which the statutes before-mentioned, and other the good laws and statutes of this realm, your subjects have inherited this freedom, that they should not be compelled to contribute to any tax, tallage, aid, or other like charge, not set by common consent of parliament.

"II. Yet, nevertheless, of late divers commissions, directed to sundry commissioners in several counties, with instructions, have issued; by means whereof your people have been in divers places assembled, and required to lend certain sums of money unto your majesty; and many of them, upon their refusal so to do, have had an oath administered unto them, not warrantable by the laws or statutes of this realm, and have been constrained to become bound to make appearance and give attendance before your privy council, and in other places; and others of them have been therefore imprisoned, confined, and sundry other ways molested and disquieted: and divers other charges have been laid and levied upon your people in several counties, by lord-lieutenants, deputy-lieutenants, by the commons, quickly passed the petition without any material alteration; and nothing but the royal assent was wanting to give it the force of a law. The king accordingly came to the house of peers; sent for the commons; and, being seated in his chair of state, the petition was read to him. Great was now the astonishment of all men, when, instead of the usual concise and clear form, by which a bill is either confirmed or rejected, Charles said, in answer to the petition, "The king willeth, that right be done according to the laws and customs of the realm, and that the statutes be put into execution; that his subjects may have no cause to complain of any wrong or oppression, contrary to their just rights and liberties, to the preservation whereof he holds himself in conscience as much obliged as of his own prerogative (t)."

It is surprizing that Charles, who had seen so many instances of the jealousy of the commons, who had himself so much roused that jealousy by his frequent evasive messages during this session, could imagine that they would rest satisfied with an answer so vague and indeterminate. It was evident, that the unusual form alone of the answer must excite their attention; that the disappointment must inflame their anger; and that therefore it was necessary, as the petition seemed to bear hard on royal prerogative, to come early to some fixed resolution, either gracefully to comply with it, or courageously to reject it.

It happened as might have been foreseen. The commons returned in very ill humour. Usually, when in that disposition, their zeal for religion, and their enmity against the unfortunate Catholics, ran extremely high. But they had already, in the beginning of the session, presented their petition of religion, and had received a satisfactory answer; though they expected that the execution of the laws against papists would, for the future, be no more exact and rigid, than they had hitherto found it. To give vent to their present indignation, they fell with their utmost force [illegible]n Dr. Manwaring.

There is [illegible]othing which tends more to excuse, if not to justify, the extreme rigour of the commons towards Charles, than his open encouragement and avowal of such general principles as were altogether incompatible with a limited government. Manwaring had preached a sermon, which the commons found, upon enquiry, to be printed by special command of the king; and, when this sermon was looked into, it contained doctrines subversive of all civil liberty, as we have before observed; and for the doctrines which it contained the commons impeached the preacher. The sentence, pronounced upon him by the peers, was, that he should be imprisoned during the pleasure of the house, be fined a thousand pounds to the king, make submission and acknowledgement of his offence, be suspended during three years from the exercise of his ministry, be incapable for ever of holding any ecclesiastical dignity or secular office, that his book be called in and burnt, and that the printing thereof hereafter be inhibited upon a great penalty.

It may be worthy of notice, that no sooner was the session ended, than this man, so justly noxious to both houses, received a pardon, and was promoted to a living of considerable value. Some years after, he was raised to the see of St. Asaph. If the republican spirit of the commons increased the monarchical spirit of the court; this latter, carried to so high a pitch, tended still farther to augment the former. And thus extremes were every where affected, and the just medium was gradually deserted by all men.

From Manwaring, the house of commons proceeded to censure the conduct of Buckingham, whose name hitherto they had cautiously forborn to mention. In vain did the king send them a message, in which he told them, that the session was drawing near to a conclusion; and desired, that they would not enter upon new business, nor cast any aspersions on his government and ministry. Though the court endeavoured to explain and soften this message by a subsequent message; as Charles was apt hastily to correct any precipitate step which he had taken; it served rather to inflame than to appease the commons: as if the method of their proceedings had here been prescribed to them. It was foreseen, that a great tempest was ready to burst on the duke; and in order to divert it, the king thought proper, upon a joint application of the lords and commons, to endeavour giving them satisfaction with regard to the petition of right. He came therefore to the house of peers, and pronouncing the usual form of words, "Soit droit fait comme il est desiré:" that is, "Let it be law as is desired," gave full sanction and authority to the petition. The acclamations with which the house resounded, and the universal joy diffused over the nation, showed how much this petition had been the object of all men's vows and expectations.

tenants, commissioners for musters, justices of peace, and others, by command or direction from your majesty, or your privy council, against the laws and free customs of this realm.

"III. And whereas also by the statute called The Great Charter of the Liberties of England, it is declared and enacted, That no freeman may be taken or imprisoned, or be disseised of his freeholds or liberties, or his free customs, or be out-lawed or exiled, or in any manner destroyed, but by the lawful judgement of his peers, or by the law of the land.

"IV. And in the eight and twentieth year of the reign of king Edward III. it was declared and enacted, by authority of parliament, that no man of what estate or condition that he be, should be put out of his lands or tenements, nor taken, nor imprisoned, nor disherited, nor put to death, without being brought to answer by due process of law.

"V. Nevertheless, against the tenour of the said statutes, and other the good laws and statutes of your realm to that end provided, divers of your subjects have of late been imprisoned without any cause shewed; and when, for their deliverance, they were brought before justices, by your majesty's writs of Habeas Corpus, there to undergo and receive as the court should order, and their keepers commanded to certify the cause of their detainer, no cause was certified, but that they were detained by your majesty's special command, signified by the lords of your privy council; and yet were returned back to several prisons, without being charged with any thing to which they might make answer by due process of law.

"VI. And whereas of late great companies of soldiers and mariners have been dispersed into divers counties of the realm, and the inhabitants, against their wills, have been compelled to receive them into their houses, and there to suffer them to sojourn, against the laws and customs of this realm, and to the great grievance and vexation of your people.

"VII. And whereas also by authority of parliament, in the five and twentieth year of the reign of king Edward III. it is declared and enacted, That no man should be forejudged of life or limb against the form of the Great Charter, and law of the land; and by the said Great Charter, and other the laws and statutes of this your realm, no man ought to be adjudged to death but by the laws established in this your realm, either by the customs of the same realm, or by acts of parliament: and whereas no offender of what kind soever is exempted from the proceedings to be used, and punishments to be inflicted by the laws and statutes of this your realm: nevertheless, of late divers commissions, under your majesty's great seal, have issued forth, by which certain persons have been assigned and appointed commissioners, with power and authority to proceed within the land, according to the justice of martial law, against such soldiers and mariners, or other dissolute persons joining with them, as should commit any murder, robbery, felony, mutiny, or other outrage or misdemeanour whatsoever; and by such summary course and order as is agreeable to martial law, and as is used in armies in time of war, to proceed to the trial and condemnation of such offenders, and then to cause to be executed and put to death, according to the law martial.

"VIII. By pretext whereof some of your majesty's subjects have been, by some of the said commissioners, put to death; when and where, if by the law and statutes of the land they had deserved death, by the same laws and statutes also they might, and by no other ought, to have been adjudged and executed.

"IX. And also sundry grievous offenders, by colour thereof claiming an exemption, have escaped the punishments due to them by the laws and statutes of this your realm, by reason that divers of your officers and ministers of justice have unjustly refused or forborn to proceed against such offenders according to the same laws and statutes, upon pretence that the said offenders were punishable only by martial law, and by authority of such commissions as aforesaid; which commissions, and all other of like nature, are wholly and directly contrary to the said laws and statutes of this your realm.

"X. They do therefore humbly pray your most excellent majesty, That no man hereafter be compelled to make or yield any gift, loan, benevolence, tax, or such-like charge, without common consent, by act of parliament; and that none be called to make answer, or take such oath, or to give attendance, or to be confined, or otherwise molested or disquieted concerning the same, or for the refusal thereof; and that no freeman, in any such manner as is before mentioned, be imprisoned or detained; and that your majesty would be pleased to remove the said soldiers and mariners, that your people may not be so burdened in time to come; and that the foresaid commissions for proceeding by martial law may be revoked and annulled: and that hereafter no commissions of like nature may issue forth to any person or persons whatsoever, to be executed as aforesaid, lest by colour of them, any of your majesty's subjects be destroyed, or put to death, contrary to the laws and franchises of the land.

"XI. All which they most humbly pray of your most excellent majesty, as their rights and liberties, according to the laws and statutes of this realm: and that your majesty would also vouchsafe to declare, That the awards, doings, and proceedings, to the prejudice of your people, in any of the premises, shall not be drawn hereafter into consequence or example: and that your majesty would be also graciously pleased, for the future comfort and safety of your people, to declare your royal will and pleasure, that in the things aforesaid all your officers and ministers shall serve you according to the laws and statutes of this realm, as they tender the honour of your majesty, and the prosperity of this kingdom." Statutes at Large, 17 Car. cap. 14.

This Petition of Right was drawn up by sir Edward Coke.

(t) When it was generally known that the Petition of Right had been passed in the proper form, the city of London resounded with the rejoicings of all ranks of people. Bonfires and the ringing of bells proclaimed the applause of the public. See Sanderson's Life of Charles I. p. 113.

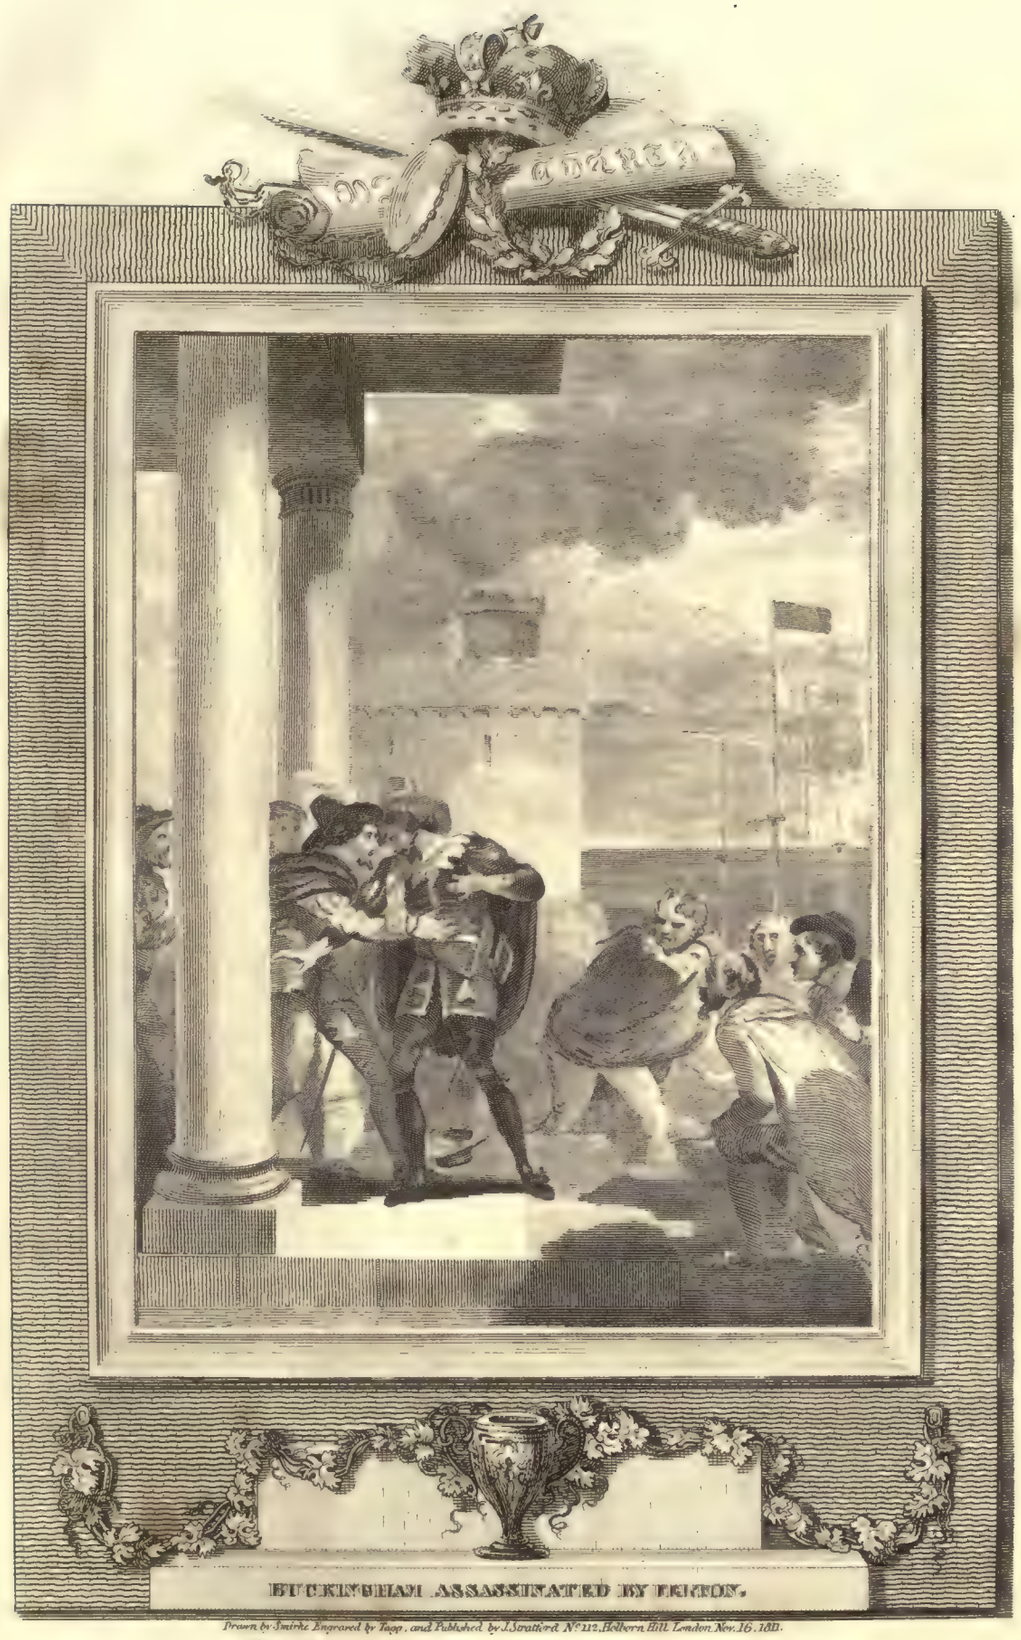
We may justly affirm, without fear of exaggeration, that the king's assent to the petition of right produced such a change in the government, as was almost equivalent to a revolution; and by circumscribing, in so many articles, the royal prerogative, gave additional security to the liberties of the subject. Yet were the commons far from being satisfied with this important concession. Their ill humour had been so much irritated by the king's frequent evasions and delays, that it could not be presently appeased by a bare assent, which he allowed to be so reluctantly extorted from him. Perhaps too, the popular leaders saw the opportunity favourable; and turning against the king those very weapons with which he had furnished them, resolved to pursue the victory. The bill, however, for five subsidies, which had been formerly voted, immediately passed the house, because the granting of that supply was, in a manner, tacitly contracted for, upon the royal assent to the petition; and had faith been here violated, no farther confidence could have subsisted between king and parliament. Having made this concession, the commons continued to carry their scrutiny into every part of government. In most particulars their industry was laudable; but in some it may be liable to censure.

A little after writs were issued for summoning this parliament, a commission had been granted to sir Thomas Coventry, lord keeper, the earl of Marlborough, treasurer, the earl of Manchester, president of the council, the earl of Worcester, privy-seal, the duke of Buckingham, high admiral, and all the considerable officers of the crown; in the whole, thirty-three. By this commission, which, from the number of persons named in it, could be no secret, the commissioners were empowered to meet and to concert among themselves the methods of levying money by impositions, or otherwise; "Where form and circumstance," as expressed in the commission, "must be dispensed with, rather than the substance be lost or hazarded." In other words, this was a scheme for finding expedients, which might raise the prerogative to the greatest height, and render parliaments entirely useless. The commons applied for cancelling the commission; and were, no doubt, desirous that all the world should conclude the king's principles to be extremely arbitrary, and should observe what little regard he was disposed to pay to the liberties and privileges of his people.

A commission had likewise been granted, and some money remitted, in order to raise a thousand German horse, and transport them into England. These were supposed to be levied, in order to support the projected impositions or excises; though the number seems insufficient for such a purpose. The house took notice of this design in severe terms: and no measure, surely, could be projected more generally odious to the whole nation.

Shortly after the commons resumed their censure of Buckingham's conduct and behaviour, against whom they were implacable. They agreed to present a remonstrance to the king, in which they recapitulated all the national grievances and misfortunes, and omitted no circumstance which could render the whole administration despicable in the eyes of the people. The compositions with the Catholics, they said, amounted to no less than a toleration, which was hateful to God, full of dishonour and disprofit to his majesty, and of extreme scandal and grief to his good people: they took notice of the violations of liberty above mentioned, against which the petition of right seems to have provided a sufficient remedy: they mentioned the decay of trade, the unsuccessful expeditions to Cadiz and the isle of Rhé, the encouragement given to Arminians, the commission for transporting German horse, that for levying illegal impositions; and all these grievances they ascribed solely to the ill conduct of the duke of Buckingham. This remonstrance was, perhaps, not the less provoking to Charles, because, joined to the extreme acrimony of the subject, there were preserved in it, as in most of the remonstrances of that age, an affected civility and submission in the language.

It was not without good grounds that the commons assumed so high a tone. Though they had already granted the king the supply of five subsidies, they still retained a pledge in their hands, which they thought ensured them success in all their applications. Tonnage and poundage had not yet been granted by parliament; and the commons had, this session, concealed their intention of invading that branch of revenue, till the royal assent had been obtained to the petition of right, which they justly deemed of great importance. They then openly asserted, that the levying of tonnage and poundage without consent of parliament, was a palpable violation of the ancient liberties of the people, and an open infringement of the petition of right, so lately granted. The king, in order to prevent the finishing and presenting of this remonstrance, came suddenly to the parliament on the 26th of June, and ended this session by a prorogation.



Being freed for some time from the embarrassment of this assembly, Charles began to look towards foreign wars, where all his efforts were equally as unsuccessful, as in his domestic government. The earl of Denbigh, brother-in-law to Buckingham, was dispatched to the relief of Rochelle, which was at this time closely besieged by land, and threatened with a blockade by sea: but he returned without effecting any thing; and having declined to attack the enemy's fleet, he brought on the English arms the imputation either of cowardice or ill-conduct. In order to repair this dishonour, the duke went to Portsmouth, where he had prepared a considerable fleet and army, on which all the subsidies given by parliament had been expended. This supply had very much disappointed the king's expectations. The same spirit which prevailed in the house of commons, had diffused itself over the nation; and the commissioners appointed for making the assessments, had connived at all frauds, which might diminish the supply, and reduce the crown to still greater necessities. This national discontent, communicated to a desperate enthusiast, soon broke out in an event, which may be considered as remarkable.

There was one Felton, of a good family, but of an ardent, melancholic temper, who had served under the duke in the station of lieutenant. His captain being killed in the isle of Rhé, Felton had applied for the company; and when disappointed, he threw up his commission, and retired in discontent from the army. This fanatic perceived that the nation resounded with complaints against the duke; and he met with the remonstrance of the commons, in which his enemy was represented as the sole cause of every national grievance, and as the great enemy of the public. Religious fanaticism farther inflamed these vindictive reflections; and he fancied that he should do heaven acceptable service, if, at one blow, he dispatched this dangerous foe to religion and his country. Full of these dark views he secretly arrived at Portsmouth, at the same time with the duke, and watched an opportunity of effecting his sanguinary purpose.

Buckingham had been engaged in conversation with the duke of Soubize and other French gentlemen on the 23rd of August; and a difference of sentiment having arisen, the dispute, though conducted with temper and decency, had produced some vehement gesticulations and very lively exertions of voice. The conversation being finished, the duke drew towards the door; and in that passage, turning himself to speak to sir Thomas Fryer, a colonel in the army, he was, on the sudden, over sir Thomas's shoulder, struck upon the breast with a knife. Without uttering other words than "The villain has killed me;" in the same moment pulling out the knife, he breathed his last.

No man had seen the fatal blow, nor the person who gave it; but in the conclusion, every one made his own conjecture; and all agreed that the murder had been committed by the French gentleman, whose angry tone of voice had been heard, while their words had not been understood by the bystanders. But near the door there was found a hat, in the inside of which was sewed a paper, containing four or five lines of that remonstrance of the commons, which declared Buckingham an enemy to the kingdom; and under these lines was a short ejaculation. It was easily concluded that this hat belonged to the assassin: yet the difficulty still remained, "Who that person should be?" For the writing discovered not the name; and whoever he was, it was natural to believe that he had already fled far enough not to be found without a hat.

In this hurry, a man without a hat was seen walking very composedly before the door. One crying out, "Here is the fellow who killed the duke;" every body ran to ask, "Which is he?" The man very sedately answered, "I am he." The more furious immediately rushed upon him with drawn swords: others, more deliberate, defended and protected him: he himself, with open arms, calmly and cheerfully exposed his breast to the swords of the most enraged; being willing to fall a sudden sacrifice to their anger, rather than be reserved for that public justice which, he knew, would inevitably be executed upon him. He was now known to be that Felton who had served in the army.

BUCKINGHAM ASSASSINATED BY LEGION.

Drawn by Smirke Engraved by Tapp, and Published by J. Stratford N°112, Holborn Hill London Nov. 16, 1810.

Being carried into a private room, it was thought proper so far to dissemble as to tell him, that Buckingham was only grievously wounded, but not without hopes of recovery. Felton smiled, and told them, that the duke, he knew full well, had received a blow which had terminated all their hopes. When asked, at whose instigation he had performed that horrid deed? he replied, that they needed not to trouble themselves in that inquiry; that no man living had credit enough with him to have disposed him to such an action; that he had not even entrusted his purpose to any one; that the resolution proceeded only from himself, and the impulse of his own conscience; and that his motives would appear, if his hat were found: for that, believing he should perish in the attempt, he had there taken care to explain them.

When the king, who was within four miles of Portsmouth, was informed of this assassination, he received the news in public with an unmoved and undisturbed countenance; and the courtiers, who studied his looks, concluded, that secretly he was not displeased to be rid of a minister so generally odious to the nation. But Charles was still as much as ever, attached to his favourite; and, during his whole life, he retained an affection for Buckingham's friends, and a prejudice against his enemies. He urged too, that Felton should be put to the torture, in order to extort from him a discovery of his accomplices: but the judges declared, that though that practice had formerly been very usual, it was altogether illegal.

Laud, who had been lately promoted to the bishopric of London, suggested a suspicion that the Puritans were at the bottom of the mischief, and threatened the delinquent with the rack. Felton told them, that if that was to be his case, he did not know whom he might name in the extremity of torture; and if what he should then say was to go for truth, he could not tell whether his lordship the bishop of London, or which of the lords at the council-board, he might accuse; for torture would draw unexpected things from him. By a resolution of the king and council, the judges were consulted on this question, whether Felton might legally be put to the torture? The judges determined in the negative; and the king graciously declared, that since it could not be done by law, he would not, in this point, use his prerogative. On the 27th of November, Felton was brought to his trial. The unhappy enthusiast felt so exquisite a remorse for the crime he had committed, that on the court's passing sentence of death upon him, he offered that hand to be cut off which did the fact. Though the court disclaimed this request, as not within the compass of the law, and out of their power to grant, Charles sent to the judges to intimate his desire that Felton's hand might be cut off before the execution of the sentence of death. The judges returned answer, That the king's will could not be complied with; for in all murders the judgement was the same, unless when the statute of the 25th of Edward the Third altered the nature of the offence.

The distress of Rochelle had in the mean time risen to the utmost extremity. That vast genius of Richelieu, which made him form the greatest enterprizes, led him to attempt their execution by means equally great and extraordinary. In order to deprive Rochelle of all succour, he had projected the throwing across the harbour a mole of a mile's extent in that boisterous ocean; and having executed his project, he now held the town closely blockaded on all sides. The inhabitants, though pressed with the greatest rigours of famine, still refused to submit; being supported, partly by the lectures of their zealous preachers, partly by the daily hopes of relief from England. After Buckingham's death, the command of the fleet and army was conferred on the earl of Lindesey; who, arriving before Rochelle, made some attempts to break through the mole, and force his way into the harbour: but by the delays of the English, that work was now fully finished and fortified; and the Rochellers, finding their last hopes to fail them, were reduced to surrender at discretion, on the 18th of October, even in sight of the English admiral. Of twenty-two thousand persons shut up in the city, four thousand alone survived the fatigues and famine which they had undergone. The living not being in number sufficient, or in a condition to bury the dead, vermin and birds of prey fed on the exposed carcasses. The dying are said to have carried their own coffins into the church-yards, and there to have laid down and breathed their last. Rats, dogs, cats, mice, human flesh, and other distasteful food, had been the only provision on which these martyrs to the cause of religion and liberty had for some time fed. The few inhabitants that survived appeared like the skeletons of men (u). The persecution of the reformed churches was so violent, after the reduction of this fortress, that they were again obliged to implore aid of Charles: this they did in these terms; "That what they wrote was with their tears and their blood." This emphatical expression had no effect upon the English monarch, and the Hugonots were left to their fate. The unhappy situation of the Rochellers, and the miserable state of the reformed churches, could not fail exciting in the English a fresh disgust at the conduct of the ministry: this was inflamed by many other causes of complaint.

Since the last session of parliament, several wine-merchants had been committed to the Fleet prison for refusing to submit to an imposition of twenty shillings on the ton; and Charles declared in full council, that it was his absolute will and pleasure that a new duty of two shillings and two pence the hundred on currants should be added to the old one of three shillings and four pence. Richard Chambers a merchant, was committed to the Marshalsea prison for saying, "That greater impositions were required of the merchants in England than in any other place, and that they were more screwed up than the Turk." These words not having been expressed in the return of the writ, it was judged insufficient, and the warden of the prison directed to mend it: but the prisoner was advised by the court to submit to the lords of the council, and petition them for his enlargement. Before this time and his second return, Mr. Jermyn, the counsel for the prisoner, moved that he might be dismissed or bailed, as it appeared by the return he was not committed for treason, and that the return did not shew what the words were whereto he might give answer. The king's attorney desired that he might have time to consider of the return, and be informed of the words, and that in the interim the prisoner to attend the council-table, and petition. The prisoner stood upon the justice of the law, and the inheritance of the subject. On his importunity the court commanded him to be bailed (v); but withal told him, that he was indebted to the clemency of the court, it being in their power to draw an indictment against him, if they would, for contemptuous words. The judges, on account of the bailing of Chambers, were sent to attend the lord keeper, the lord treasurer, the lord privy-seal, and the chancellor of the duchy of Lancaster. The lord keeper declared to them, that the enlargement of Chambers was without due regard had to the privy-council, they not having been previously made acquainted with it. The judges excused themselves by saying, that the lord chief-justice had acquainted the lord keeper in private, before they had proceeded to bail the party; and moreover added, that what they had done in that affair was according to law, justice, and conscience. On this they were told, that it was necessary for the preservation of the state, that the power and dignity of the council-table should be preserved, and that it could not be done without a correspondency from the courts of justice. The attorney-general exhibited an information in the Exchequer against Samuel Vassal, a merchant of London, for refusing to pay the new duty of five shillings and six-pence on every hundred weight of currants (w). To this information Vassal pleaded the statute of Magna Charta, and the statute de tallagio non concedendo; and that this duty was imposed without assent of parliament. The barons of the Exchequer refused to hear Vassal's council argue for him; and (u) Guiton, the mayor of Rochelle, who had made so obstinate a defence, going in his formalities to receive the conquerors, was told by Richelieu, that he must dismiss his halberdiers, for the king would be sole master and mayor of Rochelle. He answered, with a spirit truly noble, "If I had known you would not have kept your word with me, the burghers should have defended themselves to the last man, and I would then have buried myself under the ruins of the town." Larrey, vol. I. p. 207.

(v) On a recognizance of four hundred pounds: four securities were bound in a recognizance of a hundred pounds each. Rushworth, vol. i. p. 640.

(w) The information set forth, that king James did, by his letters patent, command the taking the said impositions; that his majesty that now is, by his letters patent dated the 26th of June, 2 Caroli, did, by the advice of his privy-council, declare his will and pleasure to be, that subsidies, customs, and impost, should be levied in such manner as they were in the time of king James, until it might receive a settling by parliament; that the said Samuel Vassal, before the 1st day of October, 4 Car. did bring into the port of London four thousand six hundred and thirty-eight hundred weight of currants, for which he refused to pay duty. Rushworth, vol. i. p. 641.

said that the king was in possession, and they would keep him in it (x). On this they sent Vassal to prison, and gave judgement for the king. The goods of one Rolles, a merchant, and a member of parliament, were likewise seized, and the same judgement given against him in the Exchequer. Those groveling instruments of oppression, the officers of the customs, who, in proportion to the baseness of their education, are insolent in office, said, with unprecedented impudence, "If all the parliaments were in you we would take your goods." Divers merchandizes belonging to the before-mentioned Richard Chambers, having been seized in the same manner, he sued forth a writ of replevin to regain possession: the barons of the Exchequer sent an injunction under the seal of their court, commanding the sheriff not to execute the writ, or any the like writs of replevin that should be afterwards sued forth for the delivery of any goods in the like nature detained; and declared in court that such goods were not repleviable by law. On this the sheriffs of London refused to execute the writ of replevin. Chambers, finding it impossible to obtain justice, offered to give security for the payment of the duties that were demanded. The court refused to take his security, and directed the officers of the customs to detain double the value of the sums which had been by them demanded, and to restore the residue. To these acts of violence committed against the London merchants, the court gave another cause of disgust, by levying an oppressive fine on the occasion of a riot, in which one Lamb, a supposed conjuror (y), and a creature of the duke of Buckingham, was killed.

The failure of the expedition to Rochelle, in which the English nation, from religious sympathy, so much interested themselves, could not but diminish the king's authority in the parliament during the approaching session. On the 20th of January, 1629, the parliament again met; when the commons found many other causes of complaint. Buckingham's conduct and character had afforded a sufficient reason for discontent against public measures: but after his death, there wanted not new reasons and new pretences for general dissatisfaction. Manwaring's pardon and promotion were taken notice of: Sibthorpe and Cosins, two clergymen, who, for like reasons, were no less hateful to the commons, had met with like favour from the king: Montague, who had been censured with moderation towards the Catholics, had been created bishop of Chichester. They found, likewise, upon inquiry, that all the copies of the petition of right, which were dispersed, had, by the king's orders, annexed to them the first answer, which had given so little satisfaction to the commons. An expedient by which Charles endeavoured to persuade the people that he had not in the least receded from his former claims and pretensions, particularly with regard to the levying of tonnage and poundage. Selden also complained in the house, that one Savage, contrary to the petition of right, had been punished with the loss of his ears, by a discretionary or arbitrary sentence of the star-chamber. But the great article on which the house of commons broke with the king, and which finally created in Charles a disgust to all parliaments, was their claim with regard to tonnage and poundage. On this occasion, therefore, it is necessary to give an account of the controversy.

The duty of tonnage and poundage, in more ancient times, had been commonly a temporary grant of parliament; but it had been conferred on Henry V. and all the succeeding princes, during life, in order to enable them to maintain a naval force for the defence of the kingdom. The necessity of levying this duty had been so apparent, that each king had ever claimed it from the moment of his accession; and the first parliament of each reign had usually, by vote, conferred on the prince the power of levying it. The parliament did not grant the duty of tonnage and poundage to Henry VIII. till the sixth year of his reign: yet this prince, who had not then raised his power to its greatest height, continued, during the whole time, to levy the imposition. During the short interval which passed between Charles's accession and his first parliament, he had followed the example of his predecessors; the house of commons, instead of granting this supply during the king's life-time, as it had been enjoyed by his immediate predecessors, voted it only for a year; and, after that should be elapsed, reserved to themselves the power of renewing or refusing it. Charles, however, continued still to levy this duty by his own authority; but in the succeeding parliament the commons took some steps towards declaring it illegal to levy tonnage and poundage without consent of parliament; yet the haughty disposition of Charles would not permit him to comply with their requests; and the abrupt dissolution of that parliament put an end, for the time, to their farther discussions on the subject. The following interval between the second and third parliament, was distinguished by so many exertions of prerogative, that men had little leisure to attend to the affair of tonnage and poundage, where the abuse of power in the crown might seem to be of a very disputable nature. But after the commons, during the precedent session, had remedied all these grievances by means of their petition of right, which they deemed so necessary; they afterwards proceeded to take the matter into consideration, and they showed an intention of exacting in return for the grant of this revenue, large compliances on the part of the crown. The sudden prorogation prevented them from bringing their pretensions to a full conclusion.

When Charles opened this session, he foresaw that the same controversy would arise; and therefore took care, very early, among many mild and reconciling expressions, to inform the commons, "That he had not taken these duties as appertaining to his hereditary prerogative; but that it ever was, and still is, his meaning to enjoy them as a gift of his people: and that, if he had hitherto levied tonnage and poundage, he pretended to justify himself only by the necessity of so doing, not by any right which he assumed. This concession, however, did not satisfy the commons; and they insisted, as a necessary preliminary, that the king should desist from levying these duties; after which, they were to take it into consideration, how far they would restore him to the possession of a revenue, of which he had divested himself. Charles did not think fit to relinquish the levying of these duties; and the commons openly declared, that they had at present many important matters to consult upon, chiefly with regard to religion; and if compliance were refused, no supply must be expected from them.

Charles was now involved in an inextricable labyrinth. By his own concessions, by the general principles of the English government, and by the form of every bill which had granted this duty, tonnage and poundage was derived entirely from the free gift of the people; and, consequently, might be withdrawn at their pleasure. If unreasonable in their refusal, they still refused nothing but what was their own. If public necessity required this supply, it might be thought also to require the king's compliance with those conditions which were the price of obtaining it. Though the motive for granting it had been the enabling of the king to guard the seas; it did not follow, that because he guarded the seas, he was therefore entitled to this revenue, without farther formality, since the people had still reserved to themselves the right of judging how far that service merited such a supply. But Charles, notwithstanding his declaration, was far from assenting to this conclusion in its full extent. The plain consequence, he saw, of all these refinements and inferences, was, that he must become a magistrate of a very different nature from his immediate predecessors, and must fall into a total dependence on subjects over whom former kings had exercised an authority almost unlimited. Entangled in a chain of consequences which he could not easily break, he was inclined to go higher, and rather deny the first principle, than admit of conclusions which to him appeared so unreasonable. Willing to preserve the harmony of the constitution, as exercised by his predecessors, he had intended to comply, as far as he easily could, with the ancient forms of the administration: but when these forms appeared to him to have no other tendency than to disturb that harmony, and to introduce a new constitution, he concluded, that the privileges of the people must give place to royal prerogative. From the rank of a monarch, to be degraded into what he thought a slave of his subjects, seemed, of all indignities the greatest; and nothing, in his judgement, could exceed the humiliation attending such a state, but the meanness of tamely submitting to it, without making some efforts to preserve the authority transmitted to him by former kings.

Though these were the king's reflections and resolutions before the parliament assembled, he did not immediately break with them, upon their delay in voting him this supply. He thought that he could better justify any strong measure which he might afterwards be obliged to take, if he allowed them to carry to the utmost extremities their attacks upon his government and prerogative. He contented himself, for the present, with soliciting the house by messages and speeches. But the commons, instead of hearkening to his solicitations, proceeded to carry their scrutiny into his management of religion, which was the only grievance to which, in their opinion, they had not as yet, by their petition of right, applied a sufficient remedy.

It was not possible that this century, so fertile in religious sects and disputes, could escape the controversy concerning fatalism and free-will, which, being strongly interwoven both with philosophy and theology, had, in all ages, thrown every school and every church into such inextricable doubt and perplexity. The first Reformers in England, as in other European countries, had embraced the tenets of Predestination and absolute decrees, and had composed, upon that system, all the articles of their religious creed. But these principles having met with opposition from Arminius and his sectaries, the controversy was soon brought into this island, and began here to diffuse itself. The Arminians, finding more encouragement from the superstitious spirit of the church than from the Puritans, gradually incorporated themselves with the former; and some of that sect, by the indulgence of James and Charles, had attained the highest preferments in the hierarchy. But their success with the public had not been altogether answerable to that which they met with in the church and the court. Throughout the nation, they still lay under the reproach of innovation and heresy. The commons now levelled against them their formidable censures, and made them the objects of daily invective and declamation. Their protectors were stigmatized; their tenets canvassed; their views represented as dangerous and pernicious.

Amidst that complication of disputes in which men were then involved, we may observe, that the appellation Puritan stood for three parties, which, though commonly united, were yet actuated by very different views and motives. There were the political Puritans, who maintained the highest principles of civil liberty; the Puritans in discipline, who were averse to the ceremonies and episcopal government of the church; and the doctrinal Puritans, who rigidly defended the system of the first Reformers. In opposition to all these, stood the court party, the hierarchy, and the Arminians; only with this distinction, that the latter sect, being introduced a few years before, did not, as yet, comprehend all those who were favourable to the church and to monarchy. But, as the controversies on the subject daily grew warmer, men united themselves more intimately with their friends, and separated themselves wider from their antagonists; and the distinction gradually became uniform and regular.

This house of commons, which was much governed by the puritanical party, thought that they could not better serve their cause than by branding and punishing the Arminian sect, which, introducing an innovation in the church, were the least favoured and least powerful of all their antagonists. From this measure it was easily foreseen, that, besides gratifying the animosity of the doctrinal Puritans, both the Puritans in discipline, and those in politics, would reap considerable advantages. Laud, Neile, Montague, and other bishops, who were the chief supporters of episcopal government, and the most zealous partizans of the discipline and ceremonies of the church, were all supposed to be tainted with Arminianism. The same men and their disciples were the strenuous preachers of passive obedience, and of entire submission to princes; and if these could once be censured, and be expelled the church and court, it was concluded, that the hierarchy would receive a mortal blow, the ceremonies be less rigidly insisted on, and the king deprived of his most faithful friends, be obliged to abate those high claims of prerogative, on which at present he insisted.

But Charles was strongly determined to oppose them. Neither the dissipation incident to youth, nor the pleasures attending a high fortune, had been able to prevent him from embracing a sincere attachment to religion; which, though remote from popery, had a tincture of superstition in it; and, being averse to the doctrines of the Puritans, was represented by them as tending towards the abominations of antichrist. Laud also had unfortunately acquired a great ascendant over him: and as all those prelates, noxious to the commons, were regarded as his chief friends and most favourite courtiers, he was resolved not to disarm and dishonour himself, by abandoning them to the resentment of his enemies. Being totally unprovided with military force, and finding a refractory independent spirit to prevail among the people; the most solid basis of his authority, he thought, consisted in the support which he received from the hierarchy.

In the debates of the commons, which are transmitted to us, it is easy to discern so early some sparks of that enthusiastic fire, which afterwards set the whole nation in combustion. Mr. Rouse in a speech made use of the following allusion: "If a man meet a dog alone," said he, "the dog is fearful, though ever so fierce by nature: but if the dog have his master with him, he will set upon that man from whom he fled before. This shows, that lower natures, being backed by higher, increase in courage and strength; and certainly man, being backed with Omnipotency, is a kind of omnipotent creature. All things are possible to him that believes; and where all things are possible, there is a kind of omnipotency. Wherefore, let it be the unanimous consent and resolution of us all to make a vow and covenant henceforth to hold fast our God and our religion; and then shall we henceforth expect, with certainty, happiness in this world."

Oliver Cromwell, at that time a young man, a member of the house, shewed how active the bishop of Winchester had been in the favour that had been shewed to Manwaring, and that he countenanced ministers who preached flat popery.

The inquiries and debates concerning tonnage and poundage went hand in hand with these theological or metaphysical controversies. The officers of the custom-house were summoned before the commons, to give an account by what authority they had seized the goods of merchants who had refused to pay these duties: the barons of the exchequer were questioned concerning their decrees on that head. One of the sheriffs of London (Acton) was committed to the Tower for supporting the officers of the custom-house, and for insolent behaviour. The goods of Rolles, a merchant, and member of the house, being seized for his refusal to pay the duties, complaints were made of this violence, as if it were a breach of privilege: Charles supported his officers in all these measures; and the quarrel grew every day higher between him and the commons. Mention was made in the house of impeaching sir Richard Weston, the treasurer; and the king began to entertain thoughts of finishing the session by a dissolution.

Sir John Elliot framed a remonstrance against levying tonnage and poundage without consent of parliament, and offered it to the clerk to read. It was refused. He read it himself. The question being then called for, the speaker, sir John Finch, said, "That he had a command from the king to adjourn, and to put no question." Upon which he rose and left the chair. The whole house was in an uproar. The speaker was pushed back into the chair, and forcibly held in it by Hollis (son to the earl of Clare) and Valentine; till the following short remonstrance was framed, and passed by the house:

"First, Whosoever shall bring in innovation in religion, or by favour seek to extend or introduce Popery and Arminianism, or other opinions disagreeing from the true and orthodox church, shall be reputed a capital enemy to this kingdom and commonwealth. Secondly, Whosoever shall counsel or advise the taking and levying of the subsidies of tonnage and poundage, not being granted by parliament, or shall be an actor or instrument therein, shall be likewise reputed an innovator in the government, and a capital enemy to this kingdom and commonwealth. Thirdly, If any merchant, or other person whatsoever, shall voluntarily yield or pay the said subsidies of tonnage and poundage, not being granted by parliament, he shall likewise be reputed a betrayer of the liberty of England, and an enemy to the same." After the passing of these protestations, the house rose (z).

The king having heard that the commons had continued to sit, notwithstanding his command for the adjournment, sent a messenger for the serjeant with his mace: the house detained the serjeant, locked the door, and deposited the key in the hands of one of their members. Not only this messenger, but Maxwell, the usher of the black rod, having been been denied entrance, Charles was extremely angered, and directed the captain of the pensioners and guards to force the door. The mischief that this intended violence might have occasioned, was prevented by the sudden rising of the house, on the 3rd of March, which was adjourned to the tenth of the same month. In the intermediate space, Denzil Hollis, esq; sir Miles Hobart, sir John Elliot, sir Peter Hayman, John Selden, William Coriton, Walter Long, William Stroude, and Benjamin Valentine, esqs; were ordered to appear before the cooncil. Mr. Hollis, sir John Elliot, Mr. Coriton, and Mr. Valentine, attended; but refusing to answer out of parliament, they were committed close prisoners to the Tower. Warrants were at the same time issued for apprehending the rest, and for sealing up their studies (a).

On the tenth of March, the king came to the house of lords, where, without the ceremony of calling the commons to the bar, he dissolved the parliament (b). In the speech he made on this occasion, he called the party in the opposition vipers; bestowed great praises on his own adherents, and particularly on the house of lords, whom he commended for a dutiful demeanour. Indeed, the behaviour of this body had been so pacific and inoffensive, that in the whole course of this session, during the spirited exertions of the commons, their proceedings had been wholly confined to the framing a petition, concerning the old grievances of precedency to Scotch and Irish titles. This, they alledged, tended not only to the disservice and prejudice of his majesty, but his realms. Charles sent a civil denial to the petition; and these important pretensions continued yet undetermined (c).

Amongst the animated measures of the lower house that dignify the proceedings of this session, the warm debates which the commons had entered into on those innovations in the doctrines and forms of religion which had been introduced by Laud, Neile, Manwaring, and other bigoted priests, has been severely censured by sensible and candid writers. Had this circumstance been examined with that accuracy which the importance of it demands, these active patriots, who, to serve the best purposes, metamorphosed themselves into mere gownmen, would not only have been justified from acting on the narrow principles of religious bigotry, but would, from this exertion of their theological talents, appear possessed of an essential qualification necessary to form able legislators. Superstition, that weakness inseparable from the mind of man, has, from the first period of time, been the quality the most fatally instrumental in degrading his nature to an abject, yet willing dependence, on the creature of his own rank; and overturning divine and moral law, has fixed an acknowledged inferiority where God has marked equality. Every established form of worship has, for these reasons, been subordinate to the purposes of policy; and the engine religion been used with never-failing success to enslave the many to the few, and to fix on the firm basis of conscience, tyrannies irreconcileable to the wisdom of God, the dignity of human nature, and the welfare of mankind. Modes of faith powerfully operate on every government; and the ecclesiastical constitution of a country has an irresistible influence on the political. We must consider, therefore, these illustrious patriots as combating errors, which, however trivial they may appear on a slight view, yet carried with them alarming consequences to liberty. The essential points of faith in Arminianism or Puritanism had in them nothing repugnant to the freedom of the English constitution; but the followers of the former were studiously bent to exalt the power of churchmen, and were wedded to those forms and ceremonies that degrade the pure spirit of religion into an idolatrous worship of the objects of sense; and convert that contemplation of the Creator, which elevates, refines, and enlarges the human mind, into an implicit subjection to the interested opinions of men. In these respects, the innovations which the Arminians were daily making in the religious worship, was a proper object of parliamentary enquiry; and the discipline of the church was in its consequences too important to be trusted to the direction of a prince who had, like Charles, evidently manifested an inclination to exalt the sovereignty, not only beyond the spirit, but the forms of the constitution. In the first progress of the reformation, those monarchies that had adopted the speculative doctrine of the reformed churches, retained a great deal of that pomp of worship essential to the Popish superstition, and agreeable to the pampered senses of princes: neither had they relinquished subordination, nor that ecclesiastical servitude, that resignation of private judgement, which is so favourable to civil tyranny. This was the state of church-government in England after the Reformation had taken place; and it strengthened the tyranny of the crown, by flinging into the scale of regal power that absolute and unlimited jurisdiction which had been wrested from the bishop of Rome.

Those refugees who had taken shelter in the Low Countries from the persecution of Mary, brought with them, on their return to England at the accession of Elizabeth, more enlarged and independent notions than were agreeable to the views of this arbitrary princess; and she made use of that confidence the Protestants placed in her, and their fears of popery, to erect anew the court of High Commission. In the thirty-fifth year of her reign, she so entirely mastered a pusillanimous parliament, as to get an act passed, that all persons above the age of sixteen, who were absent from church a month, or who by word or writing declared their sentiments against the established religion, should be imprisoned till they made an open declaration of their conformity. This if they refused during three months, they were to abjure the realm; and if they either refused such abjurations, or staid in England beyond the time limited, they were to suffer as felons, without benefit of clergy. Thus she involved the Romanists and Dissenters under the title of Recusants.

The natural good sense of the people of England, strengthened by an increase of knowledge, could not long languish under this diabolical tyranny, without seeking a remedy from the powers of the constitution: and in James's first parliament, the lower house passed a bill against the establishment of any ecclesiastical canons without consent of lords and commons. The higher house, more open to James's cajolements, rejected the bill. Notwithstanding this discouragement, the active vigilant spirit of the commons exerted itself during the reign of this prince in such a vigorous opposition to the spiritual jurisdiction of the crown, that this exertion, with the mild conduct of archbishop Abbot, and several other rational and amiable prelates, enabled men openly to assert the natural right of exercising their reason. The literary disputes this occasioned brought over great numbers to the cause of freedom. Charles and his priesthood endeavour-

(a) The following are the interrogatories and answers that passed on this occasion at the council-board:

Mr. Hollis was asked, why he, contrary to his former use, did that morning that the tumult was in the lower house of parliament, place himself above divers of the privy-counsellors by the chair? He answered, that he at some other times as well as then seated himself in that place; and as for his sitting above the privy-counsellors, he took it to be his due in any place whatsoever, unless at the council-board; that he came into the house with zeal to do his majesty service; yet finding his majesty was now offended with him, he humbly desired, that he might rather be the subject of his mercy than his power. You mean rather of his majesty's mercy than his justice, answered the lord-treasurer. I say, of his majesty's power, replied Mr. Hollis.

Sir John Elliot was questioned, whether he had not spoken such and such words in the lower house of parliament? and shewed unto the said house such and such a paper? He answered, that whatsoever was said or done by him in that place, and at that time, was performed by him as a public man, and a member of that house; that he was, and always would be, ready to give an account of his sayings and doings in that place, whensoever he should be called unto it by that house; where, as he took it, he was only to be questioned.

Sir Miles Hobart being interrogated concerning his demeanour in the lower house of parliament, and for shutting the door? answered, that he desired to know by what warrant he was examined to give an account in that place of his actions in parliament, being a member. He believed it was a course without a precedent. That no council nor commission could take notice of any thing done in parliament, but a parliament itself. Nevertheless, he would not stick to confess, that it was he that shut the door that day, and when he had locked the door, he put the key in his pocket; and he did it because the house demanded it.

Sir Peter Hayman was asked, why he reproved the speaker so sharply? He answered, because he was the speaker, and so the servant of the house, and one that ought to have applied himself to the command of the house; he did it with the more freedom and detestation, because he was his countryman; but yet should have done it to any other man, that in the same kind should have deserved it as he did. On being farther demanded, what he would have done himself on being speaker, and commanded by the king to deliver such a message? he answered, he would have thrown himself at his majesty's feet, and having given his majesty to understand that, in respect of his office, he was the most improper and unfit person of any to deliver such a message; he would have most humbly supplicated his majesty to have elected some other to have performed that part. Parl. Hist. vol. viii. p. 354, & seq.

The parliament was not dissolved when these members were committed to the Tower. Rushworth.

ed to restrain the subjects in that liberty they had exercised during the reign of James, and demanded a rigid conformity to ceremonies which had been long laid aside, and which were at this time peculiarly noxious to the religious opinions of the greatest part of the nation.

It was to these pretences that the commons in this session opposed themselves with the joint force of reason and eloquence; and shewed that the ecclesiastical authority Charles claimed, the use of which he had already given a disagreeable specimen of, had been all granted by parliament; that it must be subordinate to the power that created it, and the abuse of it liable to be corrected, and farther limited, by the after-resolutions of that assembly. The contempt which the abettors of tyranny affected to shew for the house of commons, had irritated this illustrious assembly, in several instances, into an undue exertion of their authority. They censured Lewis, Witherington, and one Burgess, a priest, for trifling verbal offences.

Sir John Eppesly, a member of the commons, desired leave to answer a complaint against him in the higher house. Mr. Selden objected, that such a concession would affect the privilege of the commons; that until the 18th of king James there had never been such a precedent (d). The chancellor of the duchy and secretary Cook, though two consummate courtiers, seconded Mr. Selden's motion. Secretary Cook said, "I am as careful to maintain a good correspondency with the lords as any man; but connivancy in this kind may overthrow the fundamental rights and privileges of the house: let it therefore be seriously considered of; for this not only concerneth the right of this house, but the liberty of the whole commonwealth." The result of this debate was, that sir John Eppesly should not have leave to answer.

The commons took into consideration a petition against lord Lambert, a member of their house; who being a colonel, had imposed four-pence on every soldier towards his officers' charges. The petitioner refusing to pay, was first set in the stocks, and after, by the lord Lambert, committed to a public prison. Amongst the number of complaints that were brought before the commons this session, one was preferred against the lord-deputy of Ireland and others, for appropriating the estate of the petitioner to their own uses (e).

The violence used to the house of commons, and the commitment of the members during the sitting of parliament, were outrages resulting from the determinations taken previous to its meeting, by the interested individuals that composed the cabinet and privy-councils. Of this noxious tribe, Laud, Neile, and Weston, the treasurer, had most to dread from the ensuing session. Laud, in his Diary, tells us, that the parliament broken up March 10th laboured his ruin. Weston was particularly marked by sir John Elliot as the object of an intended prosecution. The court-parasites every where declaimed against the house of commons, as an assembly of pragmatical, factious demagogues; and the noble sentiments of liberty, which had animated their proceedings, were not at this time so generally diffused as to affect the public with a consternation equal to their imminent danger, in being exposed to the unrestrained power of a projecting, wicked ministry. It is affirmed, that the courtiers at first were successful in their endeavours, to make the common people believe, that the commons were the aggressors, after the king had passed the Petition of Right. Notwithstanding this discouragement, together with the loss of sir Edward Coke, through disability from age and infirmities, and sir Thomas Wentworth, through the means of bribery, the opposition kept firm. They were composed of the greatest men England ever produced; well-founded in their principles; possessed of almost all the polite learning that was in the nation; intrepid in their conduct, from a conviction of the goodness of their cause; united in their counsels, from the sincerity of their intentions; and not to be diverted by any difficulties from pursuing the laudable end they aimed at.

Some people of the lower sort, warm in the interest of the party, a few days after the dissolution of parliament, threw two papers into the dean of St. Paul's yard; one against Laud, to this effect: "Laud, look to thyself; be assured thy life is sought, as thou art the fountain of all wickedness. Repent of thy monstrous sins before thou be taken out of the world; and assure thyself, neither God nor the world can endure so vile a counsellor or whisperer to live." The other, against the treasurer Weston, was to the same purport.

Charles attempted to vindicate to the public his violent conduct in a declaration, setting forth his reasons for dissolving the parliament. They were full of assertions of his upright intentions, without reconciling one of his measures to the principles of the constitution, or the Petition of Right; replete with abusive accusations of the patriotic party in the lower house; whilst the matter of the accusations shews, that the grievances of the nation could no otherwise be redressed than by the spirited exertion which it condemns. He acknowledges, that tonnage and poundage was ever enjoyed by the authority of parliament, and yet it was agreeable to his kingly honour to take it without that authority. The commons were charged with not obeying the adjournment immediately, and the king's power in that point supposed to be incontestable (f). There is no mention of the immediate cause of their non-compliance; which was, a manifest breach of the freedom of parliament, in the speaker's refusing, by the king's express command, to put the question. The declaration finishes with an assurance of good government; but that to depend on the king, and not in the strength, vigour, and goodness of the laws, to oppose a bad one. If Charles's most inveterate enemy had penned an acrimonious libel on his administration, it could not more fully have served the purpose of sowing the seeds of discontent, jealousy, and resentment, than this impolitic endeavour to reconcile the minds of the people to his pretensions.

The commons not having been called up, on the dissolution of the parliament, a proclamation was issued to give notice to the lords spiritual and temporal, knights, citizens, burgesses, and others concerned in the parliament, that they might depart about their needful affairs, without attending any longer in London. The declaration setting forth the reasons for dissolving the parliament had an effect so different from its intended purpose, that the people murmured highly for another; and said, if there was not one presently called, all things would be unsettled, and out of order. On this a proclamation was issued for suppressing such discourses; that it was presumption in any (d) The case that Mr. Selden refers to is the trial of sir Giles Mompesson, a member of the house of commons.

(e) The following black transaction will serve as a specimen of the kind of barbarity and injustice practised at this time in the kingdom of Ireland. Sir Richard Graham, an officer in the army, got possession of part of the lands of Phelim Mac Pheagh Byrne, lord of the Byrne's territory. On commissioners having been appointed by James to examine into this affair, Graham put a stop to their proceedings by undertaking to prove, that the crown was entitled to the lands; and a commission was easily obtained, that empowered him, and others in his interest, to enquire into the said pretended title. Sir William Parsons got the lord-deputy's warrant to put him in possession of part of the lands, and sued Bryan, the son of Phelim, in the Exchequer for those of which he still retained the possession. Bryan maintaining his right, he and his brother, on the information of suborned witnesses, were, on March 13, 1623, committed close prisoners to Dublin-castle. One of these having refused to be an evidence, was cruelly tortured till he consented to accuse the two brothers. On the information of these witnesses, two bills were preferred against them. Two several grand-juries, not finding the bills, were prosecuted in the Star-chamber, and fined. On king Charles's sending an order to the lord-deputy to pass the lands to Phelim and his son, a new prosecution was set on foot. The two brothers were committed close prisoners to the Castle of Dublin, loaded with irons, without any diet from the crown, or leave for any friend to visit and relieve them. The whole family was involved in one common accusation of keeping company with, and relieving Marrogh Baccogh Kevenah, who had been engaged in a rebellion. Eight men, who had incurred the penalty of the law, were the witnesses. A grand-jury, consisting of men interested in the prosecution, was impanelled to try Phelim and his family. They found the bill; yet other witnesses were necessary to the trial of the parties: to obtain these very illegal powers were exerted. People were tried and condemned by martial law, at a time when the courts of justice were sitting: some of these were executed, and publicly declared, that they came to that fate because they could not accuse Phelim and his sons. The friends of the persecuted gentlemen made application in their behalf to the king and council in England: the chief of these friends who thus interposed was sir Francis Annesly, afterwards lord Mountnorris. And this is the ground of the imputation laid upon him by Clarendon, of being an enemy to the deputies of Ireland. A commission was directed to the lord-primate of Ireland, the lord-chancellor, the archbishop of Dublin, the lord-chief-justice, and sir Arthur Savage, who taking the depositions of a great number of witnesses, the truth of the above-mentioned circumstances fully appeared. This restored the gentlemen to their liberty, but not to their estates; a considerable part whereof had been, during their imprisonment, passed to sir William Parsons, by a patent dated the 4 August, 4 Car. Carte's Hist. of the Life of James, Duke of Ormond, fol. 1736. p. 27, & seq.

(f) The power of adjourning, though it had not been formerly disputed, was a point of privilege that the commons had by no means given up to the crown: their right had been asserted by several of the popular members, and never contradicted by a resolution of the house. That great oracle, sir Edward Coke, affirmed, that the king prorogued, but the house adjourned itself.

to prescribe any time to his majesty for parliaments, the calling, continuing, and dissolving them, being always in the king's own power; that his majesty will be more inclinable to meet his parliament again, when his people shall see more clearly into his intentions and actions; when such as have bred this interruption shall receive their condign punishment, and those who are mis-led by them, and such ill reports as are raised upon this occasion, shall come to a better understanding of his majesty and themselves (g).

Charles was now determined to govern entirely by his council, and to raise money by his prerogative. To justify his proceedings against the imprisoned and absconded members, the judges were assembled on the 25th of April, 1629, and certain resolutions extorted from them, calculated not only to justify the proceedings of the ministry, but to awe any future parliament from disputing the will of the court. Judge Whitelock, notwithstanding that he gave his assent with the rest of his brethren, said, if Laud went on to get previous determinations to justify all his arbitrary measures, he would kindle a flame in the nation. Chambers, for the words he had spoken at the council-board, that the merchants in England were more screwed up than in Turkey, was fined in the Star-chamber two thousand pounds, and to acknowledge his offences at the council-board, the Star-chamber bar, and the Exchange. Notwithstanding his plea that these words were only spoken in the presence of the privy-council, and not abroad to stir up discord amongst the people, and with no other view than to introduce his just complaints against the inferior officers, the fine was thought very moderate by this court: some of the members voted it to be three thousand pounds; of this number was bishop Laud. When the draught of the submission was read to Chambers, he thus subscribed it: "All the abovesaid contents and submissions, I Richard Chambers, do utterly abhor and detest, as most unjust and false; and never till death will acknowledge any part thereof (h)." Chambers put in a plea in the court of Exchequer against paying the fine; that the said fine was imposed by the king and the council, and not by a legal judgement of his peers, nor by the laws of the land, nor according to the manner of his offence, nor saving his merchandize, &c. To this plea he annexed a petition to the lord chief baron, and the other barons, humbly desiring the filing the plea, with other reasons, in the manner of a motion at the bar, because council would not move, plead, nor set hand to it. On the representation of Mr. Attorney, that this plea was frivolous, insufficient, and derogatory to the honour and jurisdiction of the Star-chamber, the court over-ruled it, and the petitioner was imprisoned six years for not submitting to the sentence of the court.

On Easter-Term Mr. Stroud and Mr. Long, two of the imprisoned members, brought their Habeas Corpus to be admitted to bail. The judges, intimidated by a warrant the king had sent under his own hand for their detention, remanded them; but before the next term they sent a letter to the king, in which they represented, that by their oaths they were to bail the prisoners; but thought fit, before they did it, or published their opinions therein, to inform his majesty thereof, and humbly to advise him, as had been done by his noble progenitors in the like case, to send a direction to his justices of the bench to bail the prisoners. Charles told the judges, that he was dissatisfied with the contents of their letter, and ordered them to take no step in bailing the prisoners till they had advised with the judges of the other benches. During this delay, the prisoners were removed into other prisons; the king sending a letter to the judges to acquaint them, that the removal was occasioned by their insolent carriage at the bar of the Star-chamber, and at the bar of the King's-Bench.

It was not till Michaelmas-Term following, that Charles was brought to consent that the prisoners should be bailed, provided they gave security for their good behaviour. This was a point of law in favour of the crown, which Mr. Selden, with a spirit truly magnanimous, refused to assent to; since giving bail for good behaviour was a punishment, and implied an offence, that yet remained to be tried and proved (i). The rest of the prisoners, animated by Mr. Selden's example, determined to defend this constitutional point, at the expence of their personal liberties. On their refusal to find bail for their good behaviour, they were remanded to the Tower, and an information lodged against them in the King's-Bench for sedition and contempt; and against Mr. Long, for that he, being chosen sheriff of the county of Wilts, and by his oath to keep within his county, unless he had the king's licence to the contrary, yet he did come to parliament, and serve as a member there, and in the time of parliament resided out of his county (k). All the parties under prosecution excepted to the jurisdiction of the court. This exception in the case of Long was treated as a derogation of the jurisdiction of the court: he was sentenced to be committed to the Tower, there to remain during the king's pleasure, to pay a fine of two thousand marks to the king's use, and to make humble submission and acknowledgement of his offence, both in the court of Star-chamber and to the king, before his enlargement.

To the other exceptions against the jurisdiction of the court, notwithstanding that the council for the prisoners had proved, that there never was a precedent of such offences having been punished in that court, where any plea was put in, the judges agreed, that the court had jurisdiction, though the offences were committed in parliament; and that the members imprisoned ought to answer. They still refusing to plead before the court, the following judgement was given against them upon a Nihil Dicit: "That every of the defendants shall be imprisoned during the king's pleasure. Sir John Elliot to be imprisoned in the Tower of London, and the other defendants in other prisons. That none of them shall be delivered out of prison, until he give security in this court for his good behaviour, and have made submission and acknowledgement of his offence. Sir John Elliot, inasmuch as we think him the greatest offender and ring-leader, shall pay to the king a fine of two thousand pounds; Mr. Hollis a fine of two thousand marks; and Mr. Valentine, because he is of less ability than the rest, shall pay a fine of five hundred pounds."

The imprisonment of these illustrious sufferers was long, their treatment under confinement rigorous and cruel: they were denied the use of pen and ink, and, even in their sicknesses, all communication with their wives and families. Under these oppressions died sir John Elliot. It is the peculiar duty of history to do justice to injured and aspersed virtue. The merits of sir John Elliot demand a particular attention, as the first martyr to the cause of liberty. In his public life, he always appeared as an independent agent for the people, a faithful trustee of that sacred charge committed to a representative by his constituents, an intrepid assertor of the privileges of parliament, and a zealous defender of the liberty of the subject; determined in his opposition to the unconstitutional pretensions of the crown, and the arrogant and dangerous encroachments of favourites and ministers. By this steady, manly conduct, he gained so much of the esteem and confidence of the public, that from 1618 to 1628 he was always elected a knight of his county, or a burgess for some borough therein, to serve in all parliaments. He possessed a bold, spirited, and nervous elocution, a lively imagination, and ready wit (l). He was a more forward

(g) The courtiers were so emboldened by the king's openly avowing an intention to call no parliaments till the people were rendered submissive to his will, that one Atkinson having sued a servant of the king, the earl of Montgomery, the lord-chamberlain, committed him for having done it without his leave. Atkinson was delivered on his Habeas Corpus; and that very day Montgomery again committed him, in contempt of the court. Hyde denied to grant a warrant for another Habeas Corpus, but it was obtained from the rest of the judges. Before its return, Atkinson was discharged from prison. Whitlock, p. 13.

(h) The substance of the submission was as follows: That Richard Chambers having been convened before the lords and others of his majesty's most honourable privy council board, did then and there, in insolent, contemptuous, and seditious manner, falsely and maliciously say and affirm, &c. Rushworth, vol. i. p. 672.

(i) The judges, to prevail with the prisoners to assent to this illegal demand, assured them, that one bail should suffice, and all should be written on one piece of parchment. They were every one so resolute in their denial, that when Asbly, the king's serjeant, offered his own bail for Mr. Hollis, who had married his daughter and heiress, the court was obliged to reject it, because Mr. Hollis refused to be bound in the obligation. Baker's Chronicle, p. 445. Rushworth, vol. i. p. 687.

(k) It is said, that when Mr. Long's council pleaded ancient records to exempt members of parliament from the jurisdiction of that court in matters concerning the parliament, that bishop Horsnet replied, "Don't trouble us with moth-eaten precedents; we sit here not to be guided by precedents, but to make them."

(l) There is in the British Museum a very valuable MSS. numb. 2228. entitled, "The Monarchy of Man, a treatise philosophical and moral, composed by Sir John Elliot," whilst a prisoner in the Tower. The same spirit of liberty, the same just notions of government, animated the writer as animated the orator. After asserting, from Theodosius and other authorities, that kings are subject to laws, he observes, "It is their majesty, their honour, their exaltation, so to be: the reason is, that the law is the ground of all authority; all authority and rule dependent on the law."

leader of opposition than any of his contemporaries, and the most daring champion for the public cause.

There now opens to us a new scene. Charles, disgusted with parliaments, resolved not to call any more, as we have before said, till he should see greater indications of a compliant disposition in the nation. Having lost his great favourite, Buckingham, he became, in some measure, his own minister; the general tenour of his administration therefore wanted much of being entirely legal, and perhaps more of being entirely prudent.

We shall endeavour to exhibit a just idea of the events which followed for some years; so far as they regard foreign affairs, the state of the court, and the government of the nation. The incidents are neither numerous nor illustrious; but the knowledge of them is necessary for understanding the subsequent transactions, which occasioned so great a change of affairs, particularly in this country.

Charles, destitute of all supply, was reduced to the necessity of embracing a measure, which ought to have been the result of reason and sound policy: he made peace with the two crowns against which he had hitherto waged a war, entered into without necessity, and conducted without glory. Notwithstanding the distracted and helpless condition of England, no attempt was made either by France or Spain, to invade their enemy; nor did they entertain any farther project, than to defend themselves against the feeble and ill-concerted expeditions of that kingdom. Pleased that the jealousies and quarrels between king and parliament had disarmed so formidable a power, they avoided any enterprize which might rouse either the terror or anger of the English, and dispose them to domestic union and submission. The endeavours to regain the good-will of the nation were carried so far by the king of Spain, that he released and sent home all the English prisoners taken in the expedition against Cadiz. The example was imitated by France, after the retreat of the English from the isle of Rhé. When princes were in such dispositions, and had so few pretensions on each other, it could not be difficult to conclude a peace. The treaty was first signed with France, on the 14th of April, 1629; but he neglected the distressed Hugonots, and they were abandoned to the will of their sovereign. Peace was afterwards concluded with Spain (on the 5th of November, 1630;) and no conditions were made in favour of the Palatine, except that Spain promised in general to use their good offices for his restoration. The influence of these two wars on domestic affairs, and on the dispositions of king and people, was of the utmost consequence; but no alteration was made by them on the foreign interests of the kingdom.

Europe was now divided between the rival families of Bourbon and Austria, whose opposite interests, and still more their mutual jealousies, secured the tranquillity of this island. Their forces were so nearly equipoised, that no apprehensions were entertained of any event which could suddenly disturb the balance of power between them. The Spanish monarch, deemed the most powerful, lay at the greatest distance; and the English, by that means, possessed the advantage of being engaged by political motives into a more intimate union and confederacy with France. The dispersed situation of the Spanish dominions rendered the naval power of England formidable to them, and kept that empire in continual apprehension. France, more vigorous and more compact, was every day rising in policy and discipline; and reached, at last, an equality of power with the house of Austria: but her progress, slow and gradual, left it still in the power of England, by a timely interposition, to check her superiority. And thus Charles, could he have avoided all dissensions with his own subjects, was in a situation to make himself be courted and respected by every power in Europe; and, what has scarcely ever since been attained by the princes of this island, he could either be active with dignity, or neutral with security.

A neutrality between the rival powers of France and Austria was embraced by the king; and, during the rest of his reign, he seems to have little regarded foreign affairs, except so far as he was engaged by honour, and by friendship for his sister and the Palatine, to endeavour the procuring of some relief for that unhappy family. He joined his good offices to those of France, and mediated a peace between the kings of Sweden (m) and Poland, in hopes of engaging the former to embrace the protection of the oppressed Protestants in the empire. To encourage and assist Gustavus in his projected invasion of Germany, Charles agreed to furnish him with six thousand men; but, that he might preserve the appearance of neutrality, he made use of the marquis of Hamilton's name. That nobleman entered into an engagement with Gustavus; and enlisting these troops in England and Scotland at Charles's expence, he landed them in the Elbe. The decisive battle of Leipsic was fought soon after; where the conduct of count Tilly and the valour of the Imperialists was overcome by the superior conduct of Gustavus and the valour of the Swedes. What remained of this hero's life was one continued series of victory. Military nations were not now engaged against an undisciplined and unwarlike people; nor heroes set in opposition to cowards. The veteran troops of Ferdinand, conducted by the most celebrated generals, of the age, were foiled in every encounter, and all Germany was over-run in an instant by the victorious Swede. But by this extraordinary and unexpected success of his ally, Charles failed of the purpose for which he framed the alliance. Gustavus, elated by prosperity, began to form more extensive plans of ambition; and in freeing Germany from the yoke of Ferdinand, he intended to reduce it to subjection under his own. He refused to restore the Palatine to his principality, except on conditions which would have kept him in total dependence. And thus the negociation was protracted; till the battle of Lutzen, where the Swedish monarch perished in the midst of a complete victory which he obtained over his enemies. We have carried on these transactions a few years beyond the present period, that we might not be obliged to return to them; nor be henceforth interrupted in our account of Charles's court and kingdoms.

After the death of Buckingham, who had somewhat alienated Charles from the queen, she is to be considered as his chief friend and favourite. That rustic contempt of the fair sex, which James affected, and which, banishing them from his court, made it resemble more a fair or an exchange, than the seat of a great prince, was very wide of the disposition of this monarch. But though full of complaisance to the whole sex, Charles reserved all his passion for his consort, to whom he attached himself with unshaken fidelity and confidence. By her sense and spirit, as well as by her beauty, she justified the fondness of her husband; though it is allowed, that, being somewhat of a passionate temper, she precipitated him into hasty and imprudent measures. Her religion, likewise, to which she was much addicted, must be regarded as a great misfortune; since it augmented the jealousy which prevailed against the court, and engaged her to procure for the Catholics some indulgences which were generally distasteful to the nation.

In the former situation of the English government, when the sovereign was in a great measure independent of his subjects, the king chose his ministers either from personal favour, or from an opinion of their abilities, without any regard to their parliamentary interest or talents. It has since been the maxim of princes, wherever popular leaders encroach too much on royal authority, to confer offices on them; in expectation that they will afterwards become more careful not to diminish that power which has become their own. These politics were now embraced by Charles; a sure proof that a secret revolution had happened in the constitution, and had necessitated the prince to adopt new maxims of government. But the views of the king were at this time so repugnant to those of the Puritans, that the leaders, whom he gained, lost from that moment all interest with their party, and were even pursued as traitors with implacable resentment. This was the case with sir Thomas Wentworth, whom the king created first a baron, then a viscount, and afterwards earl of Strafford; made him president of the council of York, and deputy of Ireland; and regarded him as his chief minister and counsellor. Sir Dudley Digges was about the same time created master of the rolls: Noy, attorney-general: Littleton, solicitor-general. All these had likewise been parliamentary leaders; and were men eminent in their profession.

In all ecclesiastical affairs, and even in many civil, Laud, bishop of London, had great influence over the king. Bishop Laud was the person who acquired so great an ascendant over Charles, and who led him into a conduct which proved so fatal to himself and to his kingdoms.

The temper of the nation was now very different from what it was formerly; the ceremonies of the church were deemed relics of popish superstition; and it was with difficulty that these ceremonies could be retained in divine service: yet was this the time which Laud chose for the introduction of new ceremonies and observances. Besides that these were sure to displease as innovations, there lay, in the opinion of the public, another very forcible objection against them. Laud, and the other prelates who embraced his measures, were generally well instructed in sacred antiquity, and had adopted many of those religious sentiments which prevailed during the fourth and fifth centuries; when the Christian church, as is well known, was already sunk into those superstitions which were afterwards continued and augmented by the policy of the Roman pontiffs. The revival, therefore, of the ideas and practices of that age, could not fail of giving the English faith and liturgy some resemblance to the Catholic superstition, which the kingdom in general, and the Puritans in particular, held in the greatest horror and detestation. Men also were apt to think, that, without some secret purpose, such insignificant observances would not be imposed with such unrelenting zeal on the refractory nation; and that Laud's scheme was to lead back the English by gradual steps to the religion of the church of Rome; in which perhaps they were not mistaken; for Laud and his brethren bore a much greater kindness to the mother-church, as it was called, than to the sectaries and presbyterians, and frequently recommended her as a true Christian church; an appellation which they refused, or at least scrupled to give to the others. So openly were these tenets espoused, that not only the Puritans believed the church of England to be relapsing fast into Romish superstition, but the court of Rome itself entertained hopes of regaining its authority in this island; and, in order to forward Laud's supposed good intentions, an offer was twice made him in private, of a cardinal's hat, which he declined accepting. His answer was, as he says himself, "That something dwelt within him, which would not suffer his compliance, till Rome were other than it is."

A court lady, daughter of the earl of Devonshire, having turned Catholic, was asked by Laud the reasons of her conversion "'Tis chiefly," said she, "because I hate to travel in a crowd." The meaning of this expression being demanded, she replied, "I perceive your grace and many others are making haste to Rome; and therefore, in order to prevent my being crowded, I have gone before you." It must be confessed, that though Laud deserved not the strict appellation of papist, the genius of his religion was, though in a less degree, the same with that of the Romish: the same profound respect was exacted to the sacerdotal character, the same submission required to the creeds and decrees of synods and councils, the same pomp and ceremony was affected in worship, and the same superstitious regard to days, postures, meats, and vestments. No wonder, therefore, that this prelate was, every where, among the Puritans, regarded with horror, as the fore-runner of antichrist.

As a specimen of the new ceremonies, to which Laud sacrificed his own quiet and that of the nation, it may not be amiss to relate those which he was accused of employing in the consecration of the church of St. Katherine Cree, which had been newly built by the parishioners, and for some time profanely made use of for religious offices, without the ceremony of a new consecration. This coming to the pious prelate's ears, he suspended it from all divine service till he had performed this office, which he did with much solemnity, to the surprize of an infinite number of spectators, who were ignorant of the necessity of such a ceremony. The communion table was removed from the middle of the area, where it had hitherto stood in all the churches, except in cathedrals: it was placed in the east end, and denominated an altar. It is difficult to imagine how violent the zeal of this man was to introduce these kind of innovations. In administering the sacrament, kneeling at the altar, and using copes were rigorously insisted on; the crucifix resumed its consequence; and the churches were ornamented with pictures that were to be found in the mass books.

On the bishop's approach to the west door of the church, several loud voices, previously prepared, cried, "Open, open, ye everlasting doors, that the king of glory may come in!" Immediately the doors of the church flew open, and the bishop entered. Falling upon his knees, with eyes elevated, and arms expanded, he uttered these words: "This place is holy; the ground is holy: in the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, I pronounce it holy." Going towards the chancel, he several times took up from the floor some of the dust, and threw it in the air. When he approached, with his attendants, near to the communion-table, he bowed frequently towards it; and on their return, they went round the church in procession, repeating as they marched along, the hundredth psalm, then the nineteenth psalm; and then said a form of prayer, which concluded with these words: "We consecrate this church, and separate it unto thee as holy ground, not to be profaned any more to common uses." After this, the bishop, standing near the communion-table, solemnly pronounced many imprecations upon such as should afterwards pollute that holy place by musters of soldiers, or keeping in it profane law courts, or carrying burdens through it. On the conclusion of every curse he bowed towards the east, and cried, "Let all the people say, Amen." The imprecations being all so piously finished, there were poured out a number of blessings upon such as had any hand in framing and building that sacred and beautiful edifice, and on such as had given, or should hereafter give to it, any chalices, plate, ornaments, or utensils. At every benediction, he in like manner bowed towards the east, and cried, "Let all the people say, Amen." The sermon followed: after which, the bishop consecrated and administered the sacrament in the following manner: as he approached the communion-table, he made many lowly reverences; and coming up to that part of the table where the bread and wine were placed, he bowed seven times. After the reading of many prayers, he approached the sacramental elements, and gently lifted up the corner of the napkin in which the bread was laid. When he beheld the bread, he suddenly let fall the napkin, flew back a step or two, bowed three several times towards the bread; then he drew nigh again, opened the napkin, and bowed as before. Next he laid his hand on the cup, which had a cover upon it, and was filled with wine. He let go the cup, fell back, and bowed thrice towards it. He approached again; and lifting up the cover, peeped into the cup. Seeing the wine, he let fall the cover, started back, and bowed as before. Then he received the sacrament, and administered it to others. And many prayers being said, the solemnity of the consecration ended. The walls and floor and roof of the fabric were then supposed to be sufficiently holy (n).

It is not easy to imagine the discontents excited by this innovation of bishop Laud, and the suspicions which it gave rise to. The kneeling at the altar, and the using of copes, a species of embroidered vestment, in administering the sacrament, were also known to be great objects of scandal, because they were practices of the church of Rome; but the opposition rather increased than abated the zeal of the prelate for the introduction of these habits and ceremonies.

All kinds of ornament, especially pictures, were necessary for supporting that mechanical appearance of devotion, which was proposed to be raised by this shew of solemnity: but as these had been so much employed by the church of Rome, and had given rise to so much superstition, or what the Puritans judiciously called idolatry; it was impossible to introduce them into English churches, without exciting general murmurs and complaints. But Laud, possessed of present authority, persisted in his purpose, and made several attempts towards acquiring these ostentatious ornaments. Some of the pictures introduced by him were also found, upon enquiry, to be the very same that might be met with in the mass-book. The crucifix too, that eternal consolation of all pious Catholics, and terror to all sound Protestants, was not forgotten on this occasion.

Sherfield, the recorder of Salisbury, was prosecuted in the Star-chamber for having, in the windows of St. Edmund's church in that city, destroyed, by an order of the vestry, some panes of painted glass that represented the creation. To the information lodged against him in this court, he argued, that the church was a lay-fee, exempted from from the jurisdiction of the bishop of the diocese; and that the parishioners had lawful power, without special licence from the bishop, to take down the glass of the window, and repair it with white glass. He farther pleaded, that the window was not fair and costly, as the information set forth, but of very rude work; that it was of four lights only, and not any of the fair windows in the church. He denied the riotous breaking of the window: he took a few small quarries of it down, in a quiet and peaceable manner; that it was not a true history of the creation, but a false description of the same, wretchedly executed; that the painter, to express God the Father, had painted the forms and pictures of divers little old men, seeming barefooted, and cloathed in long blue coats; that he held it ungodly, and altogether unlawful, to frame any image or similitude of God the Father, Creator of heaven and earth, and the first person in the Holy Trinity; that this his belief was the doctrine of the church of England, established by act of parliament in 13 Eliz.; that according to an act of parliament, 1 of this queen's reign, injunctions were published, whereby all that had cure of souls were commanded to instruct their parishioners to destroy pictures and monuments of idolatry and superstition, that no memory thereof might remain in walls, glass windows, or elsewhere; that it was to be enquired of in the visitations whether all images, pictures, paintings, and other monuments of idolatry, were removed; and that these injunctions being grounded on the statute of the 1 Eliz. were yet in force. Notwithstanding this plea, the court pronounced sentence, That Mr. Sherfield should be fined five hundred pounds, and removed from his office; that he should repair to the lord bishop of his diocese, and make acknowledgement of his offence and contempt, before such persons as the bishop should call unto him; and that he should be bound to his good behaviour.

Bishop Laud, who was very vigilant in this prosecution, made a long speech, in which he endeavoured to prove, that the custom of setting up images was not only inoffensive but laudable. "God the Father, in the prophet Daniel, was called the Ancient of Days; and images had been used in the earliest times of the church. However that might be, the act which Mr. Sherfield had committed was highly criminal, because done in contempt, or at least in neglect, of the authority of the church. If it had been the idol of Jupiter, and the people had professed divine worship to it, it would have been criminal in Mr. Sherfield to deface it, without lawful authority, as could be proved from scripture." Laud complained, that there had been many insolencies committed in that church: a bishop's bones had been taken up, and all to bury a tanner's wife. Mr. Sherfield had been guilty of breaking a consecrated thing: it pleased God to give him a fall upon the place; yet these things had not wrought him to confession that he had done amiss. Laud finished his harangue with prophesying, that the time would come in this kingdom when all those who despised the church would be brought low.—Neile, archbishop of York, made an elogium on the use of images and the crucifix; he reprimanded the defendants for asserting, that the authority queen Elizabeth had to reform, and set forth her injunctions, were given her by parliament: the statute of the first of Elizabeth, he said, was but an act declaratory, not to be taken as if the queen, without it, had no power to meddle with the things of the church. He that said, "Per me reges regnant," that is, "By me kings reign," giveth this authority to the king.

Lord Cottington gave a severe sentence against Sherfield, as did the lord Arundel, who alledged, that it was not unlawful to express God the Father by representation. The earl of Dorset said, that in the text of Daniel was meant God from eternity, and not God to be pictured like an old man, creating the world with a pair of compasses. He and all the temporal members, who differed from the prelates in this sentence, made many professions of their veneration for the power of the church; that Sherfield was highly criminal in not paying due respect to its authority, and ought to make acknowledgement to the bishop (o).

Smart, prebend of Durham, having complained to the commons in the year 1628, that Dr. Cosens had introduced in that cathedral several popish innovations, he was, after the dissolution of the parliament, successively brought into the High-commission courts at Durham, Lambeth, and York, deprived of all his ecclesiastical livings, imprisoned several years, and his preferment given to others.

Not only such of the clergy as neglected to observe every ceremony dictated by the superstitious prelate, were suspended and deprived by the High-commission court: oaths were, by many of the bishops, imposed on the churchwardens; and they were sworn to inform against any one who acted contrary to the ecclesiastical canons. This measure gave much offence; as too nearly resembling the practice of the Romish inquisition.

To shew the great alienation from the churches reformed after the presbyterian model, Laud advised, that the discipline and worship of the church should be imposed on the English regiments and trading companies abroad. All foreigners of the Dutch and Walloon congregations were commanded to attend the established church; and indulgence was granted to none after the children of the first denizens. Scudamore too, the king's ambassador at Paris, had orders to withdraw himself from the communion of the Hugonots. Men of sense, who reflected on these measures, openly blamed it, not only because it gave offence in England, but because in foreign countries it lost the crown the advantage of being considered as the head and support of the reformation.

On pretence of pacifying disputes, orders were issued from the council, forbidding, on both sides, all preaching and printing with regard to the controverted points of predestination and free-will. But it was complained of, and probably with reason, that the impartiality was altogether confined to the orders, and that the execution of them was only meant against the Calvinists; the Arminians being cherished by Laud and the high church party.

In return for Charles's indulgence towards the church, Laud and his followers took care to magnify, on every occasion, the regal authority, and to treat with the utmost detestation, all puritanical pretensions to a free and independent constitution. But while these prelates were so liberal in raising the crown at the expence of public liberty, they made no scruple of encroaching themselves on the royal rights the most incontestible, in order to exalt the hierarchy, and procure to their own order dominion and independence. All the doctrines which the Romish church had borrowed from some of the fathers, and which freed the spiritual from subordination to the civil power, were now adopted by the church of England, and interwoven with her political and religious tenets. A divine and apostolical charter was insisted on, preferably to a legal and parliamentary one. The sacerdotal character was magnified as sacred and indefeazable: all right to spiritual authority, or even to private judgement in spiritual subjects, was refused to profane laymen: ecclesiastical courts were held by the bishops in their own name, without any notice taken of the king's authority: and Charles, though extremely jealous of every claim in popular assemblies, seemed rather to encourage than repress those encroachments of his clergy. He had felt many inconveniences from the independent spirit of parliaments, and attached himself entirely to those who professed a devoted obedience to his crown and person; but he did not perceive, that the ecclesiastical power which he now exalted, as it did not admit of any precise boundary, might in the end become more dangerous to public peace, and no less fatal to royal authority than the other.

So early as the coronation of Charles, Laud was the person that introduced a novelty, which, though overlooked by the king, made a deep impression on many of the bye-standers. After the usual ceremonies these words were recited to the king: "Stand and hold fast, from henceforth, the place to which you have been heir by the succession of your forefathers, being now delivered to you by the authority of Almighty God, and by the hands of us and all the bishops and servants of God. And, as you see the clergy to come nearer the altar than others, so remember that, in all places convenient, you give them greater honour; that the Mediator of God and man may establish you on the kingly throne, to be a mediator betwixt the clergy and the laity; and that you may reign for ever with Jesus Christ, the King of kings, and Lord of lords."

The principles which exalted prerogative were not entertained by the king merely as soft and agreeable to his royal ears: they were also put in practice during the time that he ruled without parliaments. He wanted money for the support of government, though in some cases he was frugal; and he levied it, either by the revival of obsolete laws, or by violations, some more open, some more disguised, of the privileges of the nation. He gave way to some severities in the star-chamber and high-commission courts, in order to support the present mode of administration, and repress the rising spirit of liberty throughout the the kingdom. Under these two heads may be reduced all the remarkable transactions of this reign, during some years: for, in peaceable and prosperous times, where a neutrality in foreign affairs is observed, scarcely any thing is remarkable, but what is, in some degree, blamed or blameable. And, lest the hope of relief or protection from parliament might encourage opposition, Charles issued a proclamation, in which he declared, "That whereas, for several ill ends, the calling again of a parliament is divulged; though his majesty has shown, by frequent meetings with his people, his love to the use of parliaments: yet the late abuse having, for the present, driven him unwillingly out of that course; he will account it presumption for any one to prescribe to him any time for the calling of that assembly." This was generally construed as a declaration, that, during this reign, no more parliaments were intended to be summoned. And every measure of the king's confirmed a suspicion, so disagreeable to the generality of the people.

Tonnage and poundage continued to be levied by the royal authority alone. The former additional impositions were still exacted. Even new impositions were laid on several kinds of merchandize.

The custom-house officers received orders from the council to enter into any house, warehouse, or cellar; to search any trunk or chest; and to break any bulk whatever, in default of the payment of customs.

In order to exercise the militia, and to keep them in good order, each county, by an edict of the council, was assessed in a certain sum, for maintaining a muster-master, appointed for that service.

Compositions were openly made with recusants, and the popish religion became a regular part of the revenue.

A commission was granted for compounding with such as were possessed of crown-lands upon defective titles; and, on this pretence, some money was exacted from the people.

There was a law of Edward II. (Statutum de Militibus,) That whoever was possessed of twenty pounds a-year in land, should be obliged, when summoned, to appear and to receive the order of knighthood. Twenty pounds, at that time, partly by the change of denomination, partly by that in the value of money, were equivalent perhaps to two hundred and fifty at the present time; and Charles thought of the expedient of compounding with those persons, that he might enrich his coffers. Commissioners were therefore appointed for fixing the rates of composition; and instructions were given to these commissioners not to accept of a less sum than would have been due by the party, upon a tax of three subsidies and a half. Nothing proves more plainly how ill-disposed the people were to the measures of the crown, than to observe, that they loudly complained of this expedient, which, they asserted, was founded on an obsolete law.

Mr. Bernard, lecturer of St. Sepulchre's, London, preached a sermon at St. Mary's in Cambridge, in which were some passages against the introducing of Pelagian errors, and Romish superstitions, into the church of England. On his refusing to make a public recantation, according to a form, which was purposely penned for him, he was fined in the high-commission court one thousand pounds, suspended from his ministry, condemned in costs of suit, and committed to prison, where he died: the consequence of his imprisonment, it is said, shortened his life. One Workman, lecturer in the liberty of Gloucester, was, for the offence of preaching against images, suspended from his office, excommunicated, ordered to make recantation of his error and scandalous doctrine, condemned in costs of suit, and imprisoned. The corporation of Gloucester, approving much of this man for his diligent performing the duties of his function, had, on account of his great family, granted him an annuity of twenty pounds per annum under their common seal. For this act of generosity, Laud summoned the mayor, and other of the aldermen, before the council-table, as delinquents. The deed was cancelled, and two of the defendants fined ten pounds a-piece, though their council alledged, that the grant ought first to have been proved illegal, and the whole corporation, whose act it was, made parties to the suit. The unfortunate Mr. Workman, thus deprived of his annuity, having, after some months imprisonment, obtained his liberty, taught children in private: Laud forbid him to follow this occupation. He then practised physic for the support of his family; but the merciless Laud prohibiting him this resource, the distressed man sunk under his poverty and affliction, and in a short time died.

These excesses, when compared with the enormity which follows, were but moderate abuses of that absolute sovereignty which Charles had assumed, and delegated to Laud. Alexander Leighton, a doctor of divinity, a Scotchman, and a zealous Puritan, by the desire of some of the party, had written and published a book, called, "Zion's Plea against Prelacy." It contained some warm invectives against the prelates, and the conduct of those in power. Soon after the publication of the work, without an information upon oath, or legal proof (p) who was the author, Leighton, as he was coming from church, was arrested by two high-commission pursuivants. They dragged him to the house of Laud, where he was kept till seven in the evening, without food. Laud returning home at this time in great pomp and state, with Corbet bishop of Oxford, Leighton demanded to be heard. The haughty Laud did not deign to see him, but sent him to Newgate: he was put in irons, and confined in a wretched place, where, notwithstanding that the weather was cold, and the snow and rain beat in, there was no convenience to make a fire. From Tuesday-night to Thursday-noon, he was unsupplied with food; and in this infernal dwelling was kept fifteen weeks, without any friend, not even his wife, being suffered to come near him. His own house was in the mean time rifled by the officers of the high-commission court; his wife and child treated by these ruffians with great barbarity; himself denied a copy of the commitment; and the sheriffs of London, refused to bail him, on his wife's petition. At the end of the fifteen weeks, he was served with a subpœna. Heath, the attorney-general, on an assurance that he should come off well, extorted a confession from him, that he was the author of the book. An information by Heath being lodged in the star-chamber, he confessed the writing of the book, but with no such ill intention as the information suggested. He pleaded, that his aim was to remonstrate against certain grievances in church and state, under which the people suffered, to the end that the parliament might take them into consideration, and give such redress as might be for the honour of the king, the quiet of the people, and the peace of the church. This answer not being admitted as satisfactory, the following cruel sentence, by the unanimous consent of all the members of this tyrannical court, was pronounced against him, though sick and absent; "That he should pay a fine of ten thousand pounds to his majesty's use; and in respect that the defendant had heretofore entered into the ministry, and the court of star-chamber did not use to inflict any corporal or ignominious punishment upon any person so long as they continued in orders, the court referred him to the high-commission, there to be degraded of his ministry; that done, for farther punishment, and example to others, the delinquent to be brought into the pillory at Westminster (the court sitting,) and there whipped; after his whipping, to be set in the pillory for some convenient space; to have one of his ears cut off, his nose slit, and to be branded in the face with S. S. for a sower of sedition; then to be carried to the prison of the Fleet; and at some other convenient time afterwards to be carried into the pillory at Cheapside upon a market-day, to be there likewise whipped, then set in the pillory, have his other ear cut off, and then be carried back to the prison of the Fleet, there to remain during life, unless his majesty be graciously pleased to enlarge him (q)." This sentence was given at the end of Trinity-term. It was not till Michaelmas-term following, after the degradation, that it was put in execution. The evening before the intended day of suffering, Leighton escaped out of prison. He was apprehended in Bedfordshire, and brought again to the Fleet (r). November the sixteenth, part of his sentence was executed in this manner: in the New-Palace-Yard at Westminster, in term-time, he was severely whipped, then put in the pillory, where he had one of his ears cut off, one side of his nose slit, branded on one cheek with a red-hot iron with the letters S. S. and afterwards carried back again prisoner to the Fleet, to be kept in close custody. On that day sevennight, his sores upon his back, ears, nose, and face, not being cured, he was whipped again at the pillory in Cheapside, and there had the remainder of his sentence executed upon him, by cutting off the other ear, slitting the other side of the nose, and branding the other cheek. Dr. Leighton, in his own account of this horrid execution, adds, that the hangman was made half drunk, and enjoined to perform his office with ferocity; that he stood, after receiving the punishment of the lash, almost two hours in the pillory, exposed to frost and snow, and then suffered the rest; that being with these miseries disabled from walking, he was denied the benefit of a coach, and carried back to prison by water, to the farther endangering his life. Elphinston and Anderson, two of his friends and countrymen, who helped to procure his escape, were fined in the star-chamber five hundred pounds a-piece, and committed to the Fleet during the king's pleasure (s).

(p) The book was printed beyond sea.

(q) When this sentence was pronounced, bishop Laud pulled off his cap, and gave God thanks for it.

(r) Laud, the superintendant of all the cruelties committed at this period, made on this incident the following memorial: "Leighton was degraded at the High-commission, Tuesday the ninth of November. That night Leighton broke out of the Fleet. The warden says, he got, or was helped, over the wall; and moreover professed, he knew not this till Wednesday-noon: he told it not me till Thursday night. He was taken again in Bedfordshire, and brought back to the Fleet within a fortnight." Laud's Diary by Prynne, p. 16.

That the clergy might have a magnificent fabric for public worship, subscriptions were set on foot, in 1631, for repairing St. Paul's cathedral; and the king, by his countenance and example, encouraged this undertaking. By order of the privy-council, St. Gregory's church was removed, at the great charge of the inhabitants, as an impediment to the project of extending and beautifying the cathedral. Several houses and shops likewise were pulled down, and the proprietors were obliged to accept such compensation as the commissioners appointed by authority judged adequate.

A stamp duty was imposed on cards: a new tax, which, of itself, might be liable to no objection: but which appeared of dangerous consequence, when considered as arbitrary and illegal.

Monopolies were revived; an oppressive method of levying money, being unlimited, as well as destructive of industry. The last parliament of James, which abolished monopolies, had left an equitable exception in favour of new inventions; and on pretence of these, and of erecting new companies and corporations, was this grievance now renewed. The manufacture of soap was given to a company, who paid ten thousand pounds in advance, and eight pounds per ton, for their patent. Leather, salt, wine, sea coals, pins, starch, and many other commodities, even down to linen rags, were likewise put under restrictions.

The council of York had been the first erected, after a rebellion, by a patent from Henry VIII. without any authority of parliament; and this exercise of power, like many others, was indulged to that arbitrary monarch. This council had long acted chiefly as a criminal court; but, besides some innovations introduced by James, Charles thought proper, some time after Wentworth was made president, to extend its powers, and to give it a large civil jurisdiction, and that in some respects discretionary. The consequence of this measure, was the putting of all the northern counties out of the protection of ordinary law, and subjecting them to an authority extremely arbitrary. Some irregular acts of that council were, in 1632, complained of.

The court of star-chamber extended its authority; and it was matter of complaint in 1633, that it encroached upon the jurisdiction of the other courts; imposing heavy fines and inflicting severe punishment, beyond the usual course of justice. Sir David Foulis was fined five thousand pounds, chiefly because he had dissuaded a friend from compounding with the commissioners of knighthood.

Prynne, a barrister of Lincoln's-Inn, had written an enormous quarto of a thousand pages, which he called "Histrio-Mastyx." Its professed purpose was to decry stage-plays, comedies, interludes, music, dancing; but the author took occasion to declaim against hunting, public festivals, Christmas-keeping, bonfires and maypoles. His zeal against all these levities, he says, was first moved by observing, that plays sold better than the choicest sermons, and that they were frequently printed on finer paper than the Bible itself. Besides, that the players were often Papists, and desperately wicked; the play-houses, he affirms, are Satan's chapels, the play-hunters little better than incarnate devils; and so many steps in a dance, so many paces to hell. The chief crime of Nero he represents to have been, his frequenting and acting of plays; and those, who nobly conspired his death, were principally moved to it, as he affirms, by their indignation at that enormity. The rest of his thousand pages are of a like strain. He had obtained a licence from archbishop Abbot's chaplain; yet was he indicted in the star-chamber as a libeller. It was thought somewhat hard, that general invectives against plays should be interpreted into satires against the king and queen, merely because they frequented these amusements, and because the queen sometimes acted a part in pastorals and interludes, which were represented at court. The author, it must be owned, had, in plainer terms, blamed the hierarchy, the ceremonies, the innovations in religious worship, and the new superstitions, introduced by Laud (t); and this probably was the reason why his sentence was so severe. He was condemned to be put from the bar; to stand on the pillory in two places, Westminster and Cheapside; to lose both his ears, one in each place; to pay a fine of five thousand pounds to the king; and to be imprisoned during life.

Charles likewise renewed his father's edict for allowing sports and recreations on Sunday to such as attended public worship; and he ordered his proclamation for that purpose to be publicly read by the clergy after divine service. Those who were puritanically affected refused obedience, and were punished by suspension or deprivation. The differences between the sects were before sufficiently great; nor was it necessary to widen them farther by these inventions. Some encouragement and protection, which the king and the bishops gave to wakes, church-ales, bride-ales, and other cheerful festivals of the common people, were the objects of like scandal to the Puritans.

On the 12th of June, this year, Charles made a journey to Scotland, attended by the court, in order to hold a parliament there, and to pass through the ceremony of his coronation. The nobility and gentry of both kingdoms rivalled each other, in expressing all duty and respect to the king, and in showing mutual friendship and regard to each other. No one could have suspected, from exterior appearances, that such dreadful scenes were approaching.

One of the king's chief designs in this parliament, was, besides obtaining some supply, to procure authority for ordering the habits of clergymen. The act did not pass without opposition and difficulty. The dreadful surplice was before men's eyes; and they apprehended, with some reason, that, under sanction of this law, it would soon be introduced among them. Though the king believed that his prerogative entitled him to a power, in general, of directing whatever belonged to the exterior government of the church, this was deemed a matter of too great importance to be ordered without the sanction of a particular statute.

Immediately after the king's return to England, he heard of archbishop Abbot's death: and, without delay, he conferred that dignity on his favourite, Laud; who, by this accession of authority, was now enabled to maintain ecclesiastical discipline with greater rigour, and to aggravate the general discontent of the nation. Laud obtained the bishopric of London for his friend Juxton; and, about a

(s) We have been the more particular in our account of this barbarous exertion of power, because almost every other historian, either from tenderness to the character of the government, or from motives of abhorrence to the nature of the offence given by the wretched sufferer, has passed it over in a very slight manner. It must be owned, that Leighton, fired by an ungovernable zeal, and provoked by the mischievous conduct of the people in power, had made a bold attack on the ecclesiastical constitution as maintained by Charles, and had been severe in his reflections on the queen, who, from the influence she had now gained over her husband, was generally regarded as the principal cause of his unpopular government. Notwithstanding all that may be said against the conduct of this unfortunate enthusiast, his offence was by no means adequate to his punishment; his treatment and prosecution notoriously inhuman and illegal; the judgement passed against him was by an arbitrary court, whose jurisdiction was unconstitutional, in a manner created by the crown, and cherished as a never-failing engine of despotism. The tyranny it at present exerted outwent every example of former ages: it was the ready minister of vengeance to all that opposed the weak and wicked designs of a bigoted, arbitrary monarch; and entirely influenced in its conduct by the persecuting furious spirit of an arrogant usurping priest, who was pursuing with the utmost violence the plan of an absolute, independent, ecclesiastical government. The sentence it had lately passed against the unhappy Leighton was directly contrary to the humane spirit of the British laws; and the single instance of such an execrable barbarity would have put to shame the government of the most diabolical tyrant that ever disgraced the annals of history.

(t) The music in the churches, he affirmed not to be the noise of men, but a bleating of brute beasts; choristers bellow the tenor, as it were oxen; bark a counterpart, as it were a kennel of dogs; roar out a treble, as it were a sort of bulls; and grunt out a base, as it were a number of hogs; Christmas, as it is kept, is the devil's Christmas.

year after the death of sir Richard Weston, created earl of Portland, had interest enough to engage the king to make that prelate high treasurer (u).

In 1634, ship-money was introduced. The first writs of this kind had been directed to sea-port towns only: but ship-money was at this time levied on the whole kingdom; and each county was rated at a particular sum, which was afterwards assessed upon individuals. The amount of the whole tax was little more than two hundred thousand pounds: it was levied upon the people with equality: the money was entirely expended on the navy, to the great honour and advantage of the kingdom: as England had no military force, while all the other powers of Europe were strongly armed, a fleet seemed necessary for her security: and it was obvious that a navy must be built and equipped at leisure, during peace; nor could it possibly be fitted out on a sudden emergency, when the danger became urgent: yet all these considerations could not reconcile the people to the imposition. It was entirely arbitrary; and men thought it an unequal recompense for their liberties, which, they apprehended, were thus sacrificed to the obtaining it.

England was extremely unhappy in its present situation, for the king had entertained a very different idea of the nature of the constitution, from that which now prevailed so generally among his subjects. He did not regard national privileges as so sacred and inviolable, that nothing but the most extreme necessity could justify an infringement of them. He considered himself as the supreme magistrate, to whose care Heaven, by his birth-right, had committed his people, whose duty it was to provide for their security and happiness, and who was vested with ample discretionary powers for that salutary purpose. If the observance of ancient laws and customs were consistent with the present convenience of government, he thought himself obliged to comply with that rule; as the easiest, the safest, and what procured the most prompt and willing obedience. But when a change of circumstances required a new plan of administration, national privileges, he thought, must yield to supreme power; nor could any order of the state oppose any right to the will of the sovereign, directed to the good of the public. That these principles of government were derived from the uniform tenour of the English laws, it would be the height of folly to affirm; but public liberty, so precarious under this exorbitant prerogative, not only rendered opposition excusable, but even laudable in the people.

Some laws had been enacted, during the reign of Henry VII (v). against depopulation, or the converting of arable lands into pasture. By a decree of the star-chamber, sir Anthony Roper was fined four thousand pounds for an offence of that nature. This severe sentence was intended to terrify others into composition; and above thirty thousand pounds were levied by that expedient. Like compositions, or in default of them, heavy fines, were exacted for incroachments on the king's forests; whose bounds, by decrees deemed arbitrary, were extended much beyond what was usual. The bounds of one forest, that of Rockingham, were increased from six miles to sixty. The same refractory humour which made the people refuse to the king voluntary supplies, disposed them with the strongest reason to murmur against these irregular methods of taxation. The earl of Salisbury, under pretence of having encroached on the forest, was fined twenty thousand pounds, the earl of Westmoreland nineteen thousand pounds, sir Christopher Hatton twelve thousand pounds, sir Lewis Watson four thousand pounds, lord Newport three thousand pounds, sir Robert Bannister three thousand pounds, with many others.

Morley was fined ten thousand pounds for reviling, challenging, and striking, in the court of White Hall, sir George Theobald, one of the king's servants. Laud gave his vote that this censure should be twenty thousand pounds.

(u) Juxton was a person of great integrity, mildness, and humanity, and endued with a good understanding. Yet did this last promotion give general offence. His birth and character were deemed too obscure for a man raised to one of the highest offices of the crown. And the clergy, it was thought, were already too much elated by former instances of the king's attachment to them, and needed not this farther encouragement to assume dominion over the laity. The Puritans, likewise, were much dissatisfied with Juxton, notwithstanding his eminent virtues, because he was a lover of profane field sports, and hunting.

(v) These very laws had been repealed in the 21st of James I. yet to answer the arbitrary inclination of the court, they were now acted upon, as if they had been actually in force.

Allison had reported, that the archbishop of York had incurred the king's displeasure, by asking a limited toleration for the Catholics, and an allowance to build some churches for the exercise of their religion. For this slander against the archbishop, he was condemned in the star-chamber to be fined one thousand pounds, to be committed to prison, to be bound to his good behaviour during life, to be whipped, and to be set on the pillory at Westminster, and at York, Ipswich, and Yarmouth. Robins, who had been an accomplice in the guilt, was condemned by a sentence equally severe (w).

Sir Richard Granvile had thought himself ill-used by the earl of Suffolk in a law-suit; and he was accused before the star-chamber of having said of that nobleman, that he was a base lord. The evidence against him was somewhat lame; yet, for this slight offence, insufficiently proved, he was condemned to pay a fine of eight thousand pounds; one half to the earl, the other to the king.

Sir George Markham, following a chase where lord Darcy's huntsman was exercising his hounds, kept closer to the dogs than was thought proper by the huntsman, who, besides other rudeness, gave him foul language, which sir George returned with a stroke of his whip. The fellow threatened to complain to his master: the knight replied, If his master should justify such insolence, he would serve him in the same manner, or words to that effect. Sir George was summoned before the star-chamber, and fined ten thousand pounds. So fine a thing was it in those days to be a lord!——A natural reflection of lord Lansdown's, in relating this incident.

One Maud was fined five thousand pounds, for saying, that he heard the king went to mass with the queen. Pickering, for saying the king was a Papist in his heart, was deeply fined, set in the pillory in two several places, and lost both his ears.

Sir Richard Wiseman, for some offences, nearly similar to that of sir Richard Granvile against the lord keeper, was deeply fined, both to the king and to that lord, was set in the pillory, and degraded from the rank of a baronet.

One Bennet was fined one thousand pounds to the king, and one thousand pounds to the earl of Marlborough, for saying, that the said earl had dealt basely with him, in not paying him thirty pounds which was due upon bond.

The arbitrary court, on every pretext, condemned to excessive fines for the king's use all those that were cited before them. The printers of a new edition of the book of Common Prayer suffered a large pecuniary mulct for leaving out one letter.

In 1635 Charles issued proclamations forbidding the landed gentlemen and the nobility to live idly in London, and ordering them to retire to their country-seats. For disobedience to this edict many were indicted by the attorney-general, and were fined in the star-chamber. This occasioned discontents; and the sentences were complained of as illegal.

Ray, having exported fullers-earth, contrary to the king's proclamation, was, besides the pillory, condemned in the star-chamber to a fine of two thousand pounds. Like fines were levied on Terry, Eman, and others, for disobeying a proclamation which forbad the exportation of gold. In order to account for the subsequent convulsions, even these incidents are not to be overlooked, as frivolous or contemptible. Such severities were afterwards magnified into the greatest enormities.

There remains a proclamation of this year, prohibiting hackney-coaches from standing in the street. We are told, that there were not above twenty coaches of that kind in London. There are, at present, upwards of one thousand.

The effects of ship-money began now to appear. A formidable fleet of sixty sail, the greatest that England had ever known, was equipped in 1636, under the earl of Northumberland, who had orders to attack the herring-busses of the Dutch, which fished in what were called the British seas. The Dutch were content to pay thirty thousand florins for a license. They openly denied, however, the claim of dominion in the seas beyond the friths, bays, and shores; and it may be questioned, whether the laws of nations warrant any farther pretensions.

(w) There are other instances of the high respect paid to the nobility and to the great in that age; when the powers of monarchy, though disputed, still maintained themselves in their pristine vigour. Clarendon tells us a pleasant incident to this purpose: a waterman belonging to a man of quality, having a squabble with a citizen about his fare, showed his badge, the crest of his master, which happened to be a swan; and thence insisted on better treatment from the citizen. But the other replied carelessly, that he did not trouble his head about that goose. For this offence he was summoned before the marshal's court; was fined, as having opprobriously defamed the nobleman's crest, by calling the swan a goose; and was in effect reduced to beggary.

This year the king sent a squadron against Salee; and, with the assistance of the emperor of Morocco, destroyed that receptacle of pirates, by whom the English commerce, and even the English coasts had long been infested.

In 1637, Burton, a divine, and Bastwick, a physician, and Prynne, the same lawyer who had already been so cruelly handled in the Star-chamber, provoked anew the furious Laud, by several publications against the jus divinum of bishops. These books contained some disagreeable truths, but were written in a fanatic and diffusive style. Dr. Bastwick, for publishing a work entitled, "Flagellum Pontificis & Episcoporum Latialium," had his house ransacked by a pursuivant, all his books and papers carried off, himself accused in the High-commission court, there fined one thousand pounds, excommunicated, debarred from the practice of physic, his books ordered to be burnt, and his body imprisoned till he should make recantation. Whilst under confinement, he wrote another book, taxing the proceedings of the High-commission court. Mr. Burton had not only published several books offensive to the hierarchy, but had preached a sermon on the fifth of November, in which he pointed out many innovations in the forms of the English worship (x). Prynne, though in prison, had again employed his pen on the same subject. These men Laud brought into the star-chamber (y). The delinquents finding that the terrors of the court had made their counsel shy, they petitioned that they might sign their answers themselves (z). This request being denied, they put in a cross-bill against the prelates, charging them with innovating upon the prerogative-royal; and set forth the substance of their answers. The court of star-chamber refused to receive the cross-bill against the bishops (a). Mr. Burton got Mr. Holt, a counsellor, to draw and sign his answer. Finch told Holt, that he deserved to have his gown pulled over his ears for drawing it (b). All the answer was expunged, excepting the plea of Not Guilty. Burton refused to be examined, unless his answer was admitted; the court therefore ordered the matter of the information to be taken against him pro confesso, rejected the answers of his co-defendants because they could not get lawyers to sign them in proper time, and proceeded to pass sentence. The three prisoners were condemned to lose their ears in the palace-yard of Westminster; to be fined five thousand pounds a-piece to the king's use; to perpetual imprisonment in three remote places of the kingdom, namely, the castles of Carnarvon, Cornwall, and Lancaster (c). Finch added to Mr. Prynne's censure, that he should be branded in each cheek with S. L. for a seditious libeller. To this the whole court agreed. Laud made a long speech to excuse himself and brother-prelates from the charge of introducing innovations; he asserted, that the king was the person principally abused by the adverse party; that zeal without knowledge was a dangerous quality, (though himself maintained an enthusiastic attachment to all the trifling ceremonies he had with such indiscreet rigour exacted;) he railed with the utmost gall and bitterness against the unhappy prisoners, whilst he magnified his own religious patience in bearing injuries; lastly, he inveighed against the book supposed to have been published by the bishop of Lincoln, and said, that the author had abused both himself and his readers; and ended his speech with giving the court thanks for their censure on the three prisoners (d).

The cruel sentence passed on Prynne, Burton, and Bastwick, was yet more cruelly executed: the hangman performed his bloody office with an approved barbarity. Burton's ears were taken off so close, that a considerable branch of the temporal artery was wounded, and the blood streamed down the scaffold. Prynne's were hacked barbarously; he lost a large piece of his cheek with the remainder of his ears, and the executioner applied the burning iron twice to the branding of one cheek. The patient behaviour of the sufferers heightened the pity and roused the detestation of the people: they crouded with impatience round the scaffold, and every wound given by the executioner produced an universal groan and lamentation. The three heroes of this tragic scene harangued the populace in their turns: Prynne told them, that rather than have his cause a leading cause to deprive the subjects of their liberty, he had exposed his person to be a leading example to bear that ignominious punishment; he proved to them the illegality of the sentence passed on himself and fellow-sufferers; that there was no law in the realm that authorised such tyranny, the statute of queen Mary limiting the punishment of a libeller, even of the king or queen, to a fine of one hundred pounds, and one month's imprisonment, no corporal punishment, unless the delinquent refuses to pay the fine; in the statute of Elizabeth, the penalty was heightened to a fine of two hundred pounds, and three months imprisonment, but no censure to be passed unless it was fully proved by two witnesses, who were to produce a certificate of their good demeanour, for the credit of the report, or else the crime to be confessed by the libeller. The popularity these three men had gained by their sufferings was so formidable to Laud, that he procured an order for removing them from the destined places of their confinement to Guernsey, Jersey, and Scilly (e), with special directions that they should be conveyed privately, and no one to come near them during their passage; they were forbid to have any but canonical books; restrained the use of pen, ink, and paper, and all communication whatsoever. The wives of Bastwick and Burton were not permitted to set their feet on the islands where their husbands were confined (f).

The next victims to Laud's insatiable rage were John Lilbourne

(x) The following are some of the innovations with which he taxed the prelates, in a book entitled, "News from Ipswich:" That divine service on the fast-days was enjoined to be without sermons; that Wednesdays were appointed for fasts-day, on purpose to suppress the lectures which were read on those days; the changing the word "in" for "at the name of Jesus every knee shall bow." State Trials, vol. i. p. 466, & seq.

(y) A large number of Burton's parishioners having sent a petition to the king to intreat for his pardon and liberty, the two people that carried it were committed to prison. Strafford's Letters, vol. ii. p. 57.

(z) Prynne pleaded, that it was impossible for him to put in an answer at the time appointed by the court: for that in order to disable him in the prosecution of his cause, his friends were restrained from him; he was prohibited access to his counsel; debarred the use of pen, ink, and paper; and moreover, his servant, who should solicit his business, and help to copy and engross his answer, was by Laud's direction detained a close prisoner in a messenger's hands. On the receipt of this petition, counsel was ordered to repair to Mr. Prynne; but when his answer was drawn up, it yet remained unsigned, for that his counsel Holt was forbid to put his name to it. Moreover, Gardiner, a clerk belonging to the Tower, for writing the petition, was by a warrant from the archbishop apprehended by a pursuivant, and kept a prisoner fourteen days. Prynne against Prelates, 4to ed. 1641, p. 29, & seq.

(a) It was committed to the judges to give their opinions, whether the three complainants might not be tried in the King's-Bench for their lives for sedition? But the judges resolved that they could not, because the bill was tendered in a legal way, and might not in point of law be refused; the king's courts of justice being open indifferently to all his subjects to sue and be sued. Prynne against Prelates, p. 20.

(b) Mr. St. John, of Lincoln's-Inn, upon suspicion that he was concerned in drawing Burton's answer, had his study searched, and all his papers carried off. Strafford's Letters, vol. ii. p. 85.

(c) The prisoners attempted to speak for themselves, but were commanded silence. Prynne endeavoured to expostulate on his case, that it was not in his power to compel his counsel to sign his answer, when they refused. The following dialogue, which passed in the star-chamber, is another curious specimen of the behaviour of the officers of law and state in this reign: the first time that Finch fixed his eyes on Prynne he said, "I thought Mr. Prynne had had no ears; but it seems he has ears, and something else." Mr. Prynne said, "My lords, there is never a one of your honours but would be sorry to have your ears as mine are." "In good faith, said the lord-keeper, he is somewhat saucy." "I hope your honours will not be offended, replied Mr. Prynne: Pray God give you ears to hear." On this trial the bishops declared in open court, that they held their jurisdiction from God only. State Trials, vol. i. p. 461. Whitelock, p. 22.

(d) This speech of Laud's pleased Charles so much that he ordered it to be printed and published. The archbishop prefixed to it a flattering dedication to the king, in which he asserts, that blasphemy against God, and slandering the footsteps of his anointed, were joined together: "For he that blasphemes God will never stick at the slander of his prince; and he that gives himself the liberty to slander his prince will quickly ascend the next highest, and blaspheme God." He magnified the royal clemency in bringing the offenders to a court of mercy as well as justice: and insinuated, that the times demanded greater severity than had been hitherto exercised. Laud's Remains, vol. ii. p. 63, & seq. State Trials.

(e) Prynne to the castle of Mont-Orgueil in the isle of Jersey; Burton to Castle-Cornet in the road of Guernsey; and Bastwick to St. Mary's Castle in the isle of Scilly. During this their rigorous confinement, they had no allowance of diet from the crown, but were kept by the charitable contributions of their friends.

(f) Laud's malice against these men carried him to such an absurd length, that some few individuals of the town of Chester having visited Prynne in his way to Carnarvon, they were prosecuted by the high-commission; their houses broke open and ransacked by pursuivants; fined large sums of money; and to make public acknowledgement of their crimes in the cathedral-church and in the town-hall of Chester. All the lecturers and preachers in the city were enjoined, in their lectures and sermons, to make public expression of their hearty detestation of the offences for which the three offenders were censured. This order was so well Lilbourne and John Wharton, accused in the star-chamber for publishing forbidden books. These men refusing to take an oath to answer interrogatories, and pleading that no Englishman was bound by law to accuse himself, they were condemned to be whipped, pillored, and imprisoned. While execution was performed on Lilbourne, he harangued the populace, and declaimed against the tyranny of bishops. The star-chamber ordered him to be gagged, and added to his former punishment, the lying in irons, and confinement in that part of the Fleet where the basest and meanest sort of prisoners used to be put.

Neither women, lunatics, nor fools, escaped the fury of the archbishop's revenge and bigotry. On some disagreeable news coming to court, Archibald Armstrong, the king's jester, seeing the prelate pass by, called out, "Whaws feule now:" For this offence the harmless buffoon, who by his office had the privilege of passing jokes with impunity, was ordered, by a sentence of the council, to have his coat pulled over his head, and to be dismissed the king's service. The lady Davies, a woman disordered in her senses, for having prophesied Laud's death was prosecuted in the high-commission court. And the lady Purbeck, sir Edward Coke's daughter, on the suspicion of having an intrigue with sir Robert Howard, and for some words spoken against Laud, was condemned to do penance bare-foot, was committed to the Gatehouse, and for the space of several years persecuted so hotly by that prelate, that she was obliged to conceal herself in different parts of the dominions, and at length made her escape in men's cloaths, and fled to France, where yet she did not find repose from the malice of her enemies. Sir Robert Howard, who had been once rescued by the parliament from an arbitrary seizure, was now, without any regular proceeding passed against him, committed to prison, and there ordered to lie till he should produce the person of the absconded female. He was at length released on his giving a bond of one thousand pounds that he would never see the lady Purbeck again. The poor woman's persecution did not cease here: an express messenger with a privy-seal was sent after her, to summon her into England, under pain of being farther proceeded against.

One Bowyer, who was half mad, for having spread a report of Laud, that he was under censure for correspondency with the pope, was committed to close confinement to Bridewell during life; fined three thousand pounds; to be set in the pillory at Westminster and Cheapside, with a paper acknowledging his offence; to be branded in the forehead with the letters L and R, and to have his ears nailed to the pillory at Reading.

Among the violations of the Petition of Right, there was at this time a complaint made, that sir Robert Berkley had refused bail or release upon their Habeas Corpus to Jennings, Pargiter, and Danvers, three men who had been committed by the king and council. Berkley had denied writs of Habeas Corpus to several individuals who had demanded them; and when they had been granted, he constantly remanded the prisoners, though they were by law clearly bailable.

The enormous, yet increasing height of monarchical tyranny which raged at this time in England, together with the small prospect of redress the times promised, occasioned numbers of the natives to sell their estates, and to ship themselves off for America, there to enjoy a liberty which they looked upon as lost to the inhabitants of Great Britain (g). But those avowed destroyers of all the rights of humanity, the bosom-friends and ministers of Charles, unwilling that their fellow-citizens should any where possess the blessings of freedom, prevailed with their master to issue out a proclamation, debarring the adventurers access to those uncultivated shores. Eight ships lying in the Thames, and ready to sail, were staid by an order of the council (h). Embarked in these were sir Arthur Hazelrig, John Hampden, and Oliver Cromwell, three men of spirit, who resolved for ever to abandon a country where the laws had lost their power to protect, and fly to the other extremity of the globe, there to endure a painful solitude in wild desarts, rather than submit to a government that degraded their species beneath the condition of beasts! The king had afterwards leisure to repent this exercise of his authority.

Certain persons had erected themselves into a society for buying in of impropriations, and transferring them to the church; and great sums of money had been bequeathed to the society for these purposes. But it was soon observed, that the only use which they made of their funds, was, to establish lecturers in all the considerable churches; men who, without being subjected to episcopal authority, employed themselves entirely in preaching and spreading the doctrines of puritanism. Laud took care by a decree, which was passed in the court of exchequer, and which was much complained of, to abolish this society, and to stop their progress. It was, however, still observed, that throughout England the lecturers were all of them puritanically affected; and from them the clergymen, who contented themselves with reading prayers and homilies to the people, commonly received the appellation of dumb dogs.

The bishop of Norwich, by rigorously insisting on uniformity, had banished many industrious tradesmen from that city, and chased them into Holland. The Dutch began to be more intent on commerce than on orthodoxy; and thought that the knowledge of useful arts and obedience to the laws formed a good citizen; though attended with errors in subjects where it is not allowable for human nature to expect any positive truth or certainty.

Williams, bishop of Lincoln, a man of spirit and learning, a popular prelate, who had been lord keeper, was fined ten thousand pounds by the star-chamber, committed to the Tower during the king's pleasure, and suspended from his office. This severe sentence was founded on frivolous pretences, and was more ascribed to Laud's vengeance, than to any guilt of the bishop. Laud, however, had owed his first promotion to the good offices of that prelate with king James. But so implacable was the haughty primate, that he raised up a new prosecution against Williams, on the strangest pretence imaginable. In order to levy the fine above mentioned, some officers had been sent to seize all the furniture and books of his episcopal palace of Lincoln; and in rummaging the house, they found in a corner some neglected letters, which had been thrown by as useless. These letters were written by one Osbaldistone, a schoolmaster, and were directed to Williams. Mention was there made of a little great man; and in another passage, the same person was denominated a little urchin. By inferences and constructions, these epithets were applied to Laud; and on no better foundation was Williams tried afresh, as having received scandalous letters, and not discovering that private correspondence. For this offence another fine of eight thousand pounds was levied on him: Osbaldistone was likewise brought to trial, and condemned to pay a fine of five thousand pounds, and to have his ears nailed to the pillory before his own school. He saved himself by flight; and left a note in his study, wherein he said, "That he was gone beyond Canterbury."

These prosecutions of Williams seem to have been the most iniquitous measure pursued by the court during the time that the use of parliaments was suspended. Williams had been indebted for all his fortune to the favour of James; but having quarrelled, first with Buckingham, then with Laud, joined himself to the country party; and with great firmness and vigour opposed all the measures of the king. Some writers relate, that, before sentence was pronounced against him, Williams was offered a pardon upon his submission, which he refused to make. The court was apt to think, that so refractory a spirit must by any expedient be broken and subdued.

In a former trial, which Williams underwent (for these were not the first,) there was mentioned, in court, a story, which, as it discovers the genius of parties, may be worth well obeyed by some, that the churches for many days resounded with the most bitter invectives. This did not satisfy Laud: he descended to so mean an instance of malice as to persecute a painter in Chester who had drawn several pictures of Prynne. All the said pictures were, by a warrant from the high-commission, ordered to be spoiled and defaced, and the frames to be publicly burnt. Prynne's servant, whom Laud had detained a prisoner, having been in vain attempted by promises and threats, and constantly refusing to accuse his master, was articled against in the high-commission court; and for his refusal to take an ex officio oath before the sight of the articles, the articles were taken against him pro confesso. He was fined one thousand pounds to the king, condemned to pay costs of suit, though there was no prosecutor assigned, excommunicated, committed close prisoner to the Counter, and afterwards sent down to Wesbeck-Castle. Prynne against Prelates, 4to. passim.

relating. Sir John Lambe, urging him to prosecute the Puritans, the prelate asked, what sort of people these same Puritans were? Sir John replied, "That to the world they seemed to be such as would not swear, whore, or be drunk; but they would lie, cozen, and deceive: that they would frequently hear two sermons a-day, and repeat them too, and that sometimes they would fast all day long."

In 1632, the treasurer, Portland, had insisted with the vintners, that they should submit to a tax of a penny a quart upon all the wine which they retailed. But they rejected the demand. In order to punish them, a decree, suddenly, without much inquiry or examination, passed in the star-chamber, prohibiting them to sell or dress victuals in their houses. Two years after, they were questioned for the breach of this decree; and in order to avoid punishment, they agreed to lend the king six thousand pounds. Being threatened, during the subsequent years, with fines and prosecutions, they at last compounded the matter, and submitted to pay half of that duty which was at first demanded of them. It required little foresight to perceive that the king's right of thus issuing proclamations must, if prosecuted, inevitably invest him with a power of taxation.

Here is another instance of that rigorous subjection in which all men were held by Laud. Some young gentlemen of Lincoln's-inn, heated by their cups, having drunk confusion to the archbishop, were at his instigation cited before the star-chamber. They applied to the earl of Dorset for protection. "Who bears witness against you?" said Dorset. "One of the drawers," they said. "Where did he stand, when you were supposed to drink this health?" subjoined the earl. "He was at the door," they replied, "going out of the room." "Tush!" cried he, "the drawer was mistaken: you drank confusion to the archbishop of Canterbury's enemies; and the fellow was gone before you pronounced the last word." This hint supplied the young gentlemen with a new method of defence: and being advised by Dorset to behave with great humility and submission to the primate; the modesty of their carriage, the ingenuity of their apology, with the patronage of that noble lord, saved them from any severer punishment than a reproof and admonition.

This year, John Hampden acquired, by his spirit and courage, universal popularity throughout the nation, and has merited great renown with posterity, for the bold stand which he made in defence of the laws and liberties of his country. After the imposing of ship-money, Charles, in order to discourage all opposition, had proposed this question to the judges; "Whether, in a case of necessity, for the defence of the kingdom, he might not impose this taxation; and whether he were not sole judge of the necessity?" These guardians of law and liberty replied, with great complaisance, "That in a case of necessity he might impose that taxation, and that he was sole judge of the necessity." Hampden had been rated at twenty shillings for an estate which he possessed in the county of Buckingham: yet notwithstanding this declared opinion of the judges, notwithstanding the great power, and sometimes rigorous maxims of the crown, notwithstanding the small prospect of relief from parliament; he resolved, rather than tamely submit to so illegal an imposition, to stand a legal prosecution, and expose himself to all the indignation of the court. The case was argued during twelve days, in the exchequer chamber, before all the judges of England; and the nation regarded, with the utmost anxiety, every circumstance of this celebrated trial. The event was easily foreseen: but the principles, and reasonings, and behaviour of the parties engaged in the trial, were much canvassed and inquired into; and nothing could equal the favour paid to the one side, except the hatred which attended the other.

It was urged by Hampden's counsel, and by his partizans in the nation, that the plea of necessity was in vain introduced into a trial of law; since it was the nature of necessity to abolish all law, and, by irresistible violence, to dissolve all the weaker and more artificial ties of human society. Not only the prince, in cases of extreme distress, is exempted from the ordinary rules of administration: all orders of men are then levelled; and any individual may consult the public safety by any expedient which his situation enables him to employ. But to produce so violent an effect, and so hazardous to every community, an ordinary danger or difficulty is not sufficient; much less, a necessity which is merely fictitious and pretended. Where the peril is urgent and extreme, it will be palpable to every member of the society; and though all ancient rules of government are in that case abrogated, men will readily, of themselves, submit to that irregular authority, which is exerted for their preservation. But what is there in common between such suppositions, and the present condition of the nation? England enjoys a profound peace with all her neighbours: and what is more, all her neighbours are engaged in furious and bloody wars among themselves, and by their mutual enmities farther ensure her tranquillity. The very writs themselves, which are issued for the levying of ship-money, contradict the supposition of necessity, and pretend only that the seas are infested with pirates; a slight and temporary inconvenience, which may well await a legal supply from parliament. The writs likewise allow several months for equipping the ships; which proves a very calm and deliberate species of necessity, and one that admits of delay much beyond the forty days requisite for summoning that assembly. It is strange too, that an extreme necessity which is always apparent, and usually comes to a sudden crisis, should now have continued, without interruption, for near four years, and should have remained, during so long a time, invisible to the whole kingdom. And as to the pretension, that the king is sole judge of the necessity; what is this but to subject all the privileges of the nation to his arbitrary will and pleasure? To expect that the public will be convinced by such reasoning, must aggravate the general indignation; by adding, to violence against men's persons and their property, so cruel a mockery of their understanding.

In vain are precedents of ancient writs produced: these writs, when examined, are only found to require the seaports, sometimes at their own charge, sometimes at the charge of the counties, to send their ships for the defence of the nation. Even the prerogative, which empowered the crown to issue such writs, is abolished, and its exercise almost entirely discontinued, from the time of Edward III. (i); and all the authority which remained, or was afterwards exercised, was, to press ships into the public service, to be paid for by the public. How wide are these precedents from a power of obliging the people, at their own charge, to build new ships, to victual and pay them, for the public; nay, to furnish money to the crown for that purpose! What security either against the farther extension of this claim, or against diverting to other purposes the public money, so levied? The plea of necessity would warrant any other taxation as well as that of ship-money: wherever any difficulty shall occur, the administration, instead of endeavouring to elude or overcome it by gentle and prudent measures, will instantly represent it as a reason for infringing all ancient laws and institutions: and if such maxims and such practices prevail, what has become of national liberty? What authority is left to the great charter, to the statutes, and to that very petition of right, which, in the present reign, had been so solemnly enacted by the concurrence of the whole legislature?

The defenceless condition of the kingdom while unprovided with a navy; the inability of the king, from his established revenues, with the utmost care and frugality, to equip and maintain one; the impossibility of obtaining, on reasonable terms, any voluntary supply from parliament: all these are reasons of state, not topics of law. If these reasons appear to the king so urgent as to dispense with the legal rules of government; let him enforce his edicts by his court of star-chamber, the proper instrument of irregular and absolute power; not prostitute the character of his judges by a decree which is not, and cannot possibly be legal. By this means the boundaries at least will be kept more distinct between ordinary law and extraordinary exertions of prerogative; and men will know, that the national constitution is only suspended during a present and difficult emergence, but has not undergone a total and fundamental alteration.

Notwithstanding the just reasons set forth in the arguments of Hampden's counsel, the prejudiced judges, four (k) excepted, gave sentence in favour of the crown. Hampden, however, obtained by the trial the end for which he had so generously sacrificed his safety and his quiet: the people were roused from their lethargy, and became sensible of the danger to which their liberties were exposed. These national questions were canvassed in every company; and the more they were examined, the more evidently did it appear to many, that the liberty of the subject was totally subverted, and that an unusual and arbitrary authority was exercised over the kingdom. Slavish principles, they said, concur with illegal practices; ecclesiastical tyranny gives aid to civil usurpation; iniquitous taxes are supported by arbitrary punishments; and all the privileges of the nation, transmitted through so many ages, secured by so many laws, and purchased by the blood of so many heroes and patriots, now lie prostrate at the feet of the monarch. What though public peace and national industry increased the commerce and opulence of the kingdom? This advantage was temporary, and due alone, not to any encouragement given by the crown, but to the spirit of the English, the remains of their ancient freedom. What though the personal character of the king, amidst all his misguided counsels, might merit indulgence, or even praise? He was but one man; and the privileges of the people, the inheritance of millions, were too valuable to be sacrificed to his prejudices and mistakes. Such, or more severe, were the sentiments promoted by a great party in the nation: no excuse on the king's part, or alleviation, how reasonable soever, could be hearkened to or admitted: and to redress these grievances, a parliament was impatiently longed for; or any other incident, however calamitous, that might secure the people against those oppressions which they laboured under, or the greater ills which they apprehended from the combined encroachments of church and state.

The grievances under which the English laboured, when considered in themselves, without regard to the constitution, scarcely deserve the name; but when the constitution is thought of, they were either burdensome on the people's properties, or shocking to the natural humanity of mankind. The imposition of ship-money, independent of the consequences, was, by some, supposed to be a great and evident advantage to the public; but it was justly apprehended, that such precedents, if patiently submitted to, would end in a total disuse of parliaments, and in the establishment of arbitrary authority. The laws, disarmed of their wonted power to protect, lay prostrate at the foot of the throne, to be trampled upon with impunity: nor was the condition of any individual in the kingdom great enough to secure him from the lash of royal and ecclesiastical prerogative. Notwithstanding a servitude thus miserable and ignominious, the patriotic party found it impossible to rouse the heavy multitude to action, or engage them to resist the growing evil. The patient herd waited their redress from parliament, though there was not at that time a prospect that the king would ever call another. It seemed probable, therefore, that affairs might long have continued on the same footing in England, had it not been for the neighbourhood of Scotland; a country less disposed to submission and obedience. It was thence the commotions first arose; and it is therefore proper to give an account of the state of affairs in that kingdom.

Though the pacific government of James, and the authority which he had acquired, had allayed in some measure the feuds among the great families, and appeared to have established law and order throughout the kingdom; the Scottish nobility were still possessed of the chief power and influence over the people. Their property was extensive; their hereditary jurisdictions and the feudal tenures increased their authority; and the attachment of the gentry to the heads of families established a kind of voluntary servitude under the chieftains. Besides that long absence had much loosened the king's connexions with the nobility, who resided chiefly at their country-seats; they were in general at this time much disgusted with the court. Charles was extremely attached to the ecclesiastics; and as it is natural for men to persuade themselves that their interest coincides with their inclination, he had established it as a fixed maxim of policy, to increase the power and authority of that order. The prelates, he thought, established regularity and discipline among the clergy; the clergy inculcated obedience and loyalty among the people; and as that rank of men had no separate authority, and no dependence but on the crown; the royal power, it would seem, might with the greater safety be entrusted in their hands. Many of the prelates, therefore, were raised to the chief dignities of the state (l). The advantages, possessed by the church, and which the bishops did not always enjoy with suitable modesty, disgusted the nobility, who, deeming themselves superior in rank and quality to this new order of men, were displeased to find themselves inferior in power and influence. Interest joined itself to ambition, and begat a jealousy, lest the episcopal sees, which, at the reformation, had been pillaged by the nobles, should again be enriched at the expence of that order. By a particular law, the impropriations had already been ravished from the great men: salaries had been assigned to the impoverished clergy from the tithes of each parish; and what remained, the proprietor of the land was empowered to purchase at a low valuation. The king likewise had declared for a general resumption of all crown-lands alienated by his predecessors; and this project also excited jealousy and discontent.

Notwithstanding the pretensions of tender regard which Charles would have persuaded the people he bore to the whole church, he had been able, in Scotland, to acquire only the affection of the superior rank among the clergy. The ministers in general equalled, if not exceeded the nobility, in their prejudices against the court, against the prelates, and against episcopal authority. Though the establishment of the hierarchy might seem advantageous to the inferior clergy, both as it erected dignities to which all of them might aspire, and as it bestowed a lustre on the whole body, and allured men of family into it; these views had no influence on the Scottish ecclesiastics. In the present disposition of men's minds, there was another circumstance, which drew consideration, and counterbalanced power and riches; and that was, the fervour of piety, and the rhetoric of religious lectures and discourses. Checked by the prelates in the license of preaching, the clergy regarded episcopal jurisdiction both as a tyranny and an usurpation, and maintained a parity among ecclesiastics to be a divine privilege, which no human law could alter or infringe. The jurisdiction of presbyteries, synods, and other democratical courts, was, in a manner, abolished by the bishops; and the general assembly itself had not been summoned for several years. A new oath was arbitrarily imposed on intrants, by which they swore to observe the articles of Perth, and submit to the liturgy and canons; and the whole system of church government, during a course of thirty years, had been changed by means of the innovations introduced by James and Charles.

The people, under the influence of the nobility and clergy, could not fail to partake of the discontents which prevailed among these two orders; and where real grounds of complaint were wanting, they greedily laid hold of imaginary ones. The same horror against popery, with which the English Puritans were possessed, was observable among the populace in Scotland; and among these, as being more uncultivated and uncivilized, seemed rather to be inflamed into a higher degree of ferocity. The genius of religion, which prevailed in the court and among the prelates, was of an opposite nature; and having some affinity to the Romish worship, led them to mollify, as much as possible, the severe prejudices, and to speak of the Catholics in more charitable language, and with more reconciling expressions. From this foundation, a panic fear of popery was easily raised; and every new ceremony or ornament, introduced into divine service, was part of that great mystery of iniquity, which, from the encouragement of the king and the bishops, was to overspread the nation. The innovations which James had made were considered as preparatives to this grand design; and the alterations attempted by Charles were represented as a full and decisive declaration of his intentions. Through the whole of this reign, nothing had more fatal influence, in both kingdoms, than this apprehension, which with so much industry was embraced by all ranks and degrees of men.

Amidst these dangerous complaints and terrors of religious innovation, the civil and ecclesiastical liberties of the nation were imagined, and with every appearance of reason, not to be altogether free from invasion.

The establishment of the high-commission by James, without any authority of law, seemed a considerable encroachment of the crown, and erected the most dangerous and arbitrary of all courts, by a method equally dangerous, arbitrary, and tyrannical. All the steps towards the settlement of episcopacy had indeed been taken with consent

(l) Spotswood, archbishop of St. Andrews, was created chancellor: nine of the bishops were privy-counsellors: the bishop of Ross aspired to the office of treasurer: some of the prelates possessed places in the exchequer; and it was even endeavoured to revive the first institution of the college of justice, and to share equally between the clergy and laity the whole judicial authority. Guthrie's Memoirs, p. 14. Burnet's Mem. p. 29, 30.

of parliament: the articles of Perth were confirmed in 1621: in 1633, the king had obtained a general ratification of every ecclesiastical establishment; but these laws had less authority with the nation, as they were known to have passed contrary to the sentiments even of those who voted for them, and were extorted by the authority of the sovereign.

There prevailed, however, among the greater part of the nation a principle, of the most important nature, and which, if admitted, destroyed entirely the validity of all such statutes. The ecclesiastical authority was supposed totally independent of the civil; and, consequently, no act of parliament, nothing but the consent of the church itself, was represented as sufficient ground for the introduction of any change in religious worship or discipline. And though James had obtained the vote of assemblies for receiving episcopacy and his new rites, it must be confessed, that such irregularities had prevailed in constituting these ecclesiastical courts, and such violence in conducting them, that there were strong grounds for denying the authority of all their acts. Charles, sensible that an extorted consent, attended with such invidious circumstances, would rather be prejudicial to his measures, had laid aside the use of assemblies, and was resolved, in conjunction with the bishops, to govern the church by an authority, to which he thought himself fully entitled, and which he pretended to believe was inherent in the crown.

The king's great aim was to complete the work which his father had begun; to establish discipline upon a regular system of canons, to introduce a liturgy into public worship, and to render the ecclesiastical government of all his kingdoms regular and uniform. Some views of policy might move him to this undertaking; but his chief motives were supposed to be derived from very different principles.

The canons for establishing ecclesiastical jurisdiction were promulgated in 1635; and were received by the nation with great inward apprehension and discontent. Every body was displeased at seeing the royal authority exalted by them, and represented as absolute and uncontrollable. They saw these speculative principles reduced to practice, and a whole body of ecclesiastical laws established without any previous consent either of church or state. They dreaded lest, by a parity of reason, like arbitrary authority, from like pretences and principles, would be assumed in civil matters: they remarked, that the delicate boundaries which separate church and state, were already passed, and many civil ordinances established by the canons, under colour of ecclesiastical institutions; and they derided the negligence with which these edicts had been compiled, when they found that the new liturgy or service-book was every where, under severe penalties, enjoined by them, though it had not yet been composed or published. It was, however, soon expected; and in the reception of it, many were apprehensive that the chief difficulty would consist.

The liturgy, which the king, from his own authority, imposed on Scotland, was copied from that of England; but lest a servile imitation might shock the pride of his ancient kingdom, a few alterations, in order to save appearances, were made in it; and in that shape it was transmitted to the bishops at Edinburgh. But the Scots had universally entertained a notion, that, though riches and worldly glory had been shared out to them with a sparing hand, they could boast of spiritual treasures more abundant and more genuine than were enjoyed by any nation under heaven. Even their southern neighbours, they thought, though separated from Rome, still retained a great tincture of the primitive pollution; and their liturgy was represented as a species of mass, though with some less shew and embroidery. Great prejudices, therefore, were entertained against it, even considered in itself; much more when regarded as a preparative, which was soon to introduce into Scotland all the abominations of popery. And as the alterations which distinguished the new liturgy from the English, seemed to approach nearer to the doctrine of the real presence; this circumstance was deemed an undoubted confirmation of every suspicion with which the people were possessed (m).

Easter-day was, by proclamation, appointed for the first reading of the service in Edinburgh: but in order to judge more completely of men's dispositions, the council delayed the matter till the 23d of July; and they gave notice, the Sunday before, of their intention to commence the use of the new liturgy. As no considerable symptoms of discontent appeared, they thought that they might safely proceed in their purpose; and accordingly, in the cathedral church of St. Giles, the dean of Edinburgh, arrayed in his surplice, began the service; the bishop himself and many of the privy-council being present. But no sooner had the dean opened the book, than a multitude of people, clapping their hands, and crying out, "A pope! a pope! antichrist! stone him!" raised such a tumult, that it was impossible to proceed with the service. The bishop, mounting the pulpit, in order to appease the populace, had a stool thrown at him: the council was insulted; and it was with difficulty that the magistrates were able, partly by authority, partly by force, to expel the refractory, and to shut the doors against them. The tumult, however, still continued without: stones were thrown at the doors and windows; and when the service was ended, the bishop was attacked in his way home, and narrowly escaped from the hands of the enraged multitude. In the afternoon, the privy-seal, because he carried the bishop in his coach, was so pelted with stones, and hooted at with execrations, and pressed upon by the populace, that, if his servants, with drawn swords, had not kept them off, the bishop's life had been exposed to the utmost danger.

Though it was strongly suspected, that the low populace, who alone appeared, had been instigated by some of higher condition, yet no proof of it could be produced; and every one seemed displeased with the licentiousness of the giddy multitude. It was not thought safe, however, to hazard a new insult by any fresh attempt to read the liturgy; and the people appeared, for the time, to be appeased and satisfied. But it being known that the king still persevered in his intentions of imposing that mode of worship, men fortified themselves still farther in their prejudices against it; and great multitudes resorted to Edinburgh, in order to oppose the introduction of so hated a novelty. It was not long before they broke out in the most violent disorder. The bishop of Galloway was attacked in the streets, and chased into the chamber where the privy council was sitting, on the 18th of October. The council itself was besieged and violently attacked: the town-council met with a similar fate; and nothing could have saved the lives of all of them, but their application to some popular lords, who protected them, and dispersed the multitude. In this sedition, the actors were of some better condition than the former; though nobody of rank seemed, as yet, to countenance them.

But the people in general began to unite and to encourage each other, in opposition to the religious innovations introduced into the kingdom. Petitions to the council were signed and presented by persons of the highest quality: the women took part, and, as was usual, with violence: the clergy, every-where, loudly declaimed against popery and the liturgy, which they represented as intended to introduce the superstition of the church of Rome: the pulpits resounded with vehement invectives against antichrist; and the populace, who first opposed the service, was often compared to Balaam's ass, an animal, in itself, stupid and senseless, but whose mouth had been opened by the Lord, to the admiration of the whole world. In short, symptoms appeared, on all hands, of the most dangerous insurrection and disorder.

The primate, a man of wisdom and prudence, who was all along averse to the introduction of the liturgy, represented to the king the state of the nation. The earl of Traquaire, the treasurer, set out for London, in order to lay the matter more fully before him: every circumstance, whether the condition of England or of Scotland were considered, should have engaged him to desist from so hazardous an attempt. Yet was Charles inflexible. In his whole conduct of this affair, there appeared no marks of good sense.

To this violent combination, Charles had nothing to oppose but a proclamation; which he issued on the 19th of (m) One of the alterations was in the consecrating prayer. "Sanctify by thy word and spirit these creatures of bread and wine, that they may be to us the body and blood of thy beloved Son." One of the reasons which Charles, in a dedication, gave for these alterations, was, that the Roman party might not upbraid us with any material difference in our liturgy. Mad. Motteville, a domestic of Ann of Austria, in her Memoirs of that Princess's Life, says, That Charles put the service-book into his queen's hand, telling her, he would have her peruse it, that she might see how near they came to the faith. Guthrie, an historian observes, that Laud had a view to farther refinements in the English liturgy, in compiling a new one for Scotland, which had in it, both in the doctrinal and exterior part, more of popery than that which was at this time observed in England. May's History of the Parliament of England, fol. ed. 1647, p. 31, & seq. Fuller's Church Hist. book xi. p. 160. Guthrie's General Hist. of England, vol. iii. p. 935.

February,

February, 1638; and in which he pardoned all past offences, and exhorted the people to be more obedient for the future, and to submit peaceably to the use of the new liturgy. This proclamation was instantly encountered with a public protestation, presented by the earl of Hume and lord Lindesey. This was the first time that men of quality had appeared in any act of opposition. But this proved a crisis. The insurrection, which had been advancing by a gradual and slow progress, now blazed up at once (n). No disorder, however, attended it. On the contrary, a new order immediately took place. Four tables, as they were called, were formed in Edinburgh. One consisted of nobility, another of gentry, a third of ministers, a fourth of burgesses. The table of gentry was divided into many subordinate tables, according to their different counties. In the hands of the four tables, the whole authority of the kingdom was placed. Orders were issued by them, and every where obeyed, with the utmost regularity. And among the first acts of their government was the production of the COVENANT (o).

The king began to apprehend the consequences of this covenant, and in June following, he sent the marquis of Hamilton, as commissioner, with authority to treat with the covenanters. He required the covenant to be renounced and recalled; and he thought, that on his part he had made very satisfactory concessions, when he offered to suspend the canons and the liturgy, till, in a fair and legal way, they could be received; and so to model the high-commission, that it should no longer give offence to his subjects. Such general declarations could not well give content to any, much less to those who carried so much higher their pretensions. The covenanters found themselves seconded by the zeal of the whole nation. Above sixty thousand people were assembled in a tumultuous manner in Edinburgh and the neighbourhood: Charles possessed no regular forces in either of his kingdoms: and the discontents in England, though secret, was believed so violent, that the king, it was thought, would find it very difficult to employ in such a cause the power of that kingdom. The more, therefore, the popular leaders in Scotland considered their situation, the less apprehension did they entertain of royal power, and the more rigourously did they insist on entire satisfaction. In answer to Hamilton's demand of renouncing the covenant, they told him, that they would sooner renounce their baptism. The clergy even invited the commissioner himself to subscribe it, by informing him, "With what peace and comfort it had filled the hearts of all God's people; what resolutions and beginnings of reformation of manners were sensibly perceived in all parts of the nation, above any measure they had ever before found or could have expected; how great glory the Lord had received thereby; and what confidence they had that God would make Scotland a blessed kingdom (p)."

Hamilton returned to London: made another fruitless journey, with new concessions, to Edinburgh: returned again to London; and was immediately sent back with still more satisfactory concessions. The king appeared now willing to abolish the canons, the liturgy, and the high-commission court altogether. He feigned even a resolution to limit extremely the power of the bishops, and seemed content if on any terms he could retain that order in the church of Scotland. And to ensure all these offers, he gave Hamilton authority to summon first an assembly, then a parliament, where every national grievance might be redressed and remedied. These successive concessions of the king, which yet came very short of the rising demands of the malcontents, discovered his own weakness, encouraged their boldness, and gave no satisfaction. The offer, however, of an assembly and a parliament, in which they expected to be entirely masters, was willingly embraced by the covenanters.

Charles, perceiving what advantage his enemies had reaped from their covenant, resolved to have a covenant on his side; and therefore ordered one to be drawn up for that purpose. It consisted of the same violent renunciation of popery before mentioned; which, though the king did not approve of it, he thought it safest to adopt, in order to remove all the suspicions entertained against him. As the covenanters, in their bond of mutual defence against all opposition, had been careful not to except the king; Charles had formed a bond, which was annexed to this renunciation, and which expressed the duty and loyalty of the subscribers to his majesty. But the covenanters, perceiving that this new covenant was only meant to weaken and divide them, received it with the utmost scorn and detestation. And without delay they proceeded to model the future assembly, from which such great atchievements were expected.

The genius of that religion which prevailed in Scotland, and which every day was secretly gaining ground in England, was far from inculcating deference and submission to the ecclesiastics, merely as such. The clergy of Scotland, though such tumult was excited about religious worship and discipline, were both poor and in small numbers; nor are they in general to be considered as the ringleaders of the sedition, which was raised on their account. On the contrary, the laity, apprehending from several instances which occurred, a spirit of moderation in that order, resolved to take the lead entirely in the assembly, which was summoned, and to hurry on the ecclesiastics by the same zeal with which they were themselves actuated.

It had been usual, before the establishment of prelacy, for each presbytery to send to the assembly, besides two or three ministers, one lay-commissioner (q); and as all the boroughs and universities sent likewise commissioners, the lay-members in that ecclesiastical court nearly equalled the ecclesiastics. Not only this institution, which James, apprehensive of zeal in the laity, had abolished, was now revived by the covenanters: they also introduced an innovation which served still farther to reduce the clergy to subjection. By an edict of the tables, whose authority was supreme, an elder from each parish was ordered to attend the presbytery, and to give his vote in the choice both of the commissioners and ministers who should be deputed to the assembly. As it is not usual for the ministers who are put in the list of candidates, to claim a vote, all the elections by that means fell into the hands of the laity; and to every commissioner, four or five lay-assessors were chosen, who, though they could have no vote, might yet interpose with their advice and authority in the assembly.

The assembly met at Glasgow on the 21st of November; and, besides a great concourse of people, all the nobility and gentry of any family or interest were present, either as members, assessors, or spectators; and it was apparent, that the resolutions taken by the covenanters, could here meet with no manner of opposition. A firm determination had been entered into, of utterly abolishing episcopacy; and as a preparative to it, there was laid before the presbytery of Edinburgh, and solemnly read in all the churches of the kingdom, an accusation against the bishops, as guilty, all of them, of heresy, simony, bribery, perjury, cheating, incest, adultery, fornication, common swearing, drunkenness, gaming, breach of the sabbath, and every other crime that had occurred to the accusers. The bishops sent a protest, declining the authority of the assembly; the commissioner too protested against that court, as illegally constituted and elected; and, in his majesty's name, dissolved it. This measure was foreseen, and little regarded. The court still continued to sit, and to finish their business. All the acts of assembly, since the accession of James to the crown of England in 1605, were, upon pretty reasonable grounds, declared null and invalid. The acts of parliament which affected ecclesiastical affairs were supposed, on that very account, to have no manner of authority. And thus episcopacy (r), the high commission, the articles of Perth, the canons, and the liturgy, were abolished and declared unlawful; and the whole fabric, which James and Charles, in a long course of years, had been rearing with so much care and policy, fell at once to the ground. The (n) In the mean time the dissatisfied in Scotland had not been idle; for two large ships came into their ports laden with arms and ammunition.

(o) This famous covenant consisted first of a renunciation of popery, formerly signed by James in his youth. There followed a bond of union, by which the subscribers obliged themselves to resist religious innovations, and to defend each other against all opposition whatsoever. The people, without distinction of rank or condition, of age or sex, flocked to the subscription of this covenant; few, in their judgement, disapproved of it; and still fewer openly condemned it. The king's ministers and counsellors themselves were, most of them, seized by the general contagion. And none but rebels to God, and traitors to their country, it was thought, would withdraw themselves from so salutary and so pious a combination.

(p) Rushworth, vol. ii. p. 751.

(q) A presbytery in Scotland is an inferior ecclesiastical court, the same that was afterwards called a Classis in England, and is composed of the clergy of the neighbouring parishes to the number commonly of between twelve and twenty.

(r) All the bishops were deposed and excommunicated, except four, who never having approved of the conduct of their brethren, acknowledged the authority of the assembly, and submitted to return to the rank and calling of ordinary presbyters.

covenant likewise was ordered to be signed by every one, under pain of excommunication.

The independency of the ecclesiastical upon the civil power was the old presbyterian principle, which had been zealously adopted at the reformation, and which, though James and Charles had obliged the church publicly to disclaim it, had secretly been adhered to by all ranks of people. It was commonly asked, whether Christ or the king were superior? and as the answer seemed obvious, it was inferred that the assembly, being Christ's council, was superior in all spiritual matters to the parliament, which was only the king's. But as the covenanters were sensible that their transactions would not be assented to by the king; it became necessary to maintain their religious tenets by military force, and not to trust entirely to supernatural assistance, of which, however, they held themselves well assured. They cast their eyes on all sides, abroad and at home, whence they could expect any effectual assistance.

After France and Holland had entered into a league against Spain, and framed a treaty of partition, by which they were to conquer and to divide between them the Low Country provinces, England was invited, in 1639, to preserve a neutrality between the contending parties, while the French and Dutch should attack the maritime towns of Flanders. But the king replied to d'Estrades the French ambassador, who opened the proposal, that he had a squadron ready, and would cross the seas, if necessary, with an army of fifteen thousand men, in order to prevent these projected conquests. This answer irritated cardinal Richelieu; and in revenge, that politic and enterprising minister carefully fomented the first commotions in Scotland, and secretly supplied the covenanters with money and arms, in order to encourage them in their opposition against their sovereign.

But the chief resource of the Scottish malcontents was in themselves, and in their own vigour and abilities. No regular established commonwealth could take juster measures, or execute them with greater promptitude, than did this assembly. The whole kingdom was in a manner engaged; and the men of greatest abilities soon acquired the ascendant, which their family interest enabled them to maintain. Hamilton had given sir Thomas Hope, the king's advocate, orders to follow him to Glasgow, and prepare himself to defend episcopacy, and prove it to be according to the laws of Scotland: but though sir Thomas was a servant of the crown, he was an honest man, and loved the liberties of his country; he therefore answered, that it was against his conscience so to do; that he judged episcopacy to be contrary to the word of God, and to the laws of the church and kingdom. The lord Lorn, whose father, the earl of Argyle, a Roman Catholic, being lately dead, was now at full liberty to declare his principles, avowed the cause of the malcontents, and assisted in the business of the assembly. Argyle's example was followed by that of the lord Areskyn, eldest son to the earl of Marr, and three more of less note, who desired to be admitted to receive the covenant. The earls of Rothes, Cassils, Montrose, Lothian, the lords Lindesey, Loudon, Yester, Balmerino, distinguished themselves in that party.

The transactions of the Glasgow assembly caused both sides to pull off the mask, and openly prepare to defend by arms their several pretensions. The beginning of the year 1639 was spent in vigorous preparations against the Scots. Charles summoned all the English nobility to meet him at York, on the first of April following. In this he affected the ancient manner; but in this, as well as all other acts of administration, he was very defective in point of law: for the possessors of certain crown-lands lying in Northern counties were the only people obliged to furnish troops for the Northern borders. This was not the only unpopular method taken to support the destined war: the Papists shewed great zeal against the covenanters; and the queen, desirous of ingratiating her party of Recusants yet more into her husband's favour, wrote circular letters to the whole body, requiring them to contribute largely toward's the king's necessities. Her chief agent was sir Kenelm Digby, whose father had been executed for the Popish plot. A kind of emulation appeared between the Papists and the English clergy, who had been stimulated by Laud, to out-do each other in contributions towards the war against the Scots (s). This circumstance helped to cool the zeal of the rest of the English subjects, who called it "the bishops war," and in ridicule termed Charles "the archbishop of Canterbury's knight."

On the fame of these proceedings in England, the Scots seized on the castles of Edinburgh and Dumbarton, and on the arms and ammunition they found in the king's magazines; they made levies, formed an army, and appointed Alexander Leslie their general, an experienced officer, who had served with great reputation under the king of Sweden. The care of the coast adjacent to Ireland was committed to the earl of Argyle (t); and Aberdeen, the university of which had declared for the king, to the earl of Montross. They fortified Leith, the sea-port of Edinburgh: as this was a place of great consequence, the works were carried on with rapidity; not only the inferior sort, and those who assisted for pay, performed the drudgery of manual labour, but nobles, gentry, women of all ranks, laid aside the effeminacy of their manners, and emulating Grecian virtue, intermingled with the low herd, and carried on their shoulders the materials requisite for completing the fortifications. The covenant was sworn to by almost all the Scots in foreign parts, and the officers who had acquired reputation in Germany, under Gustavus, repaired home to assist their country in her present necessity.

The most active agent against this brave and determined people was the deputy of Ireland, a man who had entirely devoted himself to the worst designs of the court, and had run lengths that no English subject had ever yet done without paying the forfeit of his life. He was, from these circumstances, as much personally engaged in the quarrel as Charles himself. Not only the maintaining that station in the government, to the precarious enjoyment of which he had sacrificed his honour, the liberties of his country, and the liberties of his posterity, but even the security of his life, depended on the power of his master. He was so great a dupe to his own vicious affections, and had so little knowledge of the disposition of the English people towards the government, and their real sentiments on the important occasion of the intended war with Scotland, that he fancied the jealousy which had hitherto existed between the two nations, and which had flamed out violently on the partiality James had shewed to some of his Scotch subjects, would have made the English, notwithstanding all the insults and provocations they had received from the Stuart family, notwithstanding the subjected state of their once-free constitution, and the deprivation of all their privileges and immunities, assist their king in his pretensions on Scotland; and for the sake of distressing a people who had never done them any injury, exalt their real enemies, fix the yoke on their own necks, and become equal slaves with the people they assisted to conquer. Deceived by these idle notions, he gave the king the most violent counsel, indeed such as his circumstances would not permit him to practise; viz. the answering the demands of the covenanters with a true monarchical imperiousness—attacking the persons of the presbyters, and holding them in close imprisonment; but above all, not to submit to any essential concessions: "For should, argued he, these rude spirits carry it thus from the king's honour to their own churlish will, it would have a most fearful operation upon England; therefore God Almighty guide his majesty's counsels and strengthen his courage, for if he master not them, and this affair so much tending to the tranquillity of his kingdoms, to the honour of Almighty God, I shall be to seek for any probable judgement what is next like to befal us."

Whilst Wentworth thus advised the king to maintain to the utmost his assumed prerogatives, he was not wanting in his efforts to second these pretensions with a competent force. By the means of the standing army, he had made himself absolute master over Ireland, and had drawn down a body of men towards the sea-coast opposite to (s) The civilians also contributed their share. Laud had procured some privileges from the king in behalf of this body: that half of the masters in Chancery should be always civil lawyers, and that they should serve as masters of Request.

(t) The earl of Antrim, a weak, bragging man, who had married the duchess-dowager of Buckingham, pretended a title to part of the earl of Argyle's estate. Charles had the imprudence, before this nobleman had declared himself, to promise Antrim assistance in a scheme of invading Argyle's territories in Scotland. This served no other purpose than to give Argyle the alarm, and furnish him with a vindication, if he had wanted one, for the part he acted; since Antrim, though a grandson of Tyrone, and one of the heads of the popish party in Ireland, was, from the poverty of his circumstances, and the weakness of his abilities, unable to fulfil any part of his engagements. Strafford's Letters, vol. ii. p. 325.

Scotland, which prevented a junction between the covenanters in that country and the Scotch Presbyterians settled in Ireland. By the terrors of the same army, he imposed an arbitrary oath on that people; viz. "That they would maintain the king's power and authority, never take arms against it, nor protest against any of the royal commands, but submit themselves with all due obedience; that they would not enter any covenant, oath, or bond, without his majesty's sovereign and regal authority; and that they renounced and abjured all covenants, oaths, and bonds whatsoever, contrary to what they had in that oath sworn, promised, and professed.

The king approved highly of this act of power, and imposed the same oath on the Scots residing in England: but he found the Scots a more refractory body, for many submitted to imprisonment rather than comply with so illegal an injunction. Not only those who did not conform to the worship which had been newly established in Ireland were imprisoned, but the churchwardens were persecuted for not impeaching their fellow-parishioners (u). A well-appointed regiment of five hundred men was sent from that country to garrison the town of Carlisle. He had provided three hundred men for the relief of the castle of Dumbarton, furnished the magazines with arms and ammunition for eleven thousand men, and by the vast increase of the king's revenue was enabled to transmit thirty thousand pounds in money, with large quantities of provisions for victualling the frontier towns. Besides this, a thousand troops were raised in Ireland, and transported over to join the king's troops in the north. The lords-lieutenants of the several counties received orders for levying forces; the trained bands were mustered; and the officers who had gained experience in foreign service were ordered home. By these methods an army was raised, consisting of six thousand horse and twenty thousand foot, besides a squadron of ships with five thousand men on board, under the command of the marquis of Hamilton, who was to land in the Frith of Edinburgh, and endeavour to join the marquis of Huntley, a noted Papist, and a great partisan of the royal cause, to whom, with other noblemen, commissions had been sent impowering them to raise men for the king; whilst the fleet, under the command of the earl of Northumberland, was to stop the trade of the Scots, and make a diversion for guarding the coast. The earl of Arundel, a man thought to be very inveterate against the Scots, and suspected of popery, was for these reasons, notwithstanding his total ignorance of military affairs, appointed general of the army. The generalship of the horse was taken from the earl of Essex, to his great discontent, and, through the interest of the queen, given to the earl of Holland. Essex was made lieutenant-general of the army (v). Notwithstanding the necessary preparations which had been made by the covenanters to defend their liberty, yet they still kept up appearances, and sent a letter to the king with an account of the transactions of the assembly, accompanying it with a petition written in very submissive terms, nevertheless justifying their proceedings; the legality of which, they said, would appear in the ensuing parliament. At the same time they complained, that their enemies, with an intention to ruin them, had spread reports that they designed to invade England.

The king published two declarations, containing a full narrative of the rise and progress of the tumults in the north; but as they contained high encomiums of the discipline introduced into the church of England, with severe censures on the deformity of the Scotch worship, assertions against the covenanters, with a justification of the royal conduct, but without bringing any proof that it was conformable to the laws of Scotland, they could only convince those who, like Charles, were bigoted to Laud's new model of church-discipline, and who believed, with their prince, that infallibility was attached to sovereignty. At the end of the declaration (w), the king endeavours to convince his English subjects, that the intentions of the covenanters are, under the specious pretext of redressing religious grievances, to invade England, and enrich themselves with the spoils of the inhabitants of South Britain.

The Scots, on their side, dispersed in England a great number of papers, in which they set forth their grievances, and the king's intentions; disavowed having any purpose to molest the English; and intimated, that it concerned them, no less than themselves, to withstand the arbitrary power that Charles was grasping at in England as well as in Scotland. On the 27th of March, the king set out to join his troops at York, in which place he revoked sundry monopolies, licences, and commissions, granted by his letters-patent (x). This was intended as a popular act, but it was followed by another that was quite the reverse; the imposing on all the chief officers in the army, and the nobles assembled in the camp, by way of test, an oath professing loyalty and obedience to the king, and disclaiming and renouncing the having any intelligence, or holding any correspondence with the rebels. This oath was taken by all the Scots and others in the king's train, excepting the lord Say and the lord Brook, who had the spirit to refuse it, as an unconstitutional exaction: on this refusal they were confined to their houses (y).

The Scots sent addresses to the king at York, in which they desired to be admitted to his presence, and lay their grievances at his feet. They obeyed a proclamation published in Scotland to forbid them to approach within ten miles of the borders of England; and by this judicious behaviour, congruous to their professions, they convinced the English that the quarrel was entirely the king's, and that they were called out, not to defend their own property, as the courtiers endeavoured to make them believe, but to assist a wicked administration in the most unjustifiable designs, against a people to whom they were in a manner united by the parity of circumstances, and similarity of grievances. If Charles had already claimed a superiority over the laws of England, how fatally might he make those pretensions good when he had reduced Scotland to (u) Archibald Adair, a Scotchman, bishop of Killala, for having refused to prefer one Corbet, a Scotch parson, who had written a libel against his countrymen the covenanters, and for having dropped some sentiments in favour of that party, was by Wentworth's directions brought by a pursuivant before the high-commission court at Dublin, and sentenced to be fined, imprisoned, and deprived. He was succeeded by John Maxwell, one of the most hot-headed of the Scotch bishops. Carte's Life of Ormond, vol. i. p. 95, & seq.

(v) Notwithstanding the enormous sums of money which the king had by various means extorted from his people, yet such was his dissipation, that he had at this time no provision of money to support a war: this appears by the following passage in a letter of the earl of Northumberland's to the deputy of Ireland. "The martial preparations here have made a great noise; but I assure your lordship, we are in as ill a posture to invade others as we were a twelvemonth since. The discontents at home do rather increase than lessen. The king's coffers were never emptier than they are at this time; and to us that have the honour to be near about him, no way is yet known how he will find means either to maintain or begin a war, without the help of his people." Northumberland, in a letter to his brother-in-law the earl of Leicester, says, that such was the poverty of the court, that no servant of the king's, of what condition soever, could get either wages or pension paid. Strafford's Letters, vol. ii. p. 207. Sydney's State Papers, vol. ii. p. 636.

(w) One of the paragraphs in what is called the lesser declaration is so true a picture of Charles's sentiments concerning the sacredness of his office, that it is worth inserting. "They have treacherously, (said he,) induced many of our people to swear to a bond against us; which bond and covenant, or rather conspiracy of theirs, could not be with God, because against us, the Lord's anointed over them. But it was and is a bond and covenant pretended to be with God, that they may with the better countenance do the works of the Devil, such as all treasons and rebellions are."

(x) This act, intended to conciliate the minds of the exasperated people, was a very injudicious piece of politics, since it gave the public a taste of the advantages they received from the distressed situation of their king; and convinced them of the utility of keeping him in a state of dependence on their good-will, since it was only on occasions that he wanted the assistance of his subjects to maintain his power, that he could be brought to do them justice. The following are some of the monopolies and commissions that were called in, noted here because they have not been yet mentioned in this history. A commission touching scriveners and brokers. A commission for compounding with offenders touching tobacco. A commission for compounding with offenders for transporting of butter. A commission for compounding with offenders in the importing and using logwood. A commission to compound with sheriffs, and such as have been sheriffs, for selling their under-sheriffs places. A commission for compounding for destruction of woods in iron-works. A commission for concealments and encroachments within twenty miles of London. A licence to transport sheep-skins and lamb-skins. A commission to take men bound to dress no venison, pheasants, or partridges, in inns, alehouses, &c. A commission touching the use of wine-casks. A commission for licensing of brewers. A licence for the sole transporting of lamperns. A grant for weighing hay and straw in London and Westminster, and three miles compass. An office of register to the commission for bankrupts in divers counties of the realm. An office or grant for gauging of red-herrings. An office or grant for sealing bone-lace. A grant of privilege touching kelp or sea-weed. An office or grant of factory for Scottish merchants. An office or grant for the searching and sealing of foreign hops. An office or grant for the sealing of buttons. All grants of fines, penalties, and forfeitures, before judgement granted, mentioned to be granted, by letters-patent, privy-seals, signets, sign-manual, or otherwise. The several grants of incorporation made unto hatband-makers, lutestring-makers, spectacle-makers, comb-makers, tobacco-pipe-makers, butchers, and horners. Rushworth, vol. iii. p. 915, & seq.

(y) The examples of the lord Say and the lord Brook occasioned other lords, who had taken the oath, to make a protestation of what sense they took it in. This protestation was so offensive to the court, that the oath was not offered afterwards. Strafford's Letters, vol. ii. p. 351.

a conquered province, when he could pour forth armies of disciplined slaves to feed on the pastures of those who should venture to oppose him in the rest of his dominions? It was in this view, and in these circumstances only, that the Scots were to be dreaded by their southern neighbours. On the contrary, whilst they maintained a free and independent spirit, their generous example and assistance might encourage England to pursue the glorious track, and recover, by the way of arms, her lost laws and liberties. Thus argued the chief officers in the English army.

Charles, who was sanguine in all things that concerned his authority, imagined that the Scots obeyed him through fear, and detached the earl of Holland, with three thousand foot and a thousand horse, to march into Scotland by the way of Kelso; the earl of Essex had been sent before to take possession of Berwick. Lesley advanced, at the head of four or five thousand men, to meet Holland: favoured by his situation, he drew up his forces in a manner that made them appear double their real number, and Holland received intelligence that there were yet twenty-four thousand behind. On this he dispatched orders to stop the march of his foot; and returning back, spread through the whole camp the alarm of the enemies great force. On the retreat of Holland, the Scots, instead of advancing, drew back, and sent letters to each of the English generals, assuring them, that they had not the least idea of entering into a war against England, their only intent being to defend their rights and liberties till they might have access to his majesty to expose their complaints to him. Soon after this, the Scots sent the earl of Dumfermling with a petition to the king, entreating him to appoint commissioners to negociate a peace. This was seconded by the voluntary advice of almost all the nobility which surrounded the camp; and Charles was in a manner obliged, contrary to those schemes of conquest he had projected, to enter into a treaty with the Scots, and countermand the orders he had sent to Hamilton to do what mischief he could to the rebels (z): Hamilton has been much condemned by the violent royalists and prelates for the moderate part he acted in the execution of his orders against the Scots. This nobleman, though Charles's minion, and fattened with the oppressions of the people (a), yet had not arrived to the profligate selfishness of a Wentworth. He could not look without horror on the prospect of his country conquered by Charles, and taking the law from a triumvirate (b), with whose arbitrary principles he was thoroughly acquainted. Full of these apprehensions, he was far from being in a hurry to perform the violent commands of his master, and always represented the state of the covenanters in a very formidable light, but particularly when sent down with a force that, many authors are of opinion, might have brought the mal-contents to any terms of submission; it was from these representations that he received commands not to act on the offensive, but to amuse the covenanters with the prospect of a treaty, till Scotland should be invaded by the king's army (c); and it was at the time that Holland had received orders to attack the Scots, that he was commanded to commence hostilities. He obeyed so punctually the king's directions to keep on the defensive, that the commission of lieutenancy he sent to the zealous Huntley was so full of these cautions, that Huntley parleyed with the enemy, and was sent prisoner to the castle of Edinburgh for refusing to sign the covenant.

Besides the compunctions which a man of any degree of virtue must have in Hamilton's affecting circumstances, an interesting occasion excited his humane feelings. The covenanters, after the example of the Romans in the same exigencies, sent Hamilton's mother to try her influence over her son: she was a pious woman, and a warm covenanter, and no doubt made use of those strong arguments the subject would admit, to make him forbear from any hostile attempts on his country. Whatever might be his resolutions on entering the Frith, like Coriolanus he could not resist the united solicitations of two parents, nor break through that double tie of filial duty with which he was bound both to his country and the fair negociator. Thus circumstanced, he received, no doubt with infinite pleasure, Charles's orders to repair to Berwick, and assist with his advice in the intended treaty. He obeyed this command with such alacrity, that the earl of Airly, and Aboyne, (Huntley's son,) who had taken up arms in the north, were sacrificed by his abrupt departure.

The king insisted, previous to entering on the negociation, that the proclamation, which the covenanters would not suffer to be read at Edinburgh, should be published at the head of the Scottish army: on this punctilio being complied with, commissioners were named for the treaty. On the king's side were the earls of Arundel, Essex, Holland, Salisbury, Berkshire, and secretary Cook; on that of the Scots, the earls of Rothes, Dumfermling, and and Lowdon, sir William Douglas, the sheriff of Teviotdale, and two ministers, Johnson and Henderson. When the commissioners had met in the earl of Arundel's tent, and were on the point of entering on the treaty, they were surprized with the sudden appearance of the king, who addressing himself to the Scotch deputies, told them, that understanding they gave out they could not be heard, he was come to hear them in person. This proceeding shocked the commissioners; they concluded that the treaty was never intended by the king to be a fair one, since himself, the sovereign of both people, and a principal party concerned, over-awed by his presence the freedom of debate. The earl of Rothes evaded entering into particulars, and said in general, that all they desired was to be secured in their religion and liberties. The earl of Lowdon, younger than Rothes, and full of ardour, was entering into an harangue; but he was interrupted by Charles in the following strain: "Sir, I will not admit of any of your excuses for your by-past actions; but if you come to sue for grace, set down your desires particularly in writing, and you shall receive your answer." On this, the Scotch deputies set down the following demands, with constitutional reasons and grounds for them: "That the acts of the late assembly at Glasgow should be ratified in the ensuing parliament; that all matters ecclesiastical should be determined by the assemblies of the kirk, and matters civil by parliament; that his majesty's ships, and forces by land, be recalled; that all persons, ships, and goods, arrested, be restored; and that all excommunicated persons, incendiaries, and informers against the kingdom, who had caused these commotions for their own private ends, might be given up, to suffer their deserved censure and punishment."

These demands threw the king into the utmost perplexity: he had gone too far to retreat without offending the English, who seemed desirous that the Scots should be satisfied in all their reasonable desires. The demands they had made he did not chuse to grant, yet he could not deny but they were agreeable to the principles of their constitution. After Charles had published the horrible rebellion of the Scots, after having levied a powerful army and fitted out a fleet to defend England against their attack, these reputed rebels, these barbarous robbers and invaders, in a pacific manner fling themselves at his feet, and implore leave to enjoy their civil and religious rights (d), and that those incendiaries who had endeavoured to set two neighbour-kingdoms, united under one sovereign, at variance, might be tried by the laws of their country, and receive the punishment they deserved. The reasonableness of these requests could not be disputed; were they peremptorily refused, it would fully convince the public how grossly they had been abused by Charles's representation, and that the Scots had more reason for their opposition than he chose to allow. Perplexed with these difficulties, he concluded a sudden pacification, without other than general stipulations: that the king should withdraw his fleet and army; the Scots dismiss their forces; the king's forts be restored to him; that there should be no meetings among his subjects but such as were warranted by parliament; and that a general assembly and parliament should be immediately summoned to compose all differences.

The king's answers to the demands of the Scots were very ambiguous, and both sides appeared eager to get out of their present situation, and avoid coming to extremities. It cannot be supposed that the Scots would have been content with general stipulations, had they not found the king, contrary to their expectation, accompanied with an army of twenty-two thousand men. They had imagined that the general discontent of the English nation would have rendered it impossible for him to bring any considerable force against them: to their great astonishment they found themselves deceived (e); and moreover, their trade was entirely stopped by the king's fleet. In these circumstances the Scotch deputies thought it expedient to accept of terms, expressed in a manner that would bear interpretation for them, when a proper opportunity offered to discuss the point. The king, though his army was infinitely superior so that of the Scots, was not without suspicions that they might betray him; if not, it was a doubtful point whether they would venture their lives in his quarrel; and the loss of a battle might be the loss of his three kingdoms. He therefore did not hesitate to promise, that the Scots should enjoy their religion and liberties according to the ancient laws of that kingdom, determining to construe these terms in a sense that should do no injury to his pretensions. The deputies being returned to their camp, their principals were greatly disappointed to find that in the stipulations no mention was made of the abolition of episcopacy, nor acknowledgement of the Glasgow-assembly. The deputies therefore drew up a paper containing certain qualifications, which they asserted ought to have the force of positive stipulations.

The Scots, on the encouragement they had met with in their intercourse with the English noblemen, entered a public protestation, that they did not intend to vacate any of the proceedings of the late general assembly at Glasgow, by which prelacy was abolished, and the bishops excommunicated; and declared, that the acts of the approaching session of the college of justice should be null, because it was appointed without a legal notice, to their great prejudice. Charles's pride was hurt by not having been able to chastise the Scots, or to have reduced them to submissive acknowledgements; and soon repented having concluded on terms he thought much too honourable for rebels. These resentments, on his return to London, were much inflamed by the queen and Laud: the queen upbraided him with cowardice for having lost the opportunity of crushing rebellion in its bud, and, by an example of vengeance on the Scots, deterred others from attempting to oppose royal authority. Laud was quite furious in his rage, and stigmatized all those who had any hand in the pacification. The army was disbanded with marks of displeasure; Arundel, Salisbury, and Pembroke, were treated with coolness; Holland, though supported by the queen, could hardly maintain a footing in the court; and Essex, who had obeyed every direction that had been given him with the utmost punctuality, and whose behaviour in this business is commended by the courtiers, was notwithstanding discharged in the crowd, without ceremony or any ordinary civility paid him; and some time after refused the command of the forest of Needwood, a suit which he had made with earnestness, because the forest was contiguous to his estate.

Secretary Cook, that old drudge of the court, and tool of every administration, was made the sacrifice to appease the queen's anger and the king's chagrin: though near fourscore years of age, he was turned out of his office, on pretence that he inserted something in the treaty which he ought not to have done. This disgrace put on the old man was much against Wentworth's inclination, whose creature Cook had ever professed himself: moreover, the deputy was farther mortified by sir Henry Vane's being appointed to the secretary's office, a man whom he utterly detested, whose advancement he had stopped for some time, and for whom the queen and the marquis of Hamilton exerted all their interest.

Charles next vented his displeasure on the paper published by the Scots, alledged to be the grounds and substance of the treaty: it was ordered to be burnt, and a proclamation was issued, commanding all persons who had any copies to deliver them to the justices of peace (f). This gave general alarm to the Scots, and though the king had disbanded his troops without reserve, they took such precautions in dismissing their forces as made it easy to draw them together again, and continued the authority to their tables, alledging it was necessary they should act till all danger was past.

From the first signing the pacification, Charles had expressed uneasiness concerning what might be agitated in the approaching general assembly and parliament in Scotland. To gain over some of the heads of the popular party, he summoned fourteen of the covenanting lords to attend him at Berwick, to consult on the affairs of their country: The Scots apprehended treachery, and would not permit above three of their chiefs to obey the mandate; these were Montrose, Lowdon, and Lothian. The two last resisted all the temptations they met with in this interview; but Montrose, a young and giddy nobleman, of no fixed principles, was immediately gained over by the affected smiles of a court, and soon convinced his party that he was not a man in whom they could place any confidence.

During the interval of peace an incident happened which equally alarmed the subjects of England and Scotland (g). Cardinal Richelieu had concerted measures with the prince of Orange to make a vigorous attack on the dominions of the king of Spain. The Dutch, with a French subsidy, were enabled to fit out a large fleet to go against Antwerp, whilst France undertook to besiege St. Omers. The court of Spain having intelligence of the intentions of these powers, fitted out a squadron consisting of fifty ships, with twelve thousand foot on board, which was to join another squadron lying at Dunkirk. The vigilant Richelieu gave advice of this armament to the prince of Orange, who received intelligence from a spy, chief clerk to the government at Brussels, that the Spanish general, Antonio Doguendo, was instructed to put himself under the protection of the English fleet, and to land his men on the coast of Flanders. In the straits between Dover and Calais, the Spanish fleet was met by Van Tromp, the Dutch admiral, who, with a very inferior force, engaged them, and forced them into the Downs. The prince of Orange seized the opportunity of revenging the insults his country had lately received from Charles: he sent the Dutch admiral, Van Tromp, a strong reinforcement, with orders to pursue and fight the enemy, though sheltered under the protection of England. Van Tromp signified to the English admiral, that if he took part with the Spaniards his orders were to fight both fleets. In vain did the Spaniards demand the assistance they had sought from their professed friend the king of England. Charles's fleet, notwithstanding the heavy tax he had exacted on the pretence of shipping, was in very bad order, nor could he be certain of the obedience of the sailors, who, with the rest of his subjects, were impressed with a notion that the Spaniards were come to assist him in his schemes of government, and to subdue all opposition to the tyranny of priesthood. The Spanish fleet was ill provided, and though consisting of sixty-seven ships, was much inferior in number to the Dutch, whose mighty force was no less than an hundred large vessels. In these distressing circumstances, Charles endeavoured to maintain the appearance of impartiality, and sent orders to sir John Pennington, who lay in the Downs with thirty-four men of war, to join that fleet which should be first attacked. At the same time, he advised the Spaniards to slip away with the first fair wind, for he could not be answerable for the success of an engagement if they were attacked by the Dutch. Charles's scheme was frustrated by Van Tromp, who began the attack on pretence that the Spaniards had violated their privilege of protection by killing a seaman on board his own barge. This circumstance furnished Pennington with an excuse to keep the desired neutrality. The Spaniards, who had found means to run over twelve of their ships to Dunkirk, were hemmed in on all sides by the Dutch, who forced them to run twenty-three vessels a-shore, seven of which were destroyed; of the rest of the fleet, sixteen ships were taken, two burnt, and fourteen lost near Bullogne and Calais; the remaining number of twenty-three, forced a-shore, after having been deserted by the Spaniards, were manned by the English, and delivered to their owners. In this complete victory, the Dutch lost but ten ships; and thus the naval armament of Spain, to the great joy of the English subjects, who had conceived an inexpressible terror at their first appearance, met with an irrecoverable blow, though sheltered in a manner in the very arms of their secret ally the king of England (h). Charles complained loudly of this insult, and made use of it as an argument to exact with redoubled severity the tax of ship-money.

(f) Guthrie the historian observes, that Charles was so little cured of his execrable notions of government by the difficulties he had met with from the Scots, that he minuted this order in the council-book by the name of an Act of State, a term introduced by him, and which implied, that it ought to have the force of an act of parliament. Guthrie, vol. iii. p. 968.

The marquis of Hamilton, who found that Charles did not intend to be sincere in his dealings with the Scots, and that he was determined against the total abolition of episcopacy, the only concession that could content the covenanters, declined acting again as high-commissioner. On his refusal, the earl of Traquaire was invested with that office. Traquaire's instructions were minutely drawn up; among other articles were the following concerning bishops: "For the better facilitating our other services, and the more peaceable and plausible progress in all businesses recommended to you, we allow you, at any time you shall find most convenient after opening the assembly, to declare, that notwithstanding our own inclination, or any other considerations, we are contented, for our people's full satisfaction, to remit episcopacy and the estates of bishops to the freedom of that assembly; but so as no respect be had to the determination of the point in the last assembly. But in giving way to the abolishing episcopacy, be careful that it may be done without the appearing of any warrant from the bishops; and if any offer to appear for them, you are to enquire for their warrant, and carry the dispute so as the conclusion seem not to be made in prejudice of episcopacy as unlawful, but only in satisfaction to the people, for settling the present disorders, and such other reasons of state; but herein you must be careful that our intentions appear not to any."

On the perusal of these articles, an unobserving reader would imagine, that Charles intended to leave off trifling, and answer to the full expectations and wishes of his Scotch subjects. This was far from his intention. The appearance of a concession, contrary to the dictates of his conscience, and his principles of government, was a meer subterfuge, and never intended but to deceive. At the same time that these instructions were given to Traquaire, a letter was sent to the bishops, with directions to give in to the commissioner a protestation against the assembly and parliament, not to be read or argued in the assembly: "But, says the letter, to be represented to us by our commissioner, which we promise to take so into consideration as becometh a prince sensible of his own interest and honour, joined with the equity of your desires. And you may rest secure, that though perhaps we may give way for the present to that which will be prejudicial both to the church and our own government, yet we shall not leave thinking in time how to remedy both: we do hereby assure you, that it shall be still one of our chiefest studies how to rectify and establish the government of that church aright, and to repair your losses, which we desire you to rest satisfied with."

Thus did Charles imagine, that a protestation from the bishops would affect both the conclusions of the assembly and parliament; for as bishops, in his opinion, had a right which they could never be deprived of but by their own consent, so the determinations of a parliament, from which they were forcibly excluded, would of course be invalid; and thus, when a proper opportunity presented, its acts might be declared vacate, though they obtained the royal assent (i).

The Scots, however, had very good intelligence of all the schemes plotted at court; and though after the pacification they quitted the form of an army, yet they kept together in bodies, and retained all their officers in pay; they carried on their fortifications, and bought up large quantities of arms in foreign states. Thus prepared, when the synod met, they declared all those assemblies null which had been condemned in the last meeting, and passed an act, which was ratified by the commissioner, with a promise that he would ratify the same in parliament, imputing the troubles of the kingdom to the following causes: the liturgy, the canons, consecration, ordination, the five articles of Perth, the change of church-government into episcopacy, the introduction of ecclesiastics into civil offices, and the interruption of general assemblies. The covenant was commanded to be subscribed, with a new explanation, and another assembly was appointed to meet at Aberdeen, in the month of July in the following year (k). On the new explanation of the covenant, it was taken by the commissioner and the rest of the council (l). Though the explanation was favourable to the royal authority, and was a great point gained, as matters then stood, yet Traquaire incurred the resentment of his master for a compliance which shocked both his pride and principles (m).

The conduct of the parliament was no less animated than that of the general assembly. The covenanting party shone forth in the meridian of their glory; and such was the influence of the spirit of liberty, that these northern chiefs, the inhabitants of an hitherto uncivilized country, had conducted their opposition to tyranny with a regularity and judgement that would have graced the councils of an established commonwealth. And when by wise and vigorous measures they had extorted from their unwilling sovereign a parliament, to settle the civil and religious rights of the nation, they exerted talents that rivalled the reputation of Grecian legislators. The scheme of the party was to rectify and fix the constitution of Scotland, till now inconsistent, precarious, and unsettled; and this sagacious parliament, composed of the chief members of the opposition, seem in their purposed model to have in view some of the purest and firmest fundamentals in the system of the English monarchy. The first attempt was to abolish the lords of the articles, and thus reinstate the parliament in that authority which had, by means of this institution, been engrossed by the crown. They presented to the high-commissioner an act, declaring, that nothing done, or to be done, in parliament, should be valid, except the form of electing articles heretofore observed were altered, and every estate allowed to chuse their own articles (n). The act of the general assembly concerning episcopacy was ratified; and on the commissioners demanding, that the third estate should be represented by fourteen lay-abbots of the king's chusing, it was rejected with spirit; and a vote passed, that the third estate should be completed by small barons, to be elected by the commonalty.

The next business the parliament undertook was to abridge the power of the crown in the point of coin, a privilege which rendered property precarious and dependent on the monarch. To secure the subject from this grievance, they passed an act ordaining, that the coin should not be meddled with but by advice in parliament. The king having made two Englishmen governors of the castles of Edinburgh and Dumbarton, the Scots took the alarm, and, that they might not be bridled with foreign garrisons, presented an act, ordaining, that no strangers should be intrusted with the keeping any castles, nor other person put in them, but by advice of the estates. The next act ordained, that no patent of honour should be granted to any stranger, but such as had a competency of land-rent in Scotland: this was very important to the security of the country, since,

"We do swear not only our mutual concurrence and assistance for the cause of religion, and to the utmost of our power, with our means and lives, to stand to the defence of our dread sovereign and his authority in the preservation and defence of the said religion, liberties, and laws of this kirk and kingdom, but also in every cause which may concern his majesty's honour, we shall, according to the laws of this kingdom, and duty of good subjects, concur with our friends and followers, in quiet manner or in arms, as we shall be required of his majesty's council, or any having his authority." The following clause was prefixed to the names of the subscribers: "We subscribe this covenant according to the explanation it hath received from the general assembly; that is, as declaring the five articles of Perth, the government of the church by bishops, and the bestowing of civil places on churchmen, to be unlawful in this church." Traquaire avowed, that he signed the covenant as a subject, not as his majesty's high-commissioner. Nalson, vol. i. p. 253. Rapin, vol. x. p. 387. Monteth, p. 50.

without this restriction, Charles might have filled the parliament with Englishmen, the creatures of his court. The sixth act ordained, that no commission of justiciary or lieutenancy should be granted but for a limited time. And the seventh protested against the precedency of the lord-treasurer and lord-privy-seal, because not warranted by law (o). There were other salutary acts passed of the same nature; such as settling the book of rates by advice of parliament; limiting the power of the exchequer; demanding that the council should be censurable by parliament; an act touching proxies and ward-lands, with a supplication that the authors of the book called, "The Large Declaration," in which the Scots had been grossly abused, should be delivered up to the justice of the kingdom (p). Charles receiving intelligence of these proceedings, ordered his commissioner to prorogue the parliament till the second of June, 1640; and if he met with opposition, to declare that the members who should continue to sit were guilty of high-treason (q).

The parliament drew up a declaration, setting forth the irregularity of these proceedings; that the commissioners had infringed their privileges in many articles, and that the prorogation of the parliament, without their own consent, was contrary to the usage of the kingdom; and that though they were willing to break up, to give the king a proof of their obedience, yet they thought it necessary to leave a committee of each estate to present a remonstrance to his majesty, and attend his gracious answer.

The earls of Dumfermling and Lothian were sent to present this to the king, and to demand the royal assent to the acts that had passed this parliament. The king refused to give the deputies audience, on pretence that they came without a warrant from his commissioner. When the earl of Traquaire arrived, he was ordered to report to the English council what had passed in Scotland since the pacification. The council, without being acquainted with the constitution of the kingdom, the legality of the passed transactions, the rationality of the claims, precipitately declared, that it was absolutely necessary to reduce the Scots to their duty by the force of arms (r). The committee at Edinburgh at length obtained leave to send deputies to justify the conduct of the parliament. These refused to plead before a committee of the council, and alledged that they were sent to the king and not to the council of England, who had no jurisdiction over the Scots. The king at length vouchsafed to give them a personal audience, in the presence of the appointed committee. The earl of Lowdon was the mouth of the deputation: he vindicated all that had been done in Scotland, and insisted, in a decent though determined manner, on the confirmation of the constitutional points, Charles pretended to believe, that the deputies were come to treat with him about concessions: he first asked him, how he could be sure they were sent by the people they pretended to represent? and then what power they had to give him satisfaction? The deputies, after shewing their authorities, answered, if what they had to propose was agreeable to law, they were convinced his majesty would be satisfied. Who is to be judge of that, said the king? The law, returned the deputies, is so clear, that there is no need of a judge. Charles, after trifling in this manner, declared, that the deputies were not invested with proper authority to treat about an accommodation; that their application was undutiful; and that enough had been done already to give the Scots satisfaction (s).

Determined on war, the king published a declaration to vindicate his own conduct and accuse the Scots. In this he endeavoured to stir up the resentment of the English against them, on the objection made to the intrusting of important charges in the hands of strangers; and attempted to shew that all their demands were not only illegal but absurd. Traquaire, who was hated by the prelates on a suspicion that he had betrayed them, and who had incurred the king's resentment for the moderation with which he had behaved in the character of his commissioner, found that he could no otherwise stand his ground but by humouring the inclination of the court for a war, and inveighing with great animosity against his countrymen. He represented, that they were not to be satisfied; that the circumstance of the king's strength in Scotland was such, that if a better concerted invasion were set on foot, Ruthwen, the governor of the castle of Edinburgh, would soon teach them their duty (t). To furnish the king with a pretext for hostile resolutions, he put into his hands a letter he had picked up, written by seven of the covenanting lords to the king of France, desiring his protection and assistance. This letter (u), on the pacification, had been reserved, and never sent.

To the astonishment of the English court, now, for the first time, was discovered the real source from whence the Scots had obtained their assistance of men and money. Charles had attributed it to the Dutch, or to the party of Calvinists spread over Europe: he never apprehended that the reformed, whom he, a Protestant prince, had treated with the utmost rigour, at the same time that he was courting the triple crown at Rome, could receive encouragement from a prelate of the Romish church; and so much was he impressed with his father's notion of a sympathetic amity among sovereigns, that he imagined brother-monarchs bound by every tie moral and political to assist each other against rebellious subjects. It was the part he had always acted, when he followed the impulse of his own inclinations in the quarrel between the king of France and the Protestants of that kingdom. The false light in which he viewed these things, rendered him obnoxious to the revengeful spirit of the cardinal Richelieu.

To secure the success of the scheme which Richelieu, with the states, had formed on the Austrian Netherlands, it was necessary at least to obtain a neutrality from the king of England. To bring about this business, d'Estrade was sent by the cardinal to the English court, with instructions to offer the king his own terms. Richelieu gave (q) The following directions, which the king wrote to Traquaire on the business of the parliament, furnish a fresh proof of the insincerity of his intentions in regard to the Scots. "As we have formerly written to you, we cannot consent to the rescinding any acts of parliament made in favour of episcopacy; nor do we conceive that our refusal to abolish those acts is contradictory to what we have consented to, or to what we were obliged to. There is less danger in discovering any future intentions of ours, or at the best letting them guess at the same, than if we should permit the rescinding those acts of parliament which our father with so much expence of time and industry established, and which may hereafter be of great use to us. And though it should perhaps cast all loose (as you express) yet we take God to witness, we have permitted them to do many things in this assembly, for establishing of peace, contrary to our judgement. And if, on this point, a rupture happen, we cannot help it; the fault is on their part, which one day they will smart for. We likewise wrote formerly to you, that we thought it not fit at this time that the power of the lords of articles should be refined, and that you are to avoid the same, and to be sure not to consent thereunto." Memoirs of the Duke of Hamilton, p. 158, & seq.

(r) The earl of Morton said, that the king had given the Scots leave to petition in parliament for redress, there was not sufficient ground for war till their reasons were heard. On this the earl of Strafford peremptorily asserted, that there was ground enough for war. Nalson, vol. ii. p. 82.

(s) Laud, who was one of the members of the committee, entered into a dispute with the deputies, and alledged, that the king was not obliged to ratify the conclusions of the assembly; the deputies affirmed that he was. In the course of this dispute Laud grew warm, and said, that the clergy of England in their convocation-house did not assume such authority as the general assembly of Scotland. To this the deputies answered, that the comparison would not hold; for the convocation-house, which did only consist of prelates, and a part of the clergy, was of a different nature from their general assemblies, where his majesty or his commissioner sat, and where the whole congregations and parishes of the kingdom were represented by their commissioners from presbyteries, so that what was done by them was done by the whole church and kingdom. At this Laud exclaimed, with great heat, "That the convocation-house in England was as eminent a judicature as the general assembly in Scotland; that the clergy and himself had been a long time members of the parliament; and that neither the English nor any reformed church had lay-elders as the Scotch had in their assemblies, and he would lose his life before they should have them. Rushworth, vol. iii. p. 998, & seq.

(t) A little time after this, a great part of the walls of Edinburgh-castle, mounted with cannon, fell down of themselves, and the covenanters prevented their being rebuilt.

(u) It was at follows:

"Sir, your majesty being the refuge and sanctuary of afflicted princes and states, we have found it necessary to send this gentleman, Mr. Colvill, to represent unto your majesty the candour and ingenuity, as well of our actions and proceedings, as of our intentions; which we desire to be engraved and written to the whole world, with a beam of the sun, as well as to your majesty. We therefore most humbly beseech you, Sir, to give faith and credit to him, and to all that he shall say on our part touching us and our affairs, being most assured, Sir, of an assistance equal to your wonted clemency, heretofore and so often shewed to this nation; which will not yield the glory to any other whatsoever to be eternally, Sir, your majesty's most humble, most obedient, and most affectionate servants, Rothes, Montrose, Lesley, Marr, Montgomery, Lowdon, Forrester."

Bishop Burnet says, that this letter was proposed and dictated by the earl of Montrose; that when it was brought to the earl of Lauderdale to sign, he objected that it was written in false French; and that on this objection it was laid aside for some time. Burnet's History of His Own Times, vol. i. p. 30.

d'Estrade particular directions to make his first applications to Henrietta, to endeavour to remove the prejudice she had taken against him, and to make professions on his part of a desire to serve her, and to destroy by his actions the ill offices that had been done him by madame de Chevreuse. Henrietta received the cardinal's civilities with all the haughtiness that could be expected from her inexperience, pride, and passionate temper: she not only silenced d'Estrade on his offering to enter on a vindication of Richelieu's conduct, but told him, that she wanted nothing of that minister, and was determined never to have any friendship for him. The answer that Charles made to the proposal of the ambassador was as impolitic as was that of the queen: on d'Estrade's assuring him, that if he would comply on the subject of the desired neutrality, the cardinal would prevail with the French king to send him assistance against such of his subjects as might have rebellious views, he answered, that he had no occasion of foreign aid to reduce his subjects; and should be so far from observing a neutrality, that he was determined to have a fleet in the Downs with fifteen thousand troops on board, ready to land in Flanders in case of need. Richelieu received the intelligence of the manner in which his offers and civilities had been refused with that indignant spirit of revenge which might have been expected from a man conscious of his power, abilities, and consequence.

This happened at the beginning of the breaking out of the commotions in Scotland. D'Estrade received immediate orders to withdraw into Holland, to persuade the prince of Orange to attack Antwerp, with intelligence that Richelieu would send his almoner, a Scotchman, to Edinburgh, to encourage the Scots in their undertakings against Charles, and to promise them the assistance of the king of France. "It is proper and advantageous, (wrote he in his dispatches to d'Estrade,) to discover the sentiments of the king and queen of England: if they had had the address to conceal them, they would have perplexed us greatly. But before the end of the twelvemonth they shall repent their having refused the offers which you made them from his majesty. You could not have spoken better, nor could you have better answered the king of England on my account: he shall soon know that I am not despicable."

On the discovery of the letter, Colvil and the earl of Lowdon were sent to the Tower. Lowdon vindicated himself on the following plea: that the letter was written before the pacification, and for that reason was buried in oblivion. He offered to be tried by his peers in Scotland, from which place, he said, he came on his majesty's warrant, and ought to be returned back again a freeman. It is reported, that Charles was much inclined to deprive him of his life; but was dissuaded from this violent measure by the marquis of Hamilton, who was sensible of the mischief the king would bring on himself by such a procedure (v). The enraged party at court, being determined at all hazards to reduce the Scots to obedience, began to take measures, in the beginning of 1640, to raise a numerous army: the counties were taxed for their quotas, and ship-money, with the arrears due, was exacted with the utmost rigour. All this being insufficient to supply the exigencies of a war, Wentworth, lately created earl of Strafford, who had been sent for over on this pressing occasion, together with Laud and Hamilton, encouraged by an opinion that a general aversion and indignation against the Scots, raged through the whole kingdom; and depending much on the circumstance of the intercepted letter, advised the king to recede from his determined plan, and once again try the old constitutional expedient of a parliament.

When this resolution was told to the council, they gave an universal voice of approbation: but Strafford, whom conscious guilt rendered susceptible of doubts and jealousy, and whose fate was wound up with that of his master's, was determined, if possible, to render him capable of making his own terms, and subscribed twenty thousand pounds as a free loan; the duke of Richmond, a young nobleman, gave the same subscription. The example influenced many other great officers in church and state (w), and the king found himself in a condition to proceed with his armament without waiting for a subsidy. Presuming on this unexpected supply, he determined to shew the parliament they were not convened out of necessity, and that he thought himself on a footing to treat them in his usual style. Ship-money was continued to be levied, although the grand-jury of Northamptonshire had the spirit to present it as illegal (x). An unmitigated rigour was used in the ecclesiastical courts (y). On the death of Coventry (z), which happened about this time, Finch was preferred to the great seal, and created baron of Fordich. He began the exercise of his office with calling the judges together, and giving them a charge to promote, in their circuits, the ready payment of ship-money; and had the imprudence to declare, on a demurrer put in to a bill then before him, which had the authority of an order of the lords of the council, "That whilst he was keeper, no man should be so saucy as to dispute those orders, but that the wisdom of that board should be always ground enough for him to make a decree in Chancery."

The parliament was summoned to meet on the thirteenth of April, 1640. The pleasure this news gave to the lovers of liberty baffles all description: "What, cried they in their mutual congratulations, are our tyrants at length unexpectedly drove into the necessity of calling a parliament, after their use has been so long and so successfully laid aside? and this when our hopes are grown languid; at a time when the remembrance of that august assembly, when the veneration its conduct so justly acquired, is grown faint on the minds of the vulgar." The exultation of the public began to shew itself on several occasions: the presentment of the Northamptonshire jury against the illegality of ship-money; the spirited exertion of one Bagshaw, a lawyer, reader of the Middle-Temple, who argued against the lawfulness of the seat and jurisdiction of bishops in parliament (a).

Previous to the meeting of the English parliament, Strafford was sent over into Ireland with the title of lord-lieutenant, and the ornament of a blue ribbon, to gain from that easy credulous people a sum of money sufficient to execute the designs which had been concerted between him and his master. A parliament was accordingly called in that kingdom, which answered so well the hopes of the ministry, that they immediately granted four subsidies, (v) The following is the story told by Burnet, from a paper written by Dr. White Kennet, bishop of Peterborough. Charles, in a fit of passion, sent a warrant to sir William Balfour, lieutenant of the Tower, to execute the prisoner Lowdon for high-treason. Balfour, at the desire of Lowdon, consulted with the marquis of Hamilton on what was to be done in the present exigence. Balfour and Hamilton went immediately to the king, whom they found in bed: Balfour fell on his knees, and used many arguments to persuade the king to suspend the execution of a warrant which could not be legally proceeded on. The king said, the warrant was his, and it should be obeyed. On this the marquis of Hamilton entered the chamber, and told the king, that if he was so determined, himself would ride post for Scotland, and tell his countrymen, that he had no hand in it. The king was so struck with this peremptory declaration that he tore the warrant. Appendix to the Enquiry into Glamorgan's Transactions, p. 15.

Before the conclusion of the year 1639, the prince-palatine, who having raised a small army in Holland, was beat by Hatzfield, one of the emperor's generals, in Westphalia, made another visit to his uncle the king of England, to solicit a supply. Charles was not in a condition to grant the request, and sent the young prince incognito through France to the allied army, which had promised, on his appearance, to acknowledge him general in the room of duke Barnard Saxe-Weymar lately deceased: he was discovered at Lyons, and, by an order from the court of France, confined as a prisoner.

(w) Whitelock says, that the judges and officers of the courts of justice ecclesiastical and civil were assessed by the council according to the quality and profit of their places.

(x) Sir Christopher Yelverton, high-sheriff of Northamptonshire, having sent to the council a copy of this presentment, was sharply reprimanded, and ordered to do his office on pain of exemplary punishment. Rapin, vol. x. p. 398, & seq.

(y) Some tenants of the church of Durham having combined together, and raised money to carry on a prosecution against the dean and chapter for raising their fines exorbitantly, contrary to a decree of the court at York in the time of Elizabeth, they were called before the council, and Grey and Smith, two men who had been the most busy in this affair, were, by a motion of Laud's, committed to the Gate-house. Laud said, that the dean and chapter would do well to proceed against the prosecutors in the star-chamber, and never renew the leases to them or their children; he was confident it was a practice against the church, and that there was a farther design in the business. Rushworth, vol. iii. p. 1051, & seq.

(z) Coventry died with the following document in his mouth, or rather request to the king: that he would take all distates from the parliament with patience, and not end it with an unkind dissolution.

(a) He argued on the statute of 25 Edw. III. and divided his matter into several parts, alloting a case for every day in which he was appointed to read. His arguments being reported to Laud, he was commanded not to proceed. He applied to Finch the lord-keeper, who sent him to Laud, telling him, it was good law, but he could not proceed without a licence. Laud told him, he had fallen on an unfit subject in an unseasonable time, which would stick by him as long as he lived. He was again commanded silence, on which he went out of town. Forty or fifty gentlemen of the inns of court, to do him honour, and shew their approbation of his intention to instruct his audience, attended him on horseback. Whitelock, p. 31, & seq.

expressed a violent zeal for the cause, drew up a declaration containing an acknowledgement of favours and benefits enjoyed under his majesty's happy and gracious government, with a promise for a farther supply to the utmost of their abilities if the king's occasions should require it. This was not only entered into the English council-causes, and copies dispersed abroad, but mentioned at the end of the king's declaration against the Scots, with an intimation that the subjects of England would do well to follow so good an example.

April the thirteenth, the parliament met. Eager expectation took possession of almost every English breast; nor were the Scots less free from this turbulent affection, seeing that their success or ruin entirely depended on the resolutions of this assembly. After a short preface from the king, the lord-keeper Finch made a long speech to both houses; this performance out-did his usual bombast: he began with highly extolling his master's condescension in calling a parliament. "His majesty's kingly resolutions, said he, are seated in the ark of his sacred breast; and it were a presumption of too high a nature for any Uzziah, uncalled, to touch it: yet his majesty is pleased to lay by the shining beams of majesty, as Phœbus did to Phaëton, that the distance between sovereignty and subjection should not bar you of that filial freedom of access to his person and counsels; only let us beware how, with the son of Clymene, we aim not at the guiding the chariot, as if that were the only testimony of fatherly affection. But let us ever remember, that though the king sometimes lays by the beams and rays of majesty, he never lays by majesty itself." After this introduction, Finch expatiated on the king's goodness in easing the parliament of the trouble of giving advice concerning the business of the nation, and the having for twelve years taken that burden on himself. He then proceeded to invectives against the Scots, who, he said, designed to introduce an army of foreigners into their country, so that there was an absolute necessity to make preparations for the defence of England. He gave an account of the zeal the Irish parliament had given for the king's service, expressed himself in a high-flown panegyric on the king and his government, on the queen, and the rest of the royal family: he introduced the old topic of tonnage and poundage, which he said the king would gradiously accept as a gift from the parliament; and ended with an exhortation to the commons to grant a liberal supply. After this harangue, Charles produced the letter which had been sent by the covenanters to the French king, and informed the house, that he had sent the lord Lowdon and Mr. Colvil prisoners to the Tower (b). Finch had told both houses, that in the dispute between the king and the Scots, his majesty would not admit any one to interpose an office of mediation.

The commons chose serjeant Glanville for their speaker (c), a man of some abilities, and at this time not very displeasing to any party in either house. In his speech to the throne he expatiated on the excellence of monarchy royal and hereditary, and bestowed great encomiums on the king's government, on his piety, and his other personal virtues. After this incense, he entered on the subject of the prerogative, which, he said, could do no hurt, provided it admitted the temperament of law and justice. He explained what he called the highest prerogative, "The king can do no wrong." Every unjust command, said he, is made void by this privilege; and therefore, though the king in his person be innocent, the actors of those abuses stand liable and exposed to strict examination and just censure. He then insinuated the necessity of enacting plain statutes, that the subject might be enabled to understand what is expected of him, and what he may call his own. "Were we never so valiant, concluded he, never so wealthy, if love and unity be not amongst us, what good will our wealth do to ourselves or to your majesty? He that commands a heart in love, he and he only commands assuredly the purse to pay, and the hands to fight."

The commons, according to the custom of several parliaments, previous to their entering on matters of importance, conferred with the lords concerning the petitioning the king for a fast, with the usual business of settling elections, and determining matters of privilege (d). The first days of the sessions were spent in reading petitions poured in by several counties in England against ship-money, projects, monopolies, the transactions of the star-chamber, the high-commission court, and other grievances. The king, who imagined that the commons would be in a flame on the subject of a letter that was wrote to the French king (e), sent them a message by secretary Windebank, enlarging on the affronts and indignities the Scots had, by such an appeal to a foreign prince, put on their sovereign. The commons were at this time so taken up with their own grievances, that they took no notice of what had fallen from secretary Windebank. The debate on the national oppressions was opened by Harbottle Grimstone, member for Essex: "The business that had been recommended to their consideration by his majesty, he said, was a weighty business, and very worthy the advisement of that great council; but there was a case at home of as great a consequence, and so much the more dangerous, because it was home-bred, and ran in the very veins of the body politic: that case was the violation of Magna Charta; itself but a renovation and restitution of the ancient laws of the kingdom; a charter which had been confirmed above thirty times, and in his present majesty's reign more than confirmed by an act declaratory, invested with the title of Petition of Right. What expositions, added he, contrary to that law of right, have some men given, to the undermining the liberty of the subject, with new-invented, subtle distinctions? assuming to themselves a power to make void the laws of the kingdom. The commonwealth had been massacred, all property and liberty shaken, the church distracted, the gospel and professors of it persecuted, and the whole nation over-run with swarms of projecting canker-worms and caterpillars, the worst of all the Egyptian plagues. As the case stands, I conceive there are two points very considerable in it: the first, what hath been done any way to impeach the liberties of the subject, contrary to the Petition of Right; the second, who have been the authors and causers of it."

The next who spoke after Mr. Grimstone was sir Benjamin Rudyard. He lamented the heavy grievances the nation had sustained in the intermission of parliaments; he asserted, that if parliaments were gone all was gone; and pathetically recommended to the house, to ingratiate themselves by their carriage, that the race of parliaments might not be rooted out. The last member that spoke in this important debate was Mr. Pym, a man in the prime of his age, but old in the service of parliaments; much celebrated for his abilities, but yet of greater weight with his party from the steady uncorrupted uniformity of his conduct in the important office of a senator; to the reputation he had acquired in this particular was united a life moral and pious, a religion totally free of the prevailing corruptions of the times: this procured him the respect of all the good and moderate men in the kingdom, and from his reputed knowledge in theology, the house had ever appointed him the manager of all the business which concerned religion. This excellent patriot, in a discourse which held above two hours, but in which there was no word without its weight, enumerated all the oppression of the times. Pym never harangued in vain: the house came to a resolution, and ordered that the records and proceedings in the Star-chamber and King's-Bench, concerning several members of the house in the last parliament, should be sent for immediately; that a select committee be appointed to meet to report their opinion to the house touching the violation of the privilege of parliament, the last day of the last parliaments; that the records, enrollments, judgements, and proceedings in the exchequer, and all courts whatsoever, concerning ship-money, should be sent for.

On the question concerning the behaviour of the speaker,

(b) Finch endeavoured to aggravate this imputed crime by insisting much on the trifling circumstance of the superscription of the letter; a style, he said, never written by any Frenchman but to their king. However, the superscription was denied by the parties concerned, who asserted, that it was added, with a view of blackening them, after their enemies had gotten possession of the letter. Parl. Hist. vol. viii. p. 406.

(c) The person who brought the speaker-elect the message to attend the king in the upper house was of no better condition than a quarter-waiter: the necessary ceremony on this occasion was neglected last parliament, and noticed by that assembly as an affront to the house. Glanville commanded the waiter to tell Maxwell, the gentleman-usher of the house of lords, that it was his duty to have come and brought the message himself. Journals of the Commons, vol. ii. p. 3.

(d) It was this session determined, that every member should have privilege for sixteen days before the beginning, and sixteen after the ending, of parliament. Journals of the Commons, vol. ii. p. 10.

(e) The lords had been so complaisant as to vote, that the lord Lowdon should be detained a prisoner in the Tower till farther evidence should appear in this affair. Whitelock, p. 32.

the house resolved, that the speaker's refusing to put the question, after a verbal command from his majesty, signified by the speaker to the house, to adjourn, and no adjournment made by the house, is a breach of the privileges of the house. Though the commons had sat but a few days, yet as they had taken little notice of the business recommended to them by the lord-keeper, Charles grew impatient, and ordered both houses to attend him at Whitehall. Finch, the person whom they had just censured as the violator of their liberties, by the king's directions, acquainted them, that the army was now upon its march; that it cost an hundred thousand pounds a month; and that without an immediate supply the honour of their prince and nation would be lost. He attempted to palliate the tax of ship-money, as necessary to maintain the reputation of the British flag, and made a ridiculous distinction on the objection that tonnage and poundage were used to be given for the maintenance of a fleet at sea. "It was never intended, he said, but for ordinary preservation of the sea, not for extraordinary." He next set before the commons the example of the two last Irish parliaments, and boasted what great advantages they had gained by their dutiful behaviour. To crown the whole of this extraordinary harangue, he told the houses, that his majesty could not this year forbear to levy ship-money, but expected their concurrence in the raising it for the future. He concluded with magnificent promises, in the king's name, to give them satisfaction in point of security for their liberties, provided they would first satisfy him in the matter of supply.

The commons reserved the consideration of this speech to the next day, when Edmund Waller, a young man of a good estate and promising parts, in a very sensible manner answered the arguments that had been urged by the keeper, and that in a strain of eloquence which procured him the attention and applause of the whole assembly. The purport of his speech was to persuade the house to insist on the redress of grievances before they gave a supply: this, he said, was the custom of all parliaments, and now particularly requisite; he acknowledged that his majesty's occasions for money were evident, for the calling of a parliament was an effect which no light cause could have produced; he censured the conduct of the clergy in a very shrewd manner: "I am sorry these men, said he, take no more care to gain our belief of those things which they tell us for our soul's health, while we know them so manifestly in the wrong in that which concerns the liberties and privileges of the subjects of England: but they gain their preferment, and then it is no matter though they neither believe themselves, or are believed by others. Yet since they are so ready to let loose the conscience of the king, we ought the more carefully to provide for our protection against this pulpit-law, by reinforcing the municipal laws of the kingdom. It is worthy the observing how new this opinion, or rather this way of rising, is, even among themselves. Mr. Hooker, who was no refractory man (as they term it) thinks, that the first government was arbitrary, till it was found that to live by one man's will became all men's misery; and if we look farther, our histories will tell us that the prelates of this kingdom have often been mediators between the king and his subjects, to pray redress of their grievances. Then they had love and reverence from the people."

Mr. Waller's motion, that the redress of grievances should precede the supply, was assented to by the house, and it was ordered that the lords should be consulted on this subject. Matter was prepared for the conference, and the grievances divided into three classes, according to the order Mr. Pym had used in his speech: first, concerning innovations in matters of religion; secondly, property of goods; thirdly, liberties and privileges of parliament (f). Charles, hearing what was going forward in the lower house, went to the lords in a great rage; told them, that the commons had put the cart before the horse; that instead of performing his occasions, they had held consultations of innovations in religion, property of goods, and privileges of parliament; that as for religion, his heart and conscience was the religion now established in the church of England (g); that if the house of commons would but trust him, he would make good what he promised by the lord-keeper (h). "I conjure your lordships, added he, consider your own honour, and the preposterous course of the commons; and desire that your lordships will not join with them, but leave them to themselves. I desire you to be careful in this point; else, if the supply come not in time, I will not say what mischief may and must follow.

The lords, confiding on the large promises made by the king, or overcome by his importunity, or depending on the superior virtue and vigour of the house of commons, determined to put the task of a refusal on them: they voted, that the supply should have precedency, and be resolved upon before any other matter whatsoever; and that there should be a conference with the house of commons, in order to dispose them thereto (i). The king sent to thank the lords for this resolution, and to assure them, that nothing was more agreeable to him than to have a good understanding with their lordships. Their advice on this subject was no sooner reported to the commons, than that temper, or rather lukewarmness, which had hitherto appeared to have infected their counsels, entirely vanished; they grew warm, and with unanimous consent voted it to be so high a breach of privilege, that they could not proceed upon any other matter until they had first received satisfaction from the upper house.

The next day Mr. Pym, in the name of the commons, gave the lords to understand, that it was not their province to meddle with the matter of supply till it should be moved to them by the commons; that if they had taken any notice of orders in their house concerning religion, property, and privileges, that these were to precede a supply, that then they would freely join with the commons in those things; but, for the future, they desired them to take no notice of what should be debated in their house till themselves should declare it to their lordships (k). The lords seemed at first determined to resent the free expostulations of the commons, but at length became sensible of their error, and acknowledged the privileges of the commons in this point, withal intreating them not to let their difference be an occasion of wasting time; but that they would proceed in their own way on the weighty affairs of the kingdom. The manner in which this acknowledgement was made being not full enough, or in other particulars not pleasing to the commons, they were preparing a protestation to be sent up to the house of peers, and to be entered in their own Journal, when they received, on the 2nd of May, by sir Henry Vane, secretary of state, and treasurer of the household, a message from the king, importing, that he had by divers ways acquainted the house with his urgent necessity for supply, and had hitherto received no answer; he did again desire them to give him a present answer concerning this business. After a long debate on this message, the house came to no other resolution than that the debate should be resumed on Monday in the next week, and desired that his majesty might be acquainted with their determination. On the day appointed for farther debate, they received another message, to the following purport: That his majesty, the better to facilitate their resolutions, thought fit to let them know, that of his grace and favour he was pleased, upon their granting twelve subsidies, to be presently passed, and to be paid in three years, with a proviso that it should not determine the sessions, not only for the present to forbear the farther levying of ship-money, but would also give way to the utter abolishing it by any course that themselves should like best; and for their grievances, his majesty would, according to his royal promise, give them as much time as could be now, and the next Michaelmas: he expected a present and positive answer, upon which he might rely, his affairs being in such a condition as could endure no longer delay. Many members observed, (f) Mr. Pym was appointed for the first class, and to make the introduction to the whole business: Mr. St. John for the second; and Mr. Holbourne for the third. Parl. Hist. vol. viii. p. 456.

(g) The fopperies of Laud's religion, which Charles had established in the church, was one of the prime grievances that the commons complained of.

(h) By what may be gathered from the hints which fell from the king and the lord-keeper, the graces Charles was to grant to his people, after the obtaining a supply, were, that if the commons would grant him the tax of ship-money, with tonnage and poundage, he would accept them as a gift, and not raise them by virtue of prerogative.

(i) One Edward Bradshaw, for selling false protections, was by the lords committed to the Fleet, sentenced to stand in the pillory at two places, fined one hundred pounds, and sent to the house of correction till he found sureties for his good behaviour; as he was a gentleman born, they remitted the punishment of whipping. MS. Journal of the Lords, vol. i.

(k) In this dispute the commons insisted, that the money-bills, after they had passed their house, and were consented to by the lords, ought to be re-delivered, and by their speaker presented to the king, as their free gift and donation. Parl. Hist. vol. viii. p. 462.

that to purchase the release of the imposition of ship-money would be acknowledging a right in the crown to exact; they wished that matter might be examined and declared void, and then what they presented to the king would appear a gift, not a recompence. Every other member in the house but those who were supported by the court, excepted against the largeness of the demanded sum.

The assembly being greatly agitated by these two objections, they adjourned the debate till next day, when Mr. Hampden, whose patriotic exertions in the case of ship-money, had obtained him an almost-universal popularity, observing the temper of the house, put a question that would meet with both the objections that had been made to the king's message: Whether the house would consent to the proposition made by the king, as it was contained in the message? Hampden's question was called for by many; when serjeant Glanville the speaker, who at this time had some dependence on the courtiers, earnestly pressed the house to comply with the king's request. He endeavoured to prevail with those who thought the proportion too large, by specifying the small sum which he himself should pay towards this tax out of a large estate which he possessed. In the warmth of this discourse he used some severe expressions against ship-money; which, notwithstanding the zeal he had shewed for gratifying the king, shook his interest at court. Glanville's speech having made some impression on the house, Mr. Hyde, a lawyer, who was afterwards created earl of Clarendon, and who at this time was eagerly looking towards preferment, being intimate with Laud, and a favourite of that prelate on account of his high-church-principles, objected to the question put by Hampden, as a captious one, and proposed that it might be only put, "Whether they should give the king a supply or not?" If that was carried in the affirmative, another question might be put on the proportion and the manner. Whilst the house was divided between the different questions proposed by Mr. Hyde and Mr. Hampden, some calling for one, some for the other, sir Henry Vane stood up, and said, "He could assure the house, that the putting and carrying Mr. Hyde's question could be of no use, for that he had authority to tell them that the king would accept of nothing that was not in the proportion and manner contained in his message." Upon this the house arose. The king being told, that if they came together again, they would not only endeavour to abolish ship-money, and other illegal branches of the revenue, but declare a disapprobation of the intended war against the Scots, hastily determined to dissolve them: this he did the next morning (l).

After many gracious expressions to the lords on the complaisant part they had acted this sessions, he told them, "That the commons had insisted much on grievances; that there might be some, but he could confidently affirm that there were not by many degrees so many as the public voice did make; that out of parliament he should be as ready, if not more willing, to hear any just grievance, as in parliament. There is one thing, added he, much spoken of; I mean as to matters of religion; concerning which, albeit, I expressed myself fully the last day in this place: Yet I think it fit again to tell you, that as I am concerned, so I shall be most careful to preserve that purity of religion, which, I thank God, is so well established in the church of England; and that as well out of as in parliament, I will end as I have begun, in giving your lordships thanks for the care you have of my honour and affairs, desiring you to go on, and assist me in the maintaining of my government, and the liberties of my people, that they now so much startle at: for, my lords, no king in the world shall be more careful to maintain the property of their goods, the liberties of their persons, and the true religion, than I shall be."

It must be owned, that this speech carries with it strong marks of that obstinacy of opinion which is so glaring in the character of Charles, at the same time that it fully shews that false light in which he viewed all the illegal measures he had pursued; a delusion which must ever have prevented him from correcting the errors of his government. He was certainly sincere when he declared himself ready to redress any just grievances out of parliament; because he did not reckon impositions, or the enlarged power of the arbitrary courts, under the denomination of just grievances. He spoke with truth when he said he should be careful to preserve the purity of the church of England; for he thought that consisted in the power and grandeur of prelates, and those innovations which had with such severity been imposed by Laud. It was in this view of things that he so often promised, by the lord-keeper, that if the commons would grant him a supply he would not be deaf to their reasonable demands; but certainly those reasonable demands would have been reduced to such a trifling, equivocal class of grievances, that the ministry might have parted with them on much easier terms than a supply sufficient to reduce the Northern dominions to the desired state of slavery. It would have been the utmost folly in the commons to have put out of their hands the only weapon with which they were armed to defend themselves and constitution against the venom of those arbitrary principles which had visibly taken deep root in the king and his council.

The heads of the popular party being sensible that all was at stake, and having perhaps entered into deep communication with the Scotch covenanters, like men who had every thing to lose, were anxious for the success of the event, though the odds were visibly in their favour. It is also reasonable to believe, that they exerted all their abilities to bring on conclusions that would disappoint the hopes of their enemies; and that they rejoiced in the dissolution of an assembly which did not appear properly affected with the present situation of affairs, or properly warmed against the spoilers of public liberty (m). But can it be imagined, that an English house of commons, who all this reign, and the greatest part of the preceding one, had so vigorously defended their own peculiar privileges, and the liberties of their country, had so magnanimously and resolutely withstood both the threats and entreaties of the court, and strenuously maintained that constitutional maxim, No redress of grievances, no money; can it be imagined, that, after they had declared their liberties violated in the most essential point, by the transactions immediately preceding the dissolution of the last parliament, and by the succeeding imprisonment of their members, after an almost twelve years intermission of parliaments, at a period when designs were manifestly formed for the entire suppressing the liberties of the nation; can it be imagined, that they would be so basely degenerate from the virtue of preceding assemblies, as to become dupes to the very men who had been the most criminally instrumental in altering the nature of the government, and rivet their own fetters by imposing chains on the Scots?

The temper with which the counsels of this parliament had been conducted, is no well-grounded assurance of its flexibility in this point, since other parliaments that have begun with great moderation have ended with rigour. The king, on being assured that the commons were on the point of granting him a supply, immediately repented a measure which he had been hurried into by the fury of the queen and archbishop Laud, as well as by the intemperateness of his own disposition, and the artful insinuations of those of his attendants (n) who wished well to the popular cause.

Charles attempted to apologize, in a declaration to the public, for this fourth premature dissolution: as usual, he laid the blame of what had happened on a few seditious persons in the lower house of parliament, which assembly, he said, he had called together hoping that time and experience had made his loving subjects sensible of the distemper the whole kingdom was like to be put into by the ill-governed actions of those men. The declaration ends with an invitation to the subjects who had any just cause of grievances to address themselves by humble petitions to his sacred majesty, who would give such fitting redress

(l) Such was the king's fear that the commons would proceed to some spirited declaration, that he sent for the speaker in the morning before the house met, and would not suffer him to go out of his sight till after he had dissolved them.

(m) Clarendon relates, that within an hour after the dissolution of the parliament, he met Mr. St. John, that eminent lawyer who had pleaded so ably for Mr. Hampden in the case of ship-money; that though Mr. St. John had naturally a cloudy aspect, he then wore a most chearful one, and perceiving that Mr. Hyde was melancholy, he asked what troubled him? Hyde replied, the same that troubled him, he believed, troubled most good men; that in such a time of confusion, so wise a parliament, which alone could have found remedy for it, was so unseasonably dismissed. Mr. St. John answered with some warmth, that all was well; that things must be worse before they could be better; that parliament could never have done what was necessary to be done. Clar. Hist. vol. i. p. 110, & seq.

(n) It is said that Hamilton, who about this time obtained the release of Lowden, out of tender regard to his country, promoted the dissolution of the parliament.

that his people should have just cause to acknowledge that no persons or assemblies could more prevail with his majesty than the piety and justice of his own royal nature, and the tender affection he did and ever should bear to all his people.

The very day after the dissolution of the parliament, the houses and persons of the lords Warwick and Brook were searched for papers. Henry Bellassis, knight of the shire for the county of York (o), and sir John Hotham, were called before the council, and not making satisfactory answers to interrogations concerning passages in the late parliament, were committed to the Fleet. John Carew, Esquire, was sent close prisoner to the Tower, for refusing to deliver up the papers that came into his hands, whilst chairman for the committee of religion, and thus screening from discovery the names of subscribers to petitions which complained of innovations in religion, and the proceedings of the High-commission court (p).

Contrary to the almost unvaried custom of the ecclesiastical assemblies, which ever broke up with the parliament, the convocation continued to sit: they not only exerted a very dangerous independency by granting, without the sanction of parliament, a benevolence to the king of four shillings in the pound for six years; made canons approving the new ceremonies of placing the communion-table, and bowing towards the East; and framed an oath to be imposed on the clergy and graduates of the university; by which they were to swear they approved the doctrine and discipline of the church of England, and that they would maintain its government by archbishops, bishops, deans, chaplains, &c. This oath, which was designed to make the ecclesiastics of England as much independent of the legislative power as the Scotch covenant, so much condemned by Laud, had made their church, was confirmed and approved by Charles, but met with insurmountable opposition from every other quarter. It was looked on with abhorrence by some, because in their consciences they did not approve of the present doctrine or discipline of the church; by others, because they esteemed such an imposition, not ratified by consent of parliament, illegal; and an oath which contained an et cætera in the middle of it was ridiculed by every one. On the prolongation of this ecclesiastical assembly, the king declared in council, that he had granted such a commission for the remedying all just grievances, according to his gracious speech at the dissolution of the last parliament. All the canons ordained by this convocation were confirmed by letters-patent under the great seal of England, with a command that they should be read by the ministers in the time of divine service; and that all who had ecclesiastical jurisdiction should take special care that the said canons were in all points duly observed, not sparing to execute the penalties in them severally mentioned, on all wilful transgressors. The disgusts which the people had taken at the continued succession of oppressive acts of power, obviously contrary to the dictates, as well as the spirit of the constitution, were now come to maturity, and symptoms began to appear which threatened violent convulsions in the body politic. A large number of apprentices, with others of the lower sort, beset the archbishop's house at Lambeth, and one of them, only because there happened to be a drum in company, was taken and tried for treason, and, on the statute of 25 Edward III. condemned, and accordingly hanged, drawn, and quartered, and his limbs set on London Bridge. Notwithstanding this severe example, the king was obliged to appoint both horse and foot to secure the passages about Lambeth, and guard the convocation, with a double guard to preserve them from the fury of the populace. A body of two thousand people entered St. Paul's cathedral, where the High-commission court sat, and pulled down the benches, crying, "No High-commission! no bishop!"

Ship-money was every where disputed; the sheriffs were not only threatened by the council, but the attorney-general was required to send for the sheriffs of the counties of London, Middlesex, York, Berks, Surrey, Leicester, Essex, and Northampton, to examine them, and to proceed against them, as he should see cause, for their contempt in so important a service. The court and city entered into close cabals. The king had his private juntos, of which sir Henry Vane, notwithstanding Clarendon's assertion that he was at this time suspected of treachery, was always one (q); and the heads of the discontented party had their meetings and councils with the agents of the covenanters. The king was now obliged to have recourse to his regal power to supply his urgent necessities; the money the convocation had granted him, amounted to an hundred and twenty thousand pounds (r): but this, with the money the king had raised from his other friends and dependents, amounting to three hundred thousand pounds, not being sufficient to defray the expence of the great preparations that were making against the Scots, he attempted to force the city of London into a loan of two hundred thousand pounds; but the rising spirit of liberty repelled the attack, and the king was obliged to content himself with the pitiful, yet dangerous, revenge of imprisoning three aldermen for refusing to collect the names of those who were able to contribute towards the demanded sum; and prosecuting in the Star-chamber the lord mayor and aldermen, for not distraining citizens who had not paid ship-money (s). The bullion in the Tower was seized, and forty thousand pounds forcibly borrowed from the merchants to redeem the rest. All the pepper was bought of the East-India company upon trust, and sold again at a great discount for ready money. The resolution of debasing the coin, by mixing two or three hundred thousand pounds of copper money with a fourth part silver, was with difficulty diverted by a strenuous discourse of sir Thomas Rowe, in which he represented the many inconveniencies and fatal consequences that might follow. Coat and conduct-money was again exacted (t), and the city of London was ordered to furnish it for four thousand men. Knighthood-money was set on foot, with the commission of array, and those who held lands in capite of the king, were summoned to send men, horses, and arms.

These various exactions occasioned a representation from the deputy lieutenants, that the gentry did not know which service personally to apply themselves to; that which the commission of array required, namely, the putting the trained bands in a readiness to march, or the other according to escuage, and tenures in knight-service; and how the money should be raised for the charge of the said bands and forces, when required to march. The council solved these difficulties by the following directions: That the service imposed upon the trained bands, and other forces, were to be performed by every man in his own person; for the attendance on his majesty, required by the other proclamations, according to the tenures in knights service, it might be done by deputy, or else by way of composition; and for the difficulty how to provide for the charge of the forces, when they should march, they were to serve at their own expence (u). If the noblemen and gentry shewed a kind of timid resistance to oppressions that were every day multiplying, the brave and spirited commonalty continued to exhibit symptoms of a more formidable disposition. Continual mutinies arose among the soldiers; they openly avowed distaste to the cause for which they were to fight, ran from their colours, and laid violent hands on several of their commanders, whom they suspected to be papists (v). Such was the general appearance of affairs in England.

It grieves my soul to be engaged in such counsels." It is worth observing, that such was the dissipation of the English court, that at the time when Charles was in great straits, when preparations were making for a war against the Scots, the king and queen began to practise a mask: Northumberland writes to the countess of Leicester, "I assure you their majesties are not less busy now than you have formerly seen them at such exercises;" and in another place, "The king is daily so employed about the mask, that till that is over we shall think of nothing else." Fourteen hundred pounds was appointed for the charge of one of these entertainments. Sydney's State Papers, vol. ii. p. 531, 621, 629.

While the king and council were thus employed, the Scots had been active in reforming the abuses of church and state, and making preparations to defend their pretensions (w). Their parliament having been prorogued till the second of June, on that day they assembled. The king sent down an order for a second prorogation; but there being a deficiency of form in the commission by which it was to be executed, the parliament took advantage of the omission and finished their business: after passing several salutary acts, they entered into a bond for adhering to them, and prosecuting the incendiaries of the kingdom. They raised a more numerous body of troops than they were able to bring into the field the last year, and exacted a tenth penny throughout the land; large sums were borrowed upon trust, and the Scotch women, imitating the Roman matrons on a like memorable occasion, gave up their jewels and ornaments to supply the necessity of their country. The Scotch army, though more numerous, was sooner ready than the king's: they besieged and took Edinburgh Castle, and then marched towards the borders of England, under the command of general Lesley.

The army that Charles had raised to oppose them consisted of twenty thousand foot and two thousand horse. All the generals which had served in the last campaign were laid aside, because they were not in friendship enough with Strafford to enter into all his counsels. The earl of Northumberland, a great favourite both of Strafford and Laud, was appointed general. Strafford, after having raised eight thousand men in Ireland, which he left to the care of the earl of Ormond, came over from that country to command as lieutenant general; and the lord Conway, a great debauchee, whose character as a soldier had suffered in the expedition to the isle of Rhé, was, from being devoted to the court, and talking to Laud of church matters in his own style, appointed general of the horse.

Among the other advantages of the Petition of Right, it had abolished court martials, and the lawyers, who now began to think the day of reckoning might be near, had declared, that martial law could not be exercised till the Scots had invaded England. The generals, notwithstanding this, had executed a mutineer, and applied for a pardon to the crown. On this occasion Conway advised, that the king should grant a commission for the execution of martial law, on his own authority; and if any lawyer was so imprudent as to discover the secret of its illegality to the soldiers, it would be necessary to refute him, and hang the lawyer himself by the sentence of a court martial: "For," said he, "the soldier may bring the country to reason on their disobedience in regard to ship-money, but who shall compel the soldier?"

Northumberland was so much distasted at the being called forth to act the most conspicuous part in a business which no good man in the kingdom relished, that he made use of a slight indisposition to declare himself totally unfit to perform the offices of his function (x); and Strafford, though really in an ill state of health, but too much interested to be inactive, exercised the supreme command in his stead, but still with the title of lieutenant general; not caring to assume that of general, because of the extreme envy and popular odium that attended him.

The Scots, notwithstanding their warlike equipage, continued to preserve the utmost decorum of language and manner. On their entry into England, they dispersed two large remonstrances: in these they set forth, in a strong manner, the nature of their provocations. They had not only for many years patiently suffered, they said, the tyranny and insolence of prelates, and their continual opposition to the truth and power of religion, but also the violation of all their liberties, and almost the total subversion of their religion; that when gross popery was obtruded upon them in the book of canons and common prayer, their petition to the king on this head was utterly rejected, and they forbid to insist under the pain of treason; that when nothing less than a total subversion of all their liberties would satisfy the pride and malice of their enemies, and when the king was marching towards them with a great army, rather than fall in seeming disobedience to their sovereign, or give the smallest distaste to their brethren in England, they complied so far with his majesty's pleasure, that, notwithstanding the determinations of their lawful assembly, they were contented that a new free assembly and parliament should be appointed, where all things concerning their religion and liberties might again be considered and established: but when, according to the articles of pacification, matters ecclesiastical were determined in the assembly, according to the constitution of the church, and his majesty's high commissioner had promised to ratify them in parliament, the parliament convened for perfecting the work was prorogued, contrary to the laws and customs of the kingdom; war was determined against them at the council table of England, without hearing what their commisssioners had to say in their defence; the petition of their parliament was rejected; their commissioners restrained; one of their noblemen imprisoned; garrisons of strangers set over them, who had exercised cruelty even against women and children; their ships and goods taken and sunk (y); the owners stripped naked (z), and more cruelly used by the subjects of their own king than by Turks and infidels; great armies prepared against them, with a terrible commission to subdue and destroy them, their religion, liberty, and laws.

These evils and provocations, they said, proceeded from the archbishop of Canterbury, the lieutenant of Ireland, with the Hispaniolised papists, a too powerful faction in England, who had driven them to the necessity of this invasion, to stir up the English against them, that they might with their own swords extirpate their religion, and be made the authors of the slavery of both nations: the pursuing these incendiaries, and demanding justice against them of the king and parliament of England, was not coming against England, as their enemies would insinuate: that there could be no just cause of a national grievance, seeing the kingdom of England, convened in parliament, had refused to contribute to any supply against them; and this when the parliament of Ireland had offered their persons and estates for that purpose; when all plots and policies were set to work; when public declarations by authority were made; when they were proclaimed traitors and rebels at every parish church (a): yet, so wise, so grave, so just was that high court of parliament, that no threatenings nor fears, no promises nor hopes, no finesse nor cunningly devised suggestion, could move them to grant any subsidy for a war against their brethren; but rather, by their speeches, grievances, and complaints, as much as in them was, did justify the cause which they defended. This recent favour did so bind their hearts, that if their power was never so great, they should judge themselves the most unworthy of men, and could look for no less than vengeance from the righteous God, if they should act against a nation so represented to them in that honourable meeting. In this their thankful acknowledgement, they desired the city of London might have their own large share for the noble professions they had given of their constant affection for religion, and the peace of both kingdoms, notwithstanding the continual assaults of the misleaders of the king against them, always rendering them seditious in his ears. This was followed by a solemn oath, that the Scots intended no enmity or rapine, and that they would take no men's goods, or engage themselves in blood, unless they were forced to it; that they would not take from their friends and brethren, but for their own money and just payment. The soul of wisdom taught, that both nations must stand or fall together; that the devices of the enemy were for the oppressing of both: they come among them very sensible of their past sufferings and present dangers, both in religion and liberties, and most willing to do them all the good they could, for the help they had given them at their Reformation, in freeing them from the French: that in return they did expect, from the sense of their intolerable distress which forced them from their own country, that the English would join and concur with them in noble ways to obtain their just desires; and when their means were spent, would, upon a sufficient security of payment, provide what was necessary for the entertainment of their army.

(w) So powerfully did the spirit of order and unanimity reign among this people during their struggles for liberty, that though neither council nor sessions, nor any other regular court of judicature sat, and though their meetings were very numerous, yet they had not been disturbed either with tumult, riot, or excess of any kind. Scots Declaration, Nalson, vol. i. p. 521.

(x) Whilst affairs carried a different appearance, he attached himself to Strafford and Laud, and had the art to insinuate himself so much into their good graces as to make them the means of obtaining what he desired of the king. Nevertheless, he had a dislike to both his benefactors: he writes slightingly of Strafford; and of Laud he says, "That for a man to think well of the reformed religion was enough to make that prelate his enemy." When the popular party began to grow formidable, he withdrew himself from the state cabal, and engaged with the opposite faction. Sydney's State Papers, vol. ii. p. 623.

These remonstrances ended with an assurance that the Scots would demand nothing of the king, but the settling and securing of the true religion and liberties of their country, according to the constitutions and acts of the late assemblies and parliament, and what a just prince owed, by the laws of God and nature, to his grieved subjects; that their abode in England should be no longer than their just grievances might be heard and redressed by the English parliament, and sufficient assurance given them for the legal trial and punishment of the authors of evil to the two nations, and for the settling the religion and liberties of both in peace against the machinations of Romish contrivance, acted by their degenerate countrymen; that their return should be with expedition, peace, and order; that if the Lord should bless their endeavours, and their intentions were not crossed by the opposition of the English, the fruits would be sweet, and the effects good to both nations and their posterity, and to the reformed churches abroad; Scotland would be reformed, as at the beginning; the Reformation in England, long prayed and pleaded for by the godly, would be according to their wishes and desires, perfected in doctrine, worship, and discipline; papists, prelates, and all the members of the antichristian hierarchy, with their idolatry, superstition, and human inventions, packed off, and the names of Sects and Separatists would no more be mentioned.

If, when the last English parliament was summoned, there remained in the majority of the nation a tenderness towards the power of their monarch, and the dignity of the prelates, that disposition no longer existed: the dissolution of a parliament, which, during the twelve years remission of those assemblies, had been so impatiently expected, and so much depended on for the redress of grievances; the innumerable oppressions which had been crouded into the short space between that dissolution and the invasion of the Scots; with the exorbitances of the convocation; wrought so powerfully on the minds of men, that the threatenings these remonstrances breathed out against prelates were pleasing to the generality of the English; and the sharp expressions against the form and discipline of their church, gave few but the court faction disgust. The whole of these declarations tended so much to gather the affections of men in their present state of discontent, that the Scots were expected with impatience, and every accident that retarded their march gave pain to the public. The counties of Northumberland and the bishopric of Durham, who lay immediately exposed to the invasion, absolutely refused to lend money to pay troops, or to furnish horses to mount the musketeers; and the trained bands would not stir without pay.

Conway, at the head of a thousand horse and five hundred foot, advanced to reconnoitre the enemy, but was driven back to Newcastle. In a council of war held at this place, it was determined to fortify the river Tyne at Newburn. Conway, who could not draw together above five thousand foot and two hundred horse, when he viewed the intrenchments judged it impossible to guard this pass, and prepared to retreat yet farther back, when he received a letter from the earl of Strafford, who, with the king, was at this time arrived at York (b). Strafford reproached Conway for not having skirmished with the enemy during their march, spoke with great contempt of the Scotch army, and conjured the general to redeem his honour by some notable action, and to give the enemy battle upon their passing the river. On this peremptory advice Conway altered his resolution, and prepared his troops to dispute the passage.

The Scots framed their behaviour to their professions: they caressed every Englishman that came into their camp; and Lesley, in a very civil message, demanded liberty to pass the river with his countrymen, that they might present their petitions to the king: on a refusal, he prepared to force the passage. The English soldiers, far from shewing any alacrity to engage the enemy, began to murmur at the hardness of their duty; and it was with the utmost difficulty that their officers could persuade them to stand the first onset. On a few of their fellows being slain by the artillery of the Scots, the whole army fled to Durham, leaving the most obstinate of their officers to be killed or taken by the enemy. The Scots took possession of the town of Newcastle, with the king's magazines of powder, ammunition, and provision. They feasted with the mayor, drank the king's health, and entertained the inhabitants with three sermons, preached by their own divines.

Strafford, whose weak state of health had hitherto prevented his entering into action, found the beaten army at Durham: he behaved with such injudicious haughtiness on the first entering into his charge, that he soon became the only enemy the army desired to overcome. They openly vindicated their conduct at the fight of Newburn; and said, that no man could wish success in the war against the Scots, without wishing England to be, by the like illegal power, enslaved: in this manner did even the common soldiers judge of the important question. The prudent conduct of the Scots supported and increased that good opinion which was every where entertained of them: far from shewing elation at their victory, they deplored the necessity of being obliged to shed the blood of their English brethren, and treated the prisoners they had taken with such extraordinary expressions of love and civility, that they made converts of all their captives; whose reports did them infinite service. Strafford being thoroughly acquainted with the disposition of the army, found it necessary to bring them back to Yorkshire; himself and the king, who was advanced as far as North-Allerton, retired to York. In a short time, the king received a petition from his Scotch subjects, craving the redress of their grievances, and that he would, by the advice of the English parliament, re-settle the public tranquillity of the island.

Nothing could be better calculated to please the public than this well-timed application. The necessity of the king's affairs not only subjected him to the mortification of receiving the petition and the advice of those he termed rebels, but to send them a civil answer: he required the petitioners to express the particulars of their desires, he having been always ready to redress the grievances of his subjects. The Scots immediately returned answer, "That the sum of their desires was, that his majesty would be graciously pleased to command that the last acts of parliament might be published in his name, with the estates of parliament; that the castle of Edinburgh be furnished and used for the defence of the subjects; that their countrymen in his majesty's dominions of England and Ireland, be freed from censure for subscribing the covenant, and be no more pressed with oaths and subscriptions unwarrantable by law; that the common incendiaries, who had been the authors of the combustions, might receive their just censure; that their ships and goods, with all the damage thereof, might be restored; that the wrongs, losses, and charge, which they had sustained, might be repaid; that the declaration made against them as traitors might be recalled; that, by the advice and counsel of the state of England, his majesty might be pleased to remove the garrisons from the borders, and all impediments which stopped free trade, and, with the advice of the said parliament, condescend to all particulars that might establish a permanent and well-grounded peace, for the enjoying their religion and liberties."

The king received these proposals with all the indignant rage which could be expected from a man of his disposition and strong prejudices; but the consequences of his imprudent administration began to press him now on all sides: his exchequer was empty; his revenue anticipated; every expedient for supply tried to the utmost; his army undisciplined and disaffected; himself surrounded by people that shewed disgust at all his measures; his friend Hamilton, and his tool Finch, unable to administer any comfort, were solely engrossed in the care of their own preservation, the ingratiating themselves with those who were able to protect them on the day of reckoning, when they should account for their past crimes to a parliament, who promised to be more formidable than any one that ever had sat in England (c).

Strafford, whose situation was too desperate to admit of management, advised fighting; but Charles perceived such disapprobation to this counsel in all the rest of the military officers who attended him, that he was again obliged to submit to the humiliating circumstance of entering into another treaty with his Scotch subjects. Before he assented to this mortifying condescension, he tried the affection of the Yorkshire gentlemen, and Strafford attempted to animate them against the Scots, telling them, with his usual warmth, "that they were bound, out of their allegiance, to attend his majesty in this service; that it was little less than high treason; and they were no better than beasts if they refused." This petulant harrangue increased that resentment which his tyrannical government of this country had raised against him: instead of making the provision that was required of them, they proposed petitions of advice to call a parliament (d), that the present differences might be composed, and a happy peace settled between the two nations.

In this extremity of affairs, the king had recourse to an antiquated custom, which had never been practised since the time of Edward IV. of calling all the peers by writs under the great seal, to attend him at York. The complaisant behaviour of the house of lords the last parliament had undoubtedly filled him with hopes, that the peers would present him with a sum of money, or be so rash to raise subsidies by their own authority. This expedient caused such a general alarm, that petitions poured in for the redress of grievances; against the bringing in Irish troops into the kingdom (e); for a treaty with the Scots; and summoning a parliament. The first petition presented to the king on this subject was signed by the peers Bedford, Essex, Hartford, Warwick, Bristol, Mulgrave, Say and Seal, Howard, Bolingbroke, Mandeville, Brook, Paget (f). The second petition came from the city of London (g), to whom the Scots had very judiciously sent a complaisant and affectionate letter, inviting them to continue the Newcastle trade, and assuring them of a perfect security. Such being the loud, the universal cry of the nation, Charles, to prevent the clamorous petitions that were preparing in all quarters, at the first meeting of the great council of peers he told that assembly, he was resolved to call a parliament; weakly adding, that the queen had advised him to it. Thus he avowed to the public what had been long suspected, and much murmured at, that he suffered his wife to have an influence over his most important counsels.

The first thing determined on by the peers was, that the king ought to enter into an immediate treaty with the Scots. They named sixteen of their own members for this commission, all of them popular men (h), the king having received the mortifying advice, that he must not appoint any that were disagreeable to the Scots, for fear of frustrating the good effects intended by the treaty. Charles added six assistants to the sixteen peers; the earls of Traquaire, Morton, Lanerk, secretary Vane, sir Lewis Steward, and sir John Borroughs; men who he said were either versed in the laws of Scotland, or had been acquainted with the former stages in this business. The commissioners were recommended to make the articles of pacification for last year the grounds of their treaty; but not to yield to any of the new demands of the Scots. York was the town the king destined for the meeting, that matters might be expedited by a quick communication; but it was changed to Rippon, on the Scots declaring that they could not trust their commissioners in a place where the lord lieutenant Strafford ruled, against whom, as a chief incendiary, they intended to insist, who had declared them traitors in Ireland before the king had done it in England, who desired the breaking up of the treaty, whose commission was to destroy them, and who had in his army a great many papists, who dreaded the pacification as productive of their ruin and dissolution; that there were many ungodly persons about the king, who waited the occasion of expressing their malice and revenge against the whole nation. They objected also to the earl of Traquaire assisting at the treaty, because he was another of the grand incendiaries of whom they complained. This difficulty was solved by a declaration, that the assistants were not authorized to treat with the commissioners of Scotland, or to have any voice or vote in the debating or concluding of any thing.

Matters being thus settled, the Scots sent commissioners (i) to the place appointed for the treaty. They excused their not being of numbers or quality equal to those they were to treat with, because of the absence of their nobility from the army, and that themselves were but a small committee from the parliament. After many friendly conferences, it was agreed on, as preliminaries, that the Scots should be allowed for their maintenance eight hundred and fifty pounds a-day, a contribution they had laid on the counties of Northumberland and the bishopric of Durham, besides what they had plundered from their declared enemies the papists and prelates: this maintenance was on condition that the Scots would content themselves with that sum, and neither molest papists, prelates, nor their adherents; free trade and commerce was to be restored between the two nations; the victuals and other necessaries to supply the army were to be free of custom; no victuals, arms, or ammunition, was to be imported into Newcastle; and there was to be a cessation of arms, according to the particulars to be agreed upon. The commissioners for the treaty had the address to continue the debates so long upon these preliminaries, that it was the 26th of October before the conditions of the truce were determined: it was therefore impossible to discuss the articles that were to be the subject of the treaty before the 3rd of November, the day appointed by the writs for the meeting of the parliament. The king was very desirous to have both armies disbanded; but this the Scots would not agree to, nor to another proposal which had been made of diminishing the number of both armies: he was so earnestly pressed by his own commissioners to remove the treaty from Rippon to London, that he was obliged to comply with this, as well as to the cessation of arms, by which the Scots were assured of the maintenance they had demanded; and the river Tees was made the boundaries of both parties. To supply the large sum that was necessary to support two large armies, and to preserve the northern counties from farther depredation, a loan of two hundred thousand pounds was borrowed of the city of London: this money was willingly advanced by the citizens, the lords of the great council of York having made it their request, with a promise that all the peers in the kingdom should be bound for the payment.

On the first meeting of the commissioners of both parties,

(c) Hamilton was so instrumental in bringing the king to assent readily to pacific measures, that the popular party, both of English and Scots, became from this period much reconciled to him.

(d) Previous to this, they had presented a petition against the billeting of soldiers, complaining of the enormous charge they had been put to in the last year's expedition, and representing, they could not draw together the trained bands without fourteen days pay from his majesty. Strafford refused to present that petition in which they advised the king to call a parliament. Rushworth, vol. iii. p. 1214, & seq. 1230. Rapin, vol. x. p. 448. Smollett's Hist. vol. vii. p. 167.

(e) The Irish army, consisting of ten thousand foot and fifteen hundred horse, were to have invaded the Western part of Scotland, whilst the Scots were attacked in the South by the English army. Ten thousand men, under the command of the lord Herbert, were to be sent into the North of Scotland, and a fleet of ships into the Frith. The plan of the war was not ill-concerted, and could it have been fully executed, it might have been attended with a fatal success: but the instant that Strafford turned his back upon Ireland, the parliament of that kingdom, encouraged by the example of the English house of commons, began to make objections to the new manner of levying subsidies, and threw such interruptions in the way of the officers of the crown, that the Irish army was not ready to march at the appointed time. The diligence of the Scots, and the backwardness of the English, prevented the execution of the rest of the plan. Strafford was to have returned to Ireland to take the command of that army, had not the earl of Northumberland's pretended illness disconcerted the affairs in England. Guthrie's General Hist. Carte's Life of Ormond.

(f) The lord Wharton asserted, that himself and the lord Howard, for delivering this petition, or a petition of the like nature, were put under arrest; and Strafford moved, that they should be shot for sedition. Burnet's Hist. of His Own Times, vol. i. p. 29.

(g) The privy-council, hearing that the city was about to petition against grievances, and for a parliament, sent them a long letter, in which they endeavoured to persuade them, that it was a very improper time to send such a petition, when his majesty was engaged in person for the defence of the city; and that the demanding at such a time redress, which they might be sure to gain from his majesty's grace and goodness, would be a just censure upon them in future times. Rushworth, vol. iii. p. 1262.

ties, the English were accosted by the Scots with a very unpromising reserve and coldness. The surprize with which they were struck on this behaviour was farther encreased on the earl of Rothes upbraiding viscount Mandeville for not having shewed themselves more early in the support of the cause: Mandeville appearing astonished at this charge, Rothes pulled out of his pocket a letter signed by the earls of Bedford, Essex, Brook, and Warwick, with the lords Mandeville, Saville, Say and Seal; in which they, in general terms, promised an hearty concurrence with the Scotch covenanters, on their entering with an army into England. The six lords whose handwriting had been counterfeited concurred in so solemn an assurance that the whole was a forgery, that they at length satisfied the Scots (k). The deceit was afterwards found out to be a contrivance of the lord Saville: the Scots had written to their agents in London, to get some solid assurance of assistance from their friends in England, on which they might more certainly depend, than on general promises; the lord Lowdon transmitted this request to the lord Saville; Saville sent his secretary to the six lords above-mentioned, who every one of them promised their good offices on every opportune occasion that presented itself, but refused to sign any compact: Saville framed a letter on these good intentions, and signed it with their forged names. He afterwards wrote another letter in his own name to Lowdon, in which he earnestly exhorted him to persuade his countrymen to enter England with their army; gave him many encouragements, which had some foundation, and, to make the prospect more flattering, many false pieces of intelligence; gave very judicious advice concerning the conduct of the Scots after their entry into England, which they seem to have followed exactly (l).

The discovery that the fore-mentioned letter was an imposture cleared up all matters of difference among the commissioners. The Scots highly caressed the English lords, to whom they protested what they had urged in their declaration, that they had no other design than to concur with the English parliament; to bind the prerogative within due limits; to circumscribe the high claims of the clergy; to chastise the insolence of the Papists; and to settle on a firm establishment the constitution of the two kingdoms, on free and equitable principles. To these protestations of themselves, sufficiently persuasive, the Scots added other endearments: they brought with them, and delivered up, two officers of quality, Wilmot and O'Neal, taken at the fight at Newburn; they had treated them with great politeness, and had been at pains to give them high ideas of their courage, resolution, discipline, good intention, and the justness of their cause. Wilmot and O'Neal were, from some private injuries they had sustained, among the number of Strafford's enemies; and their reports of what they had seen and heard in the Scotch camp added to those prepossessions the English had conceived in their favour, and increased the popular odium against the hated Strafford; who, when almost every mouth poured forth imprecations against him, had shewed, in a most improper manner, his courage and zeal against the covenanters, by sending a party of horse to attack them in their quarters at Durham, whilst matters were settling concerning the cessation, by the commissioners at Rippon (m).

Lesley complained loudly of this hostility, saying he had himself forborn to make any such attempt, out of respect to the treaty. The English commissioners resented it as an affront to them; and when it was known that the officer who conducted the enterprize was a Roman Catholic, it raised such an outcry that the king was obliged to send his positive commands to the general not to give any more such orders. Before the cessation of arms, and whilst things remained in an uncertain state, the Scots discovered, through the means of their friends about the court, that they were betrayed by the earl of Montrose, who kept up a secret correspondence with Charles; one of his letters was sent to Lesley. Montrose, on being taxed with holding intelligence with the enemy, openly avowed the fact, and asked, who was the man would assert the king was an enemy? This boldness silenced the greater part of his accusers; but the more valiant and more judicious Lesley gave it as his opinion, that he ought to be tried and executed by a court-martial (n). Charles's situation was so desperate, that he could make no advantage of Montrose's treachery; he was obliged to ratify all that his commissioners had concluded on (o), and prepare for his journey to London, there to meet a parliament, and to endeavour to satisfy the importunate demands of two enraged nations, whom he had provoked with a variety of injuries, and with whose power he was at this time in no capacity to contend.

These were not all the difficulties that agitated him at this time: himself and his beloved counsellor Laud were alarmed at the pretended discovery of a plot among the Papists, which threatened both their lives. It was communicated to sir William Boswell, Charles's resident at the Hague, by Andreas ab Habernfield, a domestic of the queen of Bohemia, who pretended to have it from a Papist converted to the Protestant faith, and let into the secret on account of his supposed orthodoxy. The story imported, that the pope and cardinal Richelieu were deeply concerned in fomenting the troubles of Charles; and that measures had been taken by Con and Rossetti, two nuncios from Rome, for poisoning both the king and the archbishop. This was supported by a detail of cabals, meetings, and characters, among the Popish faction, of which it was affirmed the queen, the earl and the countess of Arundel, were patrons and directors. Laud was the only person in England to whom this plot, under the promise of an inviolable secrecy, was discovered. He communicated it to Charles, with the same cautions; and Charles chose to suppress the matter, rather than quarrel with his good friends the Papists, who in this time of necessity had advanced him large sums of money. It is likely he did not give much credit to the tale, since nothing could be more improbable than that conspiracies should arise from that quarter. The affair, perhaps, had no foundation, but in the imagination of the queen of Bohemia, who might have trumped up this story from public report and secret intelligence, attempting, by the alarming tale, to set Charles against a faction who had ever shewed themselves her inveterate enemies.

The causes of disgust which, for above thirty years, had daily been multiplying in England, were now come to full maturity, and threatened the kingdom with some great revolution or convulsion. The uncertain and undefined limits of prerogative and privilege had been eagerly disputed during that whole period; and in every controversy between the prince and people, the question, however doubtful, had always been decided by each party in favour of its own pretensions. Too lightly, perhaps, moved by the appearance of necessity, the king had even assumed powers incompatible with the principles of limited government, and had rendered it impossible for his most zealous partizans to justify his conduct, except by topics so unpopular, that they were more fitted, in the present disposition of men's minds, to inflame, than appease, the general discontent. Those great supports of public authority, law and religion, had likewise, by the unbounded compliance of judges and prelates, lost much of their influence over the people; or rather had in a great measure gone over to the side of faction, and authorised the spirit of opposition and rebellion. The nobility, also, whom (l) Saville, who had taken all this pains to strengthen the popular party in England by a conjunction with the discontented Scots, was a determined courtier, and a man who had no private principle of honesty, nor a disinterested one in regard to the public: his sole inducement to act this dangerous part was an invincible hatred he bore to Strafford, who had overtopped him in regard to court favour, and who had thwarted him on many occasions: the only way to ruin his rival effectually was to bring in his potent enemies the Scots. Thus the public is sometimes benefited by the vices as well as the virtues of particulars, and receives important advantages from the irregular affections of the worst members of society.

(m) Notwithstanding the treaty in hand, he advised the king yet to fight the Scots, and committed this outrage to shew how easily they might be drove out of the kingdom. He defeated several parties, and took some of the Scotch officers prisoners.

(n) An act had passed in a committee of the Scotch parliament, that none should, under pain of death, write any letters to the court, but such as were seen and approved by at least three of the committee. Memoirs of the Duke of Hamilton, p. 179.

(o) The council of peers with an unanimous voice determined, that it was necessary to ratify what had been concluded on, and proceed in the intended treaty with the Scots: even Strafford, overcome by the general voice, declared, that it was not possible to keep the counties of Cumberland and Westmoreland from the Scottish power; that Newcastle was not to be gotten out of their hands this winter, if the king had an army on foot of an hundred thousand men; that the boundaries of Yorkshire were not to be defended; and the king's army could not be trusted. Rushworth, vol. iii. p. 1308, & seq.

the king had no means of retaining by offices and preferments suitable to their rank, had been seized with the general discontent, and unwarily threw themselves into the scale which already began too much to preponderate. Sensible of some incroachments which had been made by royal authority, men entertained no jealousy of the commons, whose enterprizes for the acquisition of power had been covered with the appearance of public good, and had hitherto gone no farther than some disappointed efforts and endeavours. The progress of the Scottish malcontents reduced the crown to an entire dependence for supply: their union with the popular party in England brought great accession of authority to the latter: the near prospect of success roused all latent murmurs and pretensions which had hitherto been held in such violent constraint: and the torrent of general inclination and opinion ran so strongly against the court, that the king was in no situation to refuse any reasonable demands of the popular leaders, either for defining or limiting the powers of his prerogative.

The triumph, however, of the malcontents over the church was not yet so immediate or certain. Though the political and religious Puritans mutually lent assistance to each other, there were many who joined the former, yet declined all connexion with the latter. The hierarchy had been established in England ever since the Reformation; the Romish church, in all ages, had carefully maintained that form of ecclesiastical government; and though parity may seem at first to have had place among Christian pastors, the period during which it prevailed was so short, that few undisputed traces of it remained in history. The bishops and their more zealous partizans inferred thence the divine indefeasable right of prelacy: others regarded that institution as venerable and useful: and if some chose to adopt the new rites and discipline of the Puritans, the reverence to antiquity retained many in their attachment to the liturgy and government of the church. It behoved, therefore, the zealous innovators in parliament to proceed with caution and reserve. By promoting all measures which reduced the powers of the crown, they hoped to disarm the king, whom they regarded as the determined patron of the hierarchy. By declaiming against the encroachments and tyranny of the prelates, they endeavoured to carry the nation, from a hatred of their persons, to an opposition against their office and character. And when men were inlisted in party, it would not be difficult, they thought, to lead them by degrees into many measures, for which they formerly entertained the greatest aversion. Though the new sectaries composed not, at first, the majority of the nation, they were inflamed with extreme zeal for their opinions.

When the nation, therefore, was so generally discontented, and little suspicion was entertained of any design to subvert the church and monarchy; no wonder that almost all elections ran in favour of those who, by their pretensions to piety and patriotism, had encouraged the national prejudices. It is a usual compliment to regard the king's inclination in the choice of a speaker; and Charles had intended to advance sir Thomas Gardiner, recorder of London, to that important trust: but so little interest did the crown at that time possess in the nation, that Gardiner was disappointed of his election, not only in London, but in every other place where it was attempted; and the king was obliged to make the choice of speaker fall on Mr. Lenthal, a lawyer of some character, but not sufficiently qualified for so high and difficult an office (p).

The eager expectations of men with regard to a parliament, summoned at so critical a juncture, and during such general discontents; a parliament which, from the situation of public affairs, could not be abruptly dissolved, and which was to execute every thing left unfinished by former parliaments; these motives, so important and interesting, engaged the attendance of all the members; and the house of commons was never observed to be, from the beginning, so full and numerous, as it was on the day of their meeting, November 3, 1640 (q). Without any interval, therefore, they entered upon business, and, by unanimous consent, they immediately struck a blow which may in a manner be regarded as decisive.

The earl of Strafford was considered as chief minister, both on account of the credit which he possessed with his master, and of his own great and uncommon vigour and capacity. By a concurrence of accidents, this man laboured under the severe hatred of all the three nations which composed the British monarchy. The Scots, whose authority now ran extremely high, looked on him, with justice, as the capital enemy of their country, and one whose counsels and influence they had most reason to apprehend. He had engaged the parliament of Ireland to advance large subsidies, in order to support a war against them: he had levied an army of ten thousand men, with which he had menaced all their western coast: he had obliged the Scots, who lived under his government, to renounce the covenant, their national idol: he had, in Ireland, proclaimed the Scottish covenanters rebels and traitors, even before the king had issued any such declaration against them in England; and he had ever dissuaded his master against the late treaty and suspension of arms, which he regarded as dangerous and dishonourable. So avowed and violent were the Scots in their resentment of all these measures, that they had refused to send commissioners to treat at York, as was at first proposed; because, they said, the lieutenant of Ireland, their capital enemy, being general of the king's forces, had there the chief command and authority.

Strafford, first as deputy, then as lord-lieutenant, had governed Ireland during eight years with very little popularity. In a nation so averse to the English government and religion, his very virtues were sufficient to draw on him the public hatred. His manners too were haughty, rigid, and severe. His authority and influence, during the time of his government, had been unlimited; but no sooner did adversity seize him, than the concealed aversion of the nation blazed up at once, and the Irish parliament used every expedient to aggravate the charge against him. The universal discontent which prevailed in England against the court, was all pointed towards the earl of Strafford; because he was the minister of state whom the king most favoured and trusted. His extraction was honourable, his paternal fortune considerable; yet envy attended his sudden and great elevation; and his former associates in popular counsels, finding that he owed his advancement to the desertion of their cause, represented him as the great apostate of the commonwealth, whom it behoved them to sacrifice as a victim to public justice.

Strafford, sensible of the load of popular prejudices under which he laboured, would gladly have declined attendance in parliament; and he begged the king's permission to withdraw himself to his government of Ireland, at least to remain at the head of the army in Yorkshire; where many opportunities, he hoped, would offer, by reason of his distance, to elude the attacks of his enemies. But Charles, who had entire confidence in the earl's capacity, thought that his counsels would be extremely useful during the critical session which approached. And when Strafford still insisted on the danger of his appearing amidst so many enraged enemies, the king, little apprehensive that his own authority was so suddenly to expire, promised him protection, and assured him, that not a hair of his head should be touched by the parliament.

No sooner was Strafford's arrival known, than a concerted attack was made upon him in the house of commons, on the 11th of November. Pym, in a long discourse, enumerated all the grievances under which the nation laboured; and, from a complication of such oppressions, inferred, that a deliberate plan had been formed of changing entirely the frame of government, and subverting the ancient laws and liberties of the kingdom. Could any thing, he said, increase our indignation against so enormous and criminal a project, it would be to find, that, during the reign of the best of princes, the constitution had been endangered by the worst of ministers, and that the virtues of the king had been seduced by wicked and pernicious counsel. We must inquire, added he, from what fountain these waters of bitterness flow; and though doubtless many evil counsellors will be found to have contributed their endeavours, yet is there one who challenges the infamous pre-eminence, and who, by his courage, enterprize, and capacity, is entitled to the first place among these betrayers of their country. He is the earl of Strafford, lieutenant of Ireland, and president of the council of York, who in both places, and in all other provinces where he has been entrusted with authority, has raised ample monuments of tyranny, and will appear from a survey of his actions to be the chief promoter of every arbitrary counsel. Some instances of imperious expressions, as well as actions, were given by Pym; who afterwards entered into a more personal attack of that minister, and endeavoured to expose his whole character and manners.

The

(q) This was afterwards called The Long Parliament.

The austere genius of Strafford, occupied in the pursuits of ambition, had not rendered his breast altogether inaccessible to the tender passions, or secured him from the dominion of the fair; and in that sullen age, when the irregularities of pleasure were more reproachful than the most odious crimes, these weaknesses were thought worthy of being mentioned, together with his treasons, before so great an assembly. And, upon the whole, the orator concluded, that it belonged to the house to provide a remedy proportionable to the disease, and to prevent the farther mischiefs justly to be apprehended from the influence which this man had acquired over the measures and counsels of their sovereign (r).

Sir John Clotworthy, an Irish gentleman, sir John Hotham, of Yorkshire, and many others, entered into the same topics; and, after several hours spent in inveighing against this notorious criminal, when the doors were locked in order to prevent all discovery of their purpose; it was moved that Strafford should immediately be impeached of high treason. This motion was received with universal approbation; nor was there, in all the debate, one person that offered to stop the torrent by any testimony in favour of the earl's conduct. Lord Falkland alone, though known to be his enemy, modestly desired the house to consider, whether it would not better suit the gravity of their proceedings, first to digest by a committee many of those particulars which had been mentioned, before they sent up an accusation against him. It was ingeniously answered by Pym, that such a delay might probably blast all their hopes, and put it out of their power to proceed any farther in the prosecution: that when Strafford should learn, that so many of his enormities were discovered, his conscience would dictate his condemnation; and so great was his power and credit, he would immediately procure the dissolution of the parliament, or attempt some other desperate measure for his own preservation: that the commons were only accusers, not judges; and it was the province of the peers to determine, whether such a complication of enormous crimes, in one person, did not amount to the highest crime known by the law. Without farther debate, the impeachment was voted: Pym was chosen to carry it up to the lords: almost every member of the house accompanied him on so agreeable an errand.

Strafford was at this time in the house of peers: it is conjectured, that he had an intention this day to accuse the lord Say and others, members of both houses, who were thought to have held a correspondence with the Scots. He found the lords in a debate concerning the Scotch treaty, that took them up a considerable time; and whilst he was waiting for an opportunity to address them, Mr. Pym appeared at the bar, and, in the name of all the commons of England, impeached him of high-treason, and desired that he might be sequestered from all councils, and be put into safe custody. No sooner was Mr. Pym retired, than the lords, with almost one voice, called upon Strafford to withdraw. He having obtained leave to be heard, endeavoured to influence the lords, by representing to them, that it would be of bad consequence to their privileges and birth-right, if, upon such a general charge, they should suffer a peer of the realm to be committed to custody, and deprived of his seat in parliament. Potent as these reasons must appear to an aristocratical assembly, yet on this occasion they had not the intended effect: the lords, with very little debate, resolved he should be committed to the usher of the black rod, to remain under his care till the commons should bring in a particular charge. Upon his knees, at the bar of the house, was this determination pronounced to him. The lord-keeper having performed this office, Strafford was taken away by the usher; and Mr. Pym was called in, and informed, that the lords had complied with the desire of the commons.

Liberty had now began her triumphant course; her, inveterate enemy was, on the first attack, subdued. The arrogant Strafford, who the year before entered the upper house with the parade of a conqueror, and whilst he related the wonders of his Irish administration, was received by the lords with applause for the supposed wisdom of his conduct, and who this very day had entered that assembly with imperious thoughts, and disdainful sentiments against the commons, was in an instant, by the enemies he despised, reduced as a criminal to receive on his knees the sentence of imprisonment. The commons sent over to Ireland for sir George Radcliffe and sir Robert King, to appear as witnesses against Strafford; but on being informed, that Radcliffe had been the tool which Strafford had made use of to execute all his infamous purposes, they likewise impeached him of high treason (s), and secured his person. Mr. Pym, with his usual accuracy, in a conference with the lords on this subject, made this distinction on the nature of the corruption which had influenced these ministers: "In the crimes committed by the earl, said he, there is haughtiness and fierceness; in those of sir George Radcliffe more of baseness; having resigned and subjected himself to be acted upon by the corrupt will of another. The earl of Strafford hath not been bred in the study of the law, and having stronger lusts and passions to incite, and less knowledge to restrain, might more easily be transported from the rule; but sir George Radcliffe, in his natural temper and disposition being more moderate, and by his education and profession better acquainted with the grounds and directions of the law, was carried into his offences by a more immediate concurrence of will, and a more corrupt suppression of his reason and judgement."

The proceedings of the house of commons were equally quick in regard to other criminals: they had examined two messengers, Newton and Gray, and the keepers of the prisons about London, on the very day of Strafford's impeachment; and secretary Windebank was ordered to answer for the many interruptions he had given to the processes against priests and Papists. This delinquent, who had been formerly Laud's creature, and promoted to the office of secretary by that prelate, had so entirely devoted himself to the queen, that he became, if not a Papist himself, a profest patron of that sect: he not only protected priests in his house, but terrified the messengers by threats from molesting them. One of the articles in his impeachment mentioned seventy-four letters of grace to Recusants, signed by his own hand: another was, sixty-four priests discharged from the Gate-house, twenty-nine of the number by his verbal order. Windebank was in the house when these warrants of discharge were produced; whilst the matter was debated, he was ordered to withdraw, and finding that the proofs would be very strong against him, he retired to his own house, and fled the kingdom the next morning. From Calais he wrote a letter to the earl of Pembroke, wherein, according to the custom of other offending ministers, he vindicated himself on the unconstitutional plea of having committed offences in obedience to his master's commands (t).

The public did not long languish for a parliamentary prosecution against the object of their extreme hatred. The prelate Laud, that declared zealot for tyranny and persecution, could not long escape in the strict scrutiny that was now making concerning grievances: after a long debate on the new-made canons, it was resolved, that they did not bind either the clergy or the laity of the land; that the said canons and constitutions contained in them matters contrary to the king's prerogative, to the fundamental laws and statutes of the realm, the rights of parliament, the property and liberty of the subject; and were matters tending to sedition, and of dangerous consequence: it was resolved also, nullo contradicente, that the contribution granted to the king by the clergy in the several convocations holden at London and York in 1640, were contrary to the laws, and ought not to bind. In the debate previous to these resolutions, sir Edward Deering, one of the members for Kent, a man who possessed volubility of speech, and who had taken some pains to attain a knowledge of the nature and grounds of those pretensions of the prelates that were now become the subject of dispute, made a long harangue, in which he exposed all the palpable objections that lay against the convocation or synod, as they termed themselves. He called it a conventional, synodical assembly of commissioners, a threefold chimera, a monster to the law of the land, and a Cerberus to the religion. He entered into a deep discussion on synods, and alledged, that from the time of the apostles they were ecclesiastical councils, chosen by the free voice of clergy and laity; that even the Roman Catholics acknowledged, that the church could not be represented if the laity were excluded; for the acts of national synods being binding to the whole nation, it could not justly be so if the laity had no share in the consultation, or choice in the consulters.

(r) Clarendon, vol. i. p. 172.

(s) He had been already impeached of high-treason by the Irish commons house. Audley Mervin, who carried up his impeachment to the Irish Peers, told them, that his treasons had transcended so much all former ones, that they seemed to be but petty-larcenies in respect of his. In this speech of Mervin he complains, that the clause relating to Strafford was fraudulently inserted. Rushworth, vol. iv. p. 214.

(t) Windebank had obtained a discharge from the king of all penalties that he might incur from his conduct in regard to Recusants. He got safe out of the kingdom by a mandate, signed by the king, to suffer him to pass without molestation. His papers were secured from search by Cottington: among those that came to light were found notes relative to an union with the church of Rome. Prynne's Introduction to the Trial of Laud, p. 124, 131, 146.

Mr. Nathaniel Fiennes, son to the lord Say, a young man of good parts and great reading, made a long speech on the enormities that were in the canons. In the first, he said, the convocation had assumed a parliamentary power in a very high degree: they had not only defined what the power of the king was, what the liberty of the subject, but had forbid persons to speak in any other way than according to their definition. He asserted, from the authority of their own text, the sacred scriptures, that all magistracy was the ordinance of man: "But these divines, continued he, have an aim in teaching that kings are an ordinance of God; for then they must receive the manner of their government from the prescript of God's word; and consequently, if there is no text in either of the Testaments, that kings may not make laws, nor lay impositions without parliaments, they may do it out of parliament. In the second canon they have also assumed to themselves a parliamentary power, to appoint holidays contrary to the express words of the statute. In the canon against sectaries there is an especial proviso, that it should not derogate from any statute or law made against them; as if their canons had power to disannul an act of parliament. In the fourth canon, against Socinianism, they determine an heresy not determined by law; a point expressly reserved to a parliamentary determination: in this canon, for the most trifling offences, such as bringing a book over from beyond sea which differs from the discipline of the church of England, men are to be excommunicated ipso facto, and lie under the same penalty as if they had maintained an opinion contrary to the most material point of faith. In the sixth canon they have undertaken to impose new oaths on the subject, a power of an higher nature than to make a law; for a law binds no longer than till another law is made, or whilst the person resides in the land; whereas an oath binds for a man's life." Mr. Fiennes proved, that those canons which had the most favourable appearance carried in them a great degree of malignancy, and moved that the house would proceed to condemnation.

The committee appointed to prepare the votes concerning these matters, had particular directions to consider how far the archbishop of Canterbury had been an actor in these proceedings; and farther to examine what part he had acted in the great design of the subversion of the laws and religion of the realm; and to prepare and draw up a charge against him, and such others as should appear offenders in these particulars. This was the prelude to Laud's impeachment: complaints poured in on all sides; he was accused by the Scotch commissioners of being the prime cause of those innovations in their religion which had occasioned the present commotions; letters were produced that had passed between him and the Scotch bishops: these proved, that he had for some years directed the ecclesiastical affairs of that kingdom; and, by the force of menaces and promises, had maintained a high degree of authority over the episcopal order. On the report of their committee, the house of commons did not hesitate to accuse him to the upper house of the crime of treason. Mr. Hollis was appointed to carry up the message, and the lords immediately committed him to the custody of their usher.

On this accusation, Laud desired leave to speak: he entered into a protestation of his innocency, and had the imprudence to say, that "there was not a member of the house of commons who believed in his heart he was a traitor." For this unguarded expression he was sharply reprehended by the earl of Essex. He desired to be proceeded with in the ancient parliamentary way, but was checked by the lord Say for pretending to dictate to the house. He begged leave to recant what he had said, but was refused: and thus this arrogant churchman, who had for many years directed almost every court of justice in the kingdom, was in a moment reduced to the condition of a criminal, and denied those indulgencies and civilities which a less detested person of his age and rank would have found in such mortifying circumstances (u). Many bitter speeches had been made against him in the lower house: sir Edward Deering declared, he had exercised a supreme ecclesiastical power in the three kingdoms; and mentioned some particulars concerning his arbitrary proceedings; that he pleaded fair for a partriarchate; but if there must be such a governor, a pope at Rome would do less hurt than a partriarch at Lambeth. Mr. Grimstone said, "that he was the sty of all pestilential filth; that it was him that had infected the state and government of the commonwealth; he was the author of all the miseries it now groaned under; he had brought in the earl of Strafford (v); given the secretaryship to Windebank; and promoted Montague, Manwaring, and all those prelates who were suspected of popery; there was scarcely any grievance or complaint in which he was not mentioned; like a busy angry wasp, his sting was in every thing; he was the corrupt fountain that had vitiated all the streams; till that was purged, clear channels could not be expected." Laud petitioned the upper house for liberty to take the air; this favour was granted, with a proviso that he should do it in the company of his keeper, and not be suffered to speak to any body out of his presence.

The instruments of this prelate's tyranny did not escape the avenging arm of justice, who had now set up her standard in both houses of parliament. Matthew Wren, bishop of Ely, and Pierce, bishop of Bath and Wells, were informed against for many high crimes and misdemeanors; such as practising and efforcing superstition and idolatry, and persecuting those who did not submit to these corruptions. At the desire of the commons, they were ordered by the lords to give bail for ten thousand pounds to stand the judgement of parliament. Every member of the late convocation was condemned to large fines; and numbers of ecclesiastical delinquents were severely punished by imprisonment, or otherwise, for being guilty in their several cases of persecution and idolatry (w).

The attack on the clergy did not stop at the punishment of the individuals of the order: a bill passed the lower house for disabling bishops, or any clergyman, from being privy-counsellors, or in the commission of the peace, or to have judicial power in the star-chamber, or in any civil court. Mortifications of all sorts overwhelmed that body, who had been for some time the church triumphant. The name of the spiritual lords was left out in acts of parliament, and the law ran in the name of the king, lords, and commons. On the day appointed for a solemn fast and humiliation, the whole order of temporal peers, contrary to former practice, in going to church took place of the spiritual (x). Carlisle and Morton, two moderate bishops, were appointed to preach; and whilst the second service was reading at the communion-table, it was interrupted by the sudden singing of a psalm. Marshal and Burgess, two clergymen who had been stigmatized with the epithet of puritanical, preached seven hours before the commons; and, as a requisite preliminary to their receiving the sacrament, the communion-table was removed from the east-end of St. Margaret's to the middle of the area (y). This was a prelude to the following order: "That commissioners be sent into all counties for the defacing, demolishing, and quite taking away, all images or tables turned altar-wise, crucifixes, superstitious pictures, monuments, and relics of idolatry, out of all churches and chapels." A committee which was appointed by the commons to take cognizance of the offences of ecclesiastics, and usually denominated the committee of scandalous ministers, received daily accounts of such follies and enormities committed mitted by that body, that the resentment of the house was continually supplied with new fuel (z).

(w) The severity of justice was sharpened from the resentment of that cruel usage which non-conformists had met with in this reign. One Dr. Layfield pleaded, that he had privilege as a member of the convocation-house; but the commons resolved that he should be sent for as a delinquent, notwithstanding his plea. Rushworth, vol. iv. p. 59.

The present temper of the commons encouraged the public to hope an entire release from the spiritual tyranny they had so long endured. The citizens of London, to the number of fifteen thousand, subscribed a petition against the hierarchy and government of the church of England. To the petition was annexed twenty-eight articles, containing objections to the episcopal office: those objections were founded on the unlawfulness of the order, the vices of those who composed it, and the abuses with which it had been exercised. This petition was presented to the house by alderman Pennington, and was followed by three more of the same kind; one from Gloucester, one from the inhabitants of the county of Kent, and another subscribed by seven hundred ministers. These petitions were very warmly attacked by lord Digby, and with much learning defended by Mr. Fiennes: the house had the complaisance to order, that they should be committed, and in convenient time debated (a).

Histherto the king seemed to have resigned himself to the sudden fate which had so unexpectedly fallen upon him—In one moment of time reduced, from governing with an absolute sway, to be the most insignificant and the most impotent part of the legislative power: but roused by the danger which now threatened his beloved episcopacy, he sent for the two houses to Whitehall, and told them, that he intended to reform all innovations in church and state, and to reduce matters of religion and government to what they were in the purest times of queen Elizabeth; but that some men, encouraged by the sitting of this parliament, more maliciously than ignorantly, put no difference between reformation and alteration of government: hence it came that divine service was irreverently interrupted, petitions were tumultuously given, and much of his revenue detained and disputed. "Now, added he, I put great difference betwixt reformation and alteration of government: though I am for the first, I cannot give way to the latter. I will not say that bishops may not have over-stretched their power, or encroached upon the temporal, which, if you find, correct and reform the abuse according to the wisdom of former times; and so far I am with you: nay farther, if upon serious debate you shall shew me that bishops have some temporal authority inconvenient to the state, and not so necessary to the church for the support of episcopacy, I shall not be unwilling to persuade them to lay it down (b). Yet by this you must understand, that I cannot consent to the taking away of their voice in parliament, which they have anciently enjoyed under so many of my predecessors, even before the conquest, and ever since, and which I conceive I am bound to maintain, as one of the fundamental institutions of this kingdom."

Neither house of parliament took any notice of the king's speech: they joined in a remonstrance which shewed how many priests had been discharged within a few years; that the pope had a nuncio or agent at Rome resident in the city of London; that the Papists as publicly resorted to hear mass at the queen's palace as others did to attend their parish-churches. For these reasons, they insisted on the necessity of the laws being put into execution against Jesuits and seminary priests; and that one Goodman, a priest, should be left to the justice of the law. To this the king thought fit to return answer, that he would provide against Jesuits and priests, by setting forth, with all speed, a proclamation commanding them to depart the kingdom, under pain of being proceeded against according to law; that as to Rossetti, he had no commission as a nuncio, but to entertain a personal correspondence between the pope and the queen: he would persuade her to remove him, since the misunderstanding of his condition gave offence; that he would take care to restrain his subjects from resorting to mass at Denmark House, St. James's, and the chapels of ambassadors; for Goodman the priest, he had reprieved him, because, as neither queen Elizabeth nor his father avowed that any priests were executed merely for religion, it might be of bad consequence to his subjects and the Protestants abroad; but he remitted that particular case to both houses. The commons sent an order to all the justices of the peace of Westminster, London, and Middlesex, and all the counties in England and Wales, enjoining them to command the churchwardens, and other officers, to present the names of the several Recusants within their parishes, that they might be proceeded against according to law, notwithstanding any institution or restraint.

The circular letters written by the queen, by sir Kenelm Digby, Mr. Mountague, and the body of Papists in London, were laid before the commons; and Digby, Mountague, sir John Winter, and sir Basil Brook, were strictly examined concerning the disposal of the monies raised, and the authority which Con and Rossetti had from the pope. The queen sent a letter to the commons, informing them, that it was she who wrote effectually to the king to persuade him to call a parliament; that since she has been willing to do all good offices between the king and the people, she would remove Rossetti in convenient time; and for the resort complained of, would be careful not to exceed that which was convenient and necessary for her religion. She farther observed, that the parliament was not satisfied with the manner of raising money at her entreaty from the Catholics; that she was moved thereunto by her dear and tender regard to the king: if it was illegal, she was ignorant of the law, but promised hereafter not to do any thing that did not stand with the established laws of the realm. No other answer was returned to the queen's letter, but that the commons gave her majesty thanks for her gracious expressions.

Some time after, the king shewed to the upper house a letter he had received from Goodman the priest; wherein he desired to be executed rather than live the subject of discontent between the king and people. The letter probably had the effect for which it was written, and excited feelings of compassion in the parliament: the commons dropt the pursuit, and we hear nothing of Goodman's execution. The prosecution of other kind of criminals took up, at this time, the attention of the house. The commons having secured the two notorious offenders, Strafford and Laud, mortified the church, and put the ecclesiastical affairs of the kingdom in some train of reformation: they took into consideration the general heads of their civil grievances; they cancelled all the patents which had been granted for monopolies, as contrary to express statutes; declared every one concerned in them delinquents; and expelled all their members who were monopolists or projectors. On the grievance of monopolists, sir John Colepeper, member for Kent, made to the house the following ludicrous representation: "The monopolists and polers of the people, said he, like the frogs of Egypt, have gotten possession of our dwellings; we have scarce a room free for them; they sup in our cup, they dip in our dish, they sit by our fire; we find them in the dye-fat, wash-bowl, and powdering-tub; they share with the butler in his box; they have marked and sealed us from head to foot. Mr. Speaker, they will not bate us a pin; we may not buy our own cloaths without their brokage: these are the leeches that have sucked the commonwealth so hard that it is almost become hectical. Some of them have a vizard to hide the brand made by that good law in the last parliament of king James; they shelter themselves under the name of a corporation."

To shew the privy counsellors what the commons thought of their past conduct and pretensions, Mr. Neville, a member of parliament, was committed to the Tower for reporting to the council what had been spoken in the house. Sir William Saville was sent for as a delinquent on the same account. A committee was appointed to take into consideration the breaches of parliamentary privilege, both in the last parliament, and that of the third of this reign, and especially the proceedings against Mr. Hollis, sir John Elliot, &c. to consider what reparations were fit to be granted to the parties grieved, and of some course to prevent the like hereafter. On the question, it was resolved, nullo contradicente, that the charge imposed upon the subject for the providing and furnishing of ships, commonly called ship-money, was against the law of the realm, and the subjects' right of property, contrary to former resolutions of parliament, and to the Petition of Right; that the extra-judicial opinions of the judges were contrary to the said laws and resolutions, and likewise all the writs commonly called ship-writs; and the judgement in the exchequer in Mr. Hampden's case, both in matter and substance. A committee was appointed to go to the several judges, to enquire of them, in what manner, and by whom, they were solicited or threatened to give any opinion or judgement concerning ship-money (c).

(z) A complaint was made against a minister for saying, that Puritans were damned rogues because they refused the oath; he hoped they would hang in Hell; and wished himself in Hell to be their hangman; and taught in his pulpit, that every one ought to learn to dance, for those who could not dance would be damned. Another complaint was exhibited, that in a certain parish in the West country two days were spent in the dedication of an altar-cushion and pulpit-cloth. Diurnal Occurrences, p. 32, & seq.

Thus, in a few weeks, this house of commons, not opposed, or rather seconded by the peers, had produced such a revolution in the government, that the two most powerful and most favoured ministers of the king were thrown into the Tower, and daily expected to be tried for their life: two other ministers had, by flight alone, saved themselves from a like fate: all the king's servants saw that no protection could be given them by their master: a new jurisdiction was erected in the nation; and before that tribunal all those trembled, who had before exulted most in their credit and authority. What rendered the power of the commons more formidable was, the extreme prudence with which it was conducted. Not content with the authority which they had acquired by attacking these great ministers, they were resolved to render the most considerable bodies of the nation obnoxious to them. Though the idol of the people, they determined to fortify themselves likewise with terrors, and to overawe those who might still be inclined to support the falling ruins of monarchy.

During the late military operations, several powers had been exercised by the lieutenants and deputy-lieutenants of counties: and these powers, though necessary for the defence of the nation, and even warranted by all former precedent, yet not being authorised by statute, were now voted to be illegal; and the persons who assumed them, declared delinquents. In consequence of that determination, many of the nobility and prime gentry of the nation, while only exerting, as they thought, the legal powers of magistracy, unexpectedly found themselves involved in the crime of delinquency. And the commons reaped this multiplied advantage by their vote: they disarmed the crown; they established the maxims of rigid law and liberty, and spread the terror of their own authority.

The writs for ship-money had been directed to the sheriffs, who were required, and even obliged under severe penalties, to assess the sums upon individuals, and to levy them by their authority: yet were all the sheriffs and all those who had been employed in that illegal service, voted, by a very rigorous sentence, to be delinquents. The king, by the maxims of law, could do no wrong: his ministers and servants, of whatever degree, in case of any violation of the constitution, were alone culpable.

All the farmers and officers of the customs, who had been employed during so many years in levying tonnage and poundage, and the new impositions, were likewise declared criminals, and were afterwards glad to compound for a pardon by paying a fine of one hundred and fifty thousand pounds.

Every discretionary or arbitrary sentence of the star-chamber and high commission courts, which, from their very constitution, were arbitrary, underwent a severe scrutiny: and all those who had concurred in such sentences, were voted to be liable to the penalties of law. There was not any minister of the king or member of the council, but found himself exposed by this decision.

The commons next sent up an accusation against sir John Brampstone, lord chief justice of the King's-Bench, sir Humphrey Davenport, justice Berkeley, and justice Crawley. The lords enforced them to enter into recognizance of ten thousand pounds a-piece to appear and answer before the parliament: at the same time they ordered, that judge Berkeley, for taking insufficient bail, should pay a debt of five hundred pounds, with interest, which was owing to a citizen by lord Wentworth. This infamous judge, having been found more guilty than his brethren, was, on a stricter examination of his conduct, impeached of high-treason, and, to the exaltation of liberty and justice, and the confusion of evil ministers, by order of the peers, taken off his tribunal in the court of King's-Bench, and carried to prison. Lord Falkland distinguished himself by a very warm speech against the judges.

The sanction of the lords and commons, as well as that of the king, was declared necessary for the confirmation of ecclesiastical canons. That decision, which abolished all legislative power except that of parliament, was requisite for completing the new plan of liberty, and rendering it quite uniform and systematical. Almost all the bench of bishops, and the most considerable of the inferior clergy, who had voted in the late convocation, found themselves exposed by these new principles to the imputation of delinquency.

The most unpopular of all Charles's measures, and the least justifiable, was the revival of monopolies, so solemnly abolished, after reiterated endeavours, by a recent act of parliament. Sensible of this unhappy measure, the king had of himself recalled, during the time of his first expedition against Scotland, many of these oppressive patents; and the rest were now annulled by authority of parliament, and every one who was concerned in them declared delinquents. The commons carried so far their detestation of this odious measure, that they assumed a power which had formerly been seldom practised, and they expelled all their members who were monopolists or projectors.

The whole sovereign power being thus in a manner transferred to the commons, and the government, without any seeming violence or disorder, being changed in a moment from a monarchy almost absolute, to a pure democracy; the popular leaders seemed willing for some time to suspend their active vigour, and to consolidate their authority, ere they proceeded to any violent exercise of it. Every day produced some new harangue on past grievances. The detestation of former usurpations, was farther enlivened: the jealousy of liberty roused; and agreeably to the spirit of free government, no less indignation was excited, by the view of a violated constitution, than by the ravages of the most enormous tyranny.

This was the time, says Hume, when genius and capacity of all kinds, freed from the restraint of authority, and nourished by unbounded hopes and projects, began to exert themselves, and be distinguished by the public. Then was the celebrated sagacity of Pym matured, not chilled by his advanced age and long experience: then was displayed the mighty ambition of Hampden, taught disguise, not moderation, from former constraint; supported by courage, conducted by prudence, embellished by modesty: then too were known the dark, ardent, and dangerous character of St. John; the impetuous spirit of Hollis, violent and sincere, open and entire in his enmities and in his friendships; the enthusiastic genius of young Vane, who appeared to be extravagant in the ends which he pursued, though sagacious and profound in the means which he employed.

So little apology would be received for past measures, so contagious the general spirit of discontent, that even men of the most moderate tempers, and the most attached to the church and monarchy, exerted themselves with the utmost vigour in the redress of grievances, and in prosecuting the authors of them. The lively and animated sir Kenelm Digby displayed his eloquence on this occasion, the firm and undaunted Capel, the modest and candid Palmer. In this list too of patriot royalists are found the names of Hyde and Falkland. Though in their ultimate views and intentions, these men differed widely from the former; in their present actions and discourses, an entire concurrence and unanimity was observed.

By the daily harangues against illegal usurpations, not only the house of commons inflamed themselves with the highest animosity against the court: the nation caught new fire from the popular leaders, and seemed now to have made the first discovery of the many supposed disorders in the government. The metropolis especially, being the seat of parliament, was highly animated with the spirit of mutiny and disaffection. Tumults were daily raised; seditious assemblies encouraged; and every man neglecting his own business was wholly intent on the defence of liberty and religion. By stronger contagion, the popular affections were communicated from breast to breast, in this place of general rendezvous and society.

The harangues of members, now first published and (c) A committee was also appointed to draw up a charge against the lord Finch, and the rest of the judges in this business; to enquire also of the several denials of Habeas Corpus and prohibitions, their extra-judicial proceedings and opinions concerning ecclesiastical jurisdiction, and the court of Admiralty, their denial of legal and ordinary proceedings in cases of justice, and binding of the whole kingdom in one man's particular case. Rushworth, vol. iv. p. 89, & seq.

dispersed,

dispersed, kept alive the discontents against the king's administration. The pulpits, delivered over to puritanical preachers and lecturers, whom the commons settled in all the considerable churches, resounded with outcries against grievances, and were active in zealous expressions for liberty. Vengeance was fully taken for the long silence and constraint, in which, by the authority of Laud and the high commission, these preachers had been retained. The press, freed from all fear or reserve, swarmed with productions which disseminated the love of liberty, and which enjoined the people to assert their rights against the arbitrary power of the crown.

The sentence which had been executed against Prynne, Bastwic, and Burton, now suffered a revisal from parliament. These men, far from being tamed by the rigorous punishments which they had undergone, showed still a disposition of repeating their satirical reflections against the ministry; and the ministers were afraid lest new satires should issue from their prisons, and still farther inflame the prevailing discontents. By an order, therefore, of council, they had been carried to remote prisons; Bastwic to Scilly, Prynne to Jersey, Burton to Guernsey; all access to them was denied; and the use of books, and of pen, ink, and paper, was refused them (d). The sentence for these additional punishments was immediately reversed by the commons: even the first sentence, upon examination, was declared illegal: and the judges who passed it were ordered to make reparation to the sufferers. When the prisoners landed in England, they were received and entertained with the highest demonstrations of affection, were attended by a mighty confluence of people of all ranks, their charges were borne with great magnificence, and liberal presents bestowed on them. On their approach to any town, all the inhabitants crowded to receive them, and welcomed their reception with shouts and acclamations. Their train still increased, as they drew nigh to London. Some miles from the city, the zealots of their party met them in great multitudes, and attended their triumphant entrance: boughs were carried in procession; the roads were strewed with flowers; and amidst the highest exultations of joy, were intermingled loud and virulent invectives against the prelates, who had so cruelly persecuted such godly personages. Lilburne, Leighton, and every one that had been punished for seditious libels during the preceding administration, now recovered their liberty, and were decreed damages from the judges and ministers of justice.

Not only the present disposition of the nation ensured impunity to all libellers: a new method of framing and dispersing libels was invented by the leaders of popular discontent. Petitions to parliament were drawn, craving redress against particular grievances; and when a sufficient number of subscriptions were procured, the petitions were presented to the commons, and immediately published. These petitions became secret bonds of association among the subscribers, and seemed to give undoubted sanction and authority to the complaints which they contained. Indeed so many grievances were offered, both by the members, and by petitions without-doors, that the house was divided into above forty committees, charged, each of them, with the examination of some particular violation of law and liberty, which had been complained of (e).

From the reports of their committees, the house daily passed votes, which mortified and astonished the court, and inflamed and animated the nation. Ship-money was declared illegal and arbitrary; the sentence against Hampden cancelled; the court of York abolished; compositions for knighthood stigmatized; the enlargement of the forests condemned; patents for monopolies annulled; and every late measure of administration treated with reproach and obloquy. To-day, a sentence of the star-chamber was exclaimed against: to-morrow, a decree of the high-commission. Every act of council was represented as arbitrary and tyrannical; and the general inference was still inculcated, that a formed design had been laid to subvert the laws and constitution of the kingdom.

From necessity, the king remained entirely passive during the whole of these operations. The few servants, who continued faithful to him, were seized with astonishment at the rapid progress made by the commons in power and popularity, and were glad to compound for their impunity. The torrent rising to so dreadful and unexpected a height, despair seized all those, who from interest or habit were most attached to monarchy. And as for those who maintained their duty to the king, they seemed by their concurrence to swell that inundation which began already to deluge every thing. "You have taken the whole machine of government in pieces," said Charles in a discourse to the parliament; "a practice frequent with skilful artists, when they desire to clear the wheels from any rust which may have grown upon them. The engine," continued he, "may again be restored to its former use and motions, provided it be put up entire; so as not a pin of it be wanting." But this was far from the intention of the commons. The machine they thought, with great reason, was incumbered with many wheels and springs, which retarded and crossed its operations, and destroyed its utility. In order to maintain that high authority which they had acquired, the commons, besides confounding and overawing their opponents, judged it requisite to inspire courage into their friends and adherents; particularly into the Scots, and the religious Puritans, to whose assistance and good offices they were already so much beholden.

So soon as the Scots were masters of the northern counties, they laid aside their first professions, of paying for every thing; and in order to prevent the destructive expedient of plunder and free quarters, the country consented to give them a regular contribution of eight hundred and fifty pounds a-day, in full of their subsistence. The parliament, that they might relieve the northern counties from so grievous a burden, agreed to remit pay to the Scottish, as well as to the English army; and because subsidies would be levied too slowly for so urgent an occasion, money was borrowed from the citizens upon the security of particular members. Two subsidies were at first voted; and as the intention of this supply was to indemnify the members, who, by their private, had supported public credit, this pretence was immediately laid hold of, and the money was ordered to be paid, not into the treasury, but to commissioners appointed by parliament: a practice which, as it diminished the authority of the crown, was willingly embraced, and was afterwards continued by the commons, with regard to every branch of revenue which they granted to the king. The invasion of the Scots had evidently been the cause of assembling the parliament: the presence of their army reduced the king to that total subjection in which he was now held: the commons, for this reason, openly professed their intention of retaining these invaders, till all their own enemies should be suppressed, and all their purposes effected. "We cannot yet spare the Scots," said Strode in the house; "the sons of Zeruiah are still too strong for us:" an allusion to a passage of scripture, according to the mode of that age. Eighty thousand pounds a month were requisite for the subsistence of the two armies; a sum much greater than the subject had ever been accustomed, in any former period, to pay to the public. And though several subsidies, together with a poll-tax, were from time to time voted to answer the charge; the commons still took care to be in debt, in order to render the continuance of the session the more necessary.

The Scots being such useful allies to the malcontents in England, were courted with the utmost complaisance. The king having, in his first speech, called them rebels, observed that he had given great offence to the parliament; and he was immediately obliged to soften, and even retract the expression. The Scottish commissioners, of whom the most considerable were the earl of Rothes and lord Loudon, found every advantage in conducting their treaty; yet made no haste in bringing it to an issue. They were lodged in the city, and kept an intimate correspondence, as well with the magistrates, who were extremely disaffected, as with the popular leaders in both houses (f).

The most effectual expedient for paying court to the (d) This we have noticed in a preceding part, but it was necessary here to recapitulate it, that the thread of the discourse might not be broken.

(e) Besides the general committees of religion, trade, privileges, laws, many subdivisions of these were framed, and a strict scrutiny was every where carried on.

(f) St. Antholin's church was assigned them for their devotions; and their chaplains, here, began openly to practise the Presbyterian form of worship, which, except in foreign languages, had never hitherto been allowed any indulgence or toleration. So violent was the general propensity towards this religion, that multitudes of all ranks crowded to the church. Those, who were so happy as to find access early in the morning, kept their places the whole day: those, who were excluded, clung to the doors or windows, in hopes of catching, at least, some distant murmur or broken phrases of the discourses. All the eloquence of parliament, now well refined from pedantry, animated with the spirit of liberty, and employed in the most important interests, was not attended to with such insatiable avidity, as were these lectures.

Scots was to promote the Presbyterian discipline and worship throughout England, and to this circumstance the popular leaders among the commons, as well as their more devoted partizans, were, of themselves, sufficiently inclined. The Puritanical party, whose progress, though secret, had hitherto been gradual in the kingdom, taking advantage of the present disorders, began openly to profess their tenets, and to make attacks on the established religion. The prevalence of that sect in the parliament discovered itself, from the beginning, by insensible but decisive symptoms. The name of the spiritual lords was commonly left out in acts of parliament; and the laws ran in the name of king, lords, and commons. The clerk of the upper house, in reading bills, turned his back on the bench of bishops; nor was this mark of insolence ever taken notice of.

Notwithstanding the favourable disposition of the people, the leaders in the house resolved to proceed with caution. They introduced a bill for prohibiting all clergymen the exercise of any civil office. As a consequence, the bishops were to be deprived of their seats in the house of peers. But when this bill was presented to the peers, it was rejected by a great majority. But, to shew how little they were discouraged, the Puritans immediately brought in another bill for the total abolition of episcopacy; though they thought proper to let that bill sleep at present, in expectation of a more favourable opportunity of reviving it. Among other acts of regal executive power, which the commons were every day assuming, they issued orders for demolishing all images, altars, and crucifixes (g).

The bishop of Ely and other clergymen were attacked on account of innovations. Cozens, who had long been disagreeable to them, was exposed to new censures (h). He was likewise accused of having said, "The king has no more authority in ecclesiastical matters, than the boy who rubs my horse's heels." The expression was violent: but it is certain, that all those high churchmen, who were so industrious in reducing the laity to submission, were equally desirous of exempting the mitre from all subjection to the crown.

A committee was elected by the lower house, as a court of inquisition upon the clergy, and was commonly denominated the committee of scandalous ministers. The politicians among the commons were apprised of the great importance of the pulpit for guiding the people; the bigots were enraged against the prelatical clergy; and both of them knew that no established government could be overthrown by strictly observing the principles of justice, equity, or clemency. The proceedings, therefore, of this committee, which continued for several years, were rather arbitrary, and made great havoc both on the church and the universities. They began with harassing, imprisoning, and molesting the clergy; and ended with sequestrating and ejecting them.

It may be worth observing, that all historians, who lived near that age, or what perhaps is more decisive, all authors, who have casually made mention of those public transactions, still represent the civil disorders and convulsions as proceeding from religious controversy, and consider the political disputes about power and liberty as entirely subordinate to the other. It is true, had the king been able to support government, and at the same time to abstain from all invasion of national privileges, it seems not probable that the Puritans ever could have acquired such authority as to overturn the whole constitution: yet so entire was the subjection into which Charles was now fallen, that, had not the wound been poisoned by the infusion of theological hatred, it must have admitted of an easy remedy. Disuse of parliaments, imprisonments, and prosecution of members, ship-money, an arbitrary administration; these were loudly complained of: but the grievances which tended chiefly to inflame the parliament and nation, especially the latter, were the surplice, the rails placed about the altar, the bows exacted on approaching it, the liturgy, the breach of the sabbath, embroidered copes, lawn sleeves, the use of the ring in marriage, and of the cross in baptism. On account of these, were the popular leaders content to throw the government into such violent convulsions; and, it must be acknowledged, that the disorders in Scotland entirely, and those in England mostly, proceeded from this origin.

Some persons, partial to the patriots of this age, have ventured to put them in balance with the most illustrious characters of antiquity; and mentioned the names of Pym, Hampden, Vane, as a just parallel to those of Cato, Brutus, Cassius. Profound capacity, indeed, undaunted courage, extensive enterprize; in these particulars perhaps the Roman do not much surpass the English worthies.

The laws, as they then stood, protected the church, but exposed the Catholics to the rage of the Puritans; and these unhappy religionists, so hateful to the prevailing sect, could not hope to remain long unmolested. The voluntary contribution which they had made, in order to assist the king in his war against the Scottish covenanters, was inquired into, and represented as the greatest enormity. By an address from the commons, all officers of that religion were removed from the army, and application was made to the king for seizing two-thirds of the lands of recusants; a proportion to which, by law, he was entitled, but which he had always allowed them to possess upon easy compositions. The execution of the severe and sanguinary laws against priests was insisted on; and one Goodman, a Jesuit, who was found in prison, was condemned to a capital punishment. Charles, however, agreeably to his usual principles, scrupled to sign the warrant for his execution; and the commons expressed great resentment on the occasion (i).

Hayward, a justice of peace, having been wounded, when employed in the exercise of his office, by one James, a Catholic madman, this enormity was ascribed to the popery, not to the phrenzy, of the assassin; and great alarms seized the nation and parliament. An universal conspiracy of the Papists was supposed to have taken place; and every man, for some days, imagined that he had a sword at his throat. Though some persons of family and distinction were still attached to the Catholic superstition, it is certain that the numbers of that sect did not amount to the thirtieth part of the nation: and the frequent panics to which men, during this period, were so subject on account of the Catholics, were less the effects of fear, than of extreme rage and aversion entertained against them.

The queen-mother of France, having been forced into banishment by some court-intrigues, had retired into England; and expected shelter, amidst her present distresses, in the dominions of her daughter and son-in-law. But though she behaved in the most inoffensive manner, she was insulted by the populace on account of her religion; and was even threatened with worse treatment. The earl of Holland, lieutenant of Middlesex, had ordered a hundred musqueteers to guard her; but finding that they had imbibed the same prejudices with the rest of their countrymen, and were unwillingly employed in such a service, he laid the case before the house of peers; for the king's authority was now entirely annihilated. He represented, among other things, the indignity of the action, that so great a princess, mother to the king of France, and to the queens of Spain and England, should be affronted by the multitude. The peers thought proper to communicate the matter to the commons, whose authority over the people was absolute. The commons agreed to the necessity of protecting the queen-mother; but at the same time prayed, that she might be desired to depart the kingdom: "For the quieting those jealousies in the hearts of his majesty's well-affected subjects, occasioned by some ill instruments about that queen's person, by the flowing of priests and Papists to her house, and by the use and practice of the idolatry of the mass, and exercise of other superstitious services of the Romish church, to the great scandal of true religion."

Charles, in the former part of his reign, had endeavoured to overcome the intractable and encroaching spirit

(g) The zealous sir Robert Harley, to whom the execution of these orders was committed, removed all crosses even out of streets and markets; and, from his abhorrence of that superstitious figure, it is said, that he would not any-where allow one piece of wood or stone to lie over another at right angles.

(h) This clergyman, who was dean of Peterborough, was extremely zealous for ecclesiastical ceremonies; and so far was he from permitting the communicants to break the sacramental bread with their fingers, a privilege on which the Puritans strenuously insisted, he would not so much as allow it to be cut with an ordinary household instrument. A consecrated knife must perform that sacred office, and must never afterwards be profaned by any vulgar service.

(i) There remains a singular petition of Goodman, begging to be hanged, rather than prove a source of contention between the king and his people. He escaped with his life; but it seems more probable that he was overlooked amidst affairs of greater consequence, than that such unrelenting hatred would soften by any consideration of his courage and generosity.

of the commons, by a perseverance in his own measures, and by maintaining, at their utmost height, and even perhaps stretching beyond former precedent, the rights of his prerogative. Finding, by experience, how unsuccessful those measures had proved, and observing the low condition to which he was now reduced, he resolved to alter his whole conduct, and to regain the confidence of his people, by pliableness, by concessions, and by a total conformity to their inclinations and prejudices. It may safely be averred, that this new extreme into which the king, for want of proper counsel or support, was fallen, became no less dangerous to the constitution, and pernicious to public peace, than the other, in which he had so long and so unfortunately persevered.

The pretensions with regard to tonnage and poundage were revived, and with certain assurance of success by the commons. The levying of these duties, as formerly, without consent of parliament, and even increasing them at pleasure, was such an incongruity in a free constitution, where the people, by their fundamental privileges, cannot be taxed but by their own consent, as could no longer be endured by the jealous patrons of liberty. In the preamble therefore to the bill, by which the commons granted these duties to the king, they took care, in the strongest and most positive terms, to assert their own right of bestowing this gift, and to divest the crown of all independent title of assuming it. And that they might increase, or rather finally fix, the entire dependence and subjection of the king, they voted these duties only for two months; and afterwards, from time to time, renewed their grant for very short periods (k). Charles, in order to show that he entertained no intention ever again to separate himself from his parliament, passed this important bill without any scruple or hesitation.

With regard to the bill for triennial parliaments, he made a little difficulty. By an old statute, passed during the reign of Edward III. it had been enacted, that parliaments should be held once every year, or more frequently, if necessary: but as no provision had been made in case of failure, and no precise method pointed out for execution; this statute had been considered merely as a general declaration, and was dispensed with at pleasure. The defect was supplied by those vigilant patriots who now assumed the reins of government. It was enacted, that if the chancellor, who was first bound under severe penalties, failed to issue writs by the third of September in every third year, any twelve or more of the peers should be impowered to exert this authority: in default of the peers, that the sheriffs, mayors, bailiffs, &c. should summon the voters; and in their default, that the voters themselves should meet and proceed to the election of members, in the same manner as if writs had been regularly issued from the crown. Nor could the parliament, after it was assembled, be adjourned, prorogued, or dissolved, without their own consent, during the space of fifty days. By this bill, some of the noblest and most valuable prerogatives of the crown were retrenched; but at the same time nothing could be more necessary than such a statute, for completing a regular plan of law and liberty. A great reluctance to assemble parliaments must be expected in the king; where these assemblies, as of late, establish it as a maxim to carry their scrutiny into every part of government. During long intermissions of parliament, grievances and abuses, as was found by recent experience, would naturally creep in; and it would even become necessary for the king and council to exert a great discretionary authority, and by acts of state to supply, in every emergence, the legislative power, whose meeting was so uncertain and precarious. Charles, finding that nothing less would satisfy his parliament and people, at last gave his assent to this bill, which produced so great an innovation in the constitution. Solemn thanks were presented him by both houses. Great rejoicings were expressed both in the city and throughout the nation; and mighty professions were every where made of gratitude and mutual returns of supply and confidence.

The king thought, that what concessions were made to the public were of little consequence, if no gratifications were bestowed on individuals, who had acquired the direction of public counsels and determinations. A change of ministers as well as of measures was therefore resolved on. In one day several new privy-counsellors were sworn; the earls of Hertford, Bedford, Essex, Bristol; the lords Say, Saville, Kimbolton: within a few days after was admitted the earl of Warwick. All these noblemen were of the popular party; and some of them afterwards, when matters were pushed to extremities by the commons, proved the greatest support of monarchy.

Juxon, bishop of London, who had never desired the treasurer's staff, now earnestly solicited for leave to resign it, and retire to the care of that turbulent diocese committed to him (l). The king gave his consent; and it was intended that the earl of Bedford, a popular man of great authority as well as wisdom and moderation, should succeed him: but that nobleman, unfortunately both for king and people, died about this time. By some promotions, place was made for St. John, who was created solicitor-general. Hollis was to be made secretary of state, in the room of Windebank, who had fled: Pym, chancellor of the exchequer, in the room of lord Cottington, who had resigned: lord Say, master of the wards, in the room of the same nobleman: the earl of Essex, governor; and Hampden, tutor to the prince.

But that which retarded the execution of those projected changes was, the difficulty of satisfying all those who, from their activity and authority in parliament, had pretensions for offices, and who still had it in their power to embarrass and distress the public measures. Their associates too in popularity, whom the king intended to distinguish by his favour, were unwilling to undergo the reproach of having driven a separate bargain, and of sacrificing to their own ambitious views, the cause of the nation. And as they were sensible that they must owe their preferment entirely to their weight and consideration in parliament, they were most of them resolved still to adhere to that assembly, and both to promote its authority, and to preserve their own credit in it. On all occasions, they had no other advice to give the king, than to allow himself to be directed by his great council, or, in other words, to resign himself passively to their guidance and government. And Charles found, that, instead of acquiring friends by the honours and offices which he should bestow, he should only arm his enemies with more power to hurt him (m). The end on which the king was most intent in changing his ministers was, to save the life of the earl of Strafford, and to mollify, by these indulgences, the rage of his most furious prosecutors. But all the new counsellors and intended ministers plainly saw, that, if he escaped their vengeance, he would return into favour and authority; and they regarded his death as the only security which they could have, both for the establishment of their present power, and for success in their future enterprizes. His impeachment, therefore, was pushed on with vigour; and after long and solemn preparations was brought to a final issue.

Strafford's impeachment had been all this time preparing, and was, in the beginning of 1641, carried up to the house of lords: it consisted of twenty-eight articles, and regarded his conduct as president of the council of York, as governor of Ireland, as counsellor and commander in England. The articles in regard to Ireland related to arbitrary acts of jurisdiction, governing by martial law, billeting soldiers, enforcing obedience to arbitrary decrees by military power, deciding causes before the council which ought to have been decided in the courts of law (n), issuing proclamations, and punishing their infraction, (k) It was an instruction given by the house to the committee which framed one of these bills, to take care that the rates upon exportation may be as light as possible; and upon importation, as heavy as trade will bear: a proof that the nature of commerce began now to be understood. Journ. 1 June, 1641.

(l) It should be observed, that Juxon was a creature of Laud, who had seconded all the arbitrary motions of his patron, both in the Star-chamber and High-commission court; and that by this measure his sole aim was to screen himself from particular censure.

(m) Some time in the beginning of the year 1640, the States-General had sent a splendid embassy to Charles, to propose such a league as should be found conducive to the interest of both nations. At the same time the young prince of Orange demanded the princess Mary in marriage. Charles readily agreed to propositions so favourably presented to ingratiate himself with his people: he had the complaisance to impart at this time the proposal to the house of peers, and ask their advice on it. The peers testified their full approbation, and the marriage was concluded, to the general satisfaction of the public. The princess at this time was not above twelve years of age. This was the commencement of the connections with the family of Orange; which were afterwards attended with the most important consequences, both to the kingdom and to the house of Stuart.

(n) Among other cases of this sort, he was charged with having caused an order of the council to be entered against the lady Hibbots, by tion, enforcing arbitrary oaths (o), setting arbitrary impositions upon merchandize, granting exclusive licences for importing pipe-staves, making monopolies of tobacco and other commodities, and exercising cruelties on those who disputed these points. He was charged with obtaining from the king, that no complaint of injustice done in Ireland should be received in England, unless the party had first made their application to him; and that, to prevent any molestation in his tyrannical course, he put out a proclamation, forbidding any to depart the realm without licence from himself (p): he was charged with raising to his own use an hundred thousand pounds a-year by such acts of oppression (q). He was charged with giving power to the bishop of Downe and Conner, by a general warrant under his own hand, to attach and arrest the bodies of all such of the meaner sort, who, after citation, should either refuse to appear, or appearing should omit to fulfil, or undergo the decrees given against them (r). He was accused of restoring many popish religious houses, of raising an army of papists, whom he paid punctually, and admitted to exercise their religion, whilst the protestant soldiers were unpaid. These were the substance of the articles that related to Ireland.

The various crimes that he was charged with as president of the council of York, and counsellor, were, That he, being made president of the king's council in the northern parts, had put into execution instructions against law, which never had been practised by other presidents, exercised an exorbitant and illegal power over his majesty's subjects in those parts, and fined and imprisoned many to their ruin; and that he might exercise this unjust power with the greater licence, did procure farther directions, by which he was invested with a more oppressive and unlawful authority than any of his predecessors. He was accused of saying publicly at the assizes held for the county of York, that the king's little finger should be heavier than the loins of the law (s). The twentieth and twenty-first, second, third, fourth, fifth, and sixth articles of his impeachment related to his conduct in the capacity of counsellor: that he had irritated the king against the Scots, advised him to an offensive war, and against an accommodation; that he had told the king, if the parliament did not answer his expectation, he would serve him in another way. He was accused of raising an army in Ireland of eight thousand foot and one thousand horse; of publicly declaring in England, that his majesty should try first the parliament here, and if that did not supply him according to his occasions, he might use his prerogative as he pleased, to levy what he needed; he should be acquitted both by God and man if he supplied himself, though against the will of his subjects: that he had advised the king to dissolve the last parliament, and told him, that having tried the affections of his people, he was absolved from all rule of government, and might do what power would admit; that he had an army in Ireland that he might employ to reduce this kingdom to obedience. He was also accused of advising the rigorous mode of levying of ship money; of telling the aldermen of London, that they deserved to be put to fine and ransom, and that no good would be done with them till an example was made of them, and that they were laid up by the heels, and some of them hanged. The twenty-sixth article directly charges him with having counselled the king to seize the bullion and the money in the Mint (t), and to debase the coin, by mixing it with brass; and that on the officers of the Mint expressing their detestation of the scheme, and giving him reasons against debasing the current coin, he told them, that the French king was accustomed to send commissaries of horse with commission to examine men's property, that they might know what to levy on them; and that he turned to the lord Cottington, and said, it was a point worthy his lordship's consideration.

The crimes charged against him as a commander in the English army were, the levying by force, in the late northern expedition, eight pence (u) a-day from each of the inhabitants of the county of York that were possessed of property; with having lost Newcastle by neglect; and with being the cause of the defeat of the English at Newburn, by peremptorily commanding the lord Conway to fight the Scots, though Conway had represented them to be much superior to the troops under his command (v). The commons had applied to the king, that he would allow their committee to examine privy counsellors with regard to opinions delivered at the board: this the king was persuaded to assent to, lest the denial should occasion very black suspicions (w), but the concession had an effect he did not foresee: it struck an awe on the licentious debates of that board, where every member, without fear of enquiry and punishment, used freely to propose illegal and treasonable expedients for the supporting the arbitrary measures of the crown.

Strafford having, with his power, lost his influence over the parliament of Ireland, that assembly now exerted a freedom of debate, and a vigour of action, which they had never practised: each house sent over into England a committee to assist in the prosecution of their governor; put a stop to the manner of levying subsidies, which had been forced upon them by Strafford (x); and carried up impeachments against sir Richard Bolton, their present chancellor, sir Gerard Lowther, their chief justice and Bramhall, bishop of Derry, all of them the creatures of the lieutenant's promoting, and the tools of his tyranny (y).

Westminster Hall was chosen by the parliament as the place where Strafford should be tried: scaffolds were erected, where both houses sat; the lords as judges, and the commons as accusers (z). The earl of Arundel, in the by which she was obliged to relinquish an estate which was conveyed to sir Robert Meredith for the use of Strafford. On the lady's hesitating to perform the order, Strafford said, 'If you do not perform it by such a day, I will send you to the castle, and there you shall lie a month, at the end of which you shall be brought to the board, and have five hundred pounds laid on your head; at another month's end a thousand more, and you shall go back to the castle again; and after that, a third month's imprisonment, and your fine increased. Your estate, I know, is very great, and if it were ten times bigger I will make it crack."—Rushworth, vol. viii. p. 221, 227.

(o) The oath imposed on the Scots was ushered in with a specious introduction of a petition from some of the individuals of that nation, that they might, by such a testimony of their allegiance, purge themselves from the imputation of disaffection, which they might otherwise incur from the treasonable conduct of their countrymen the covenanters.—The procuring such a petition Strafford proposed at the Irish council-table; and the men of fortune of the Scotch nation were sent for immediately to Dublin. On Strafford's telling them, that it was expected they should do something to vindicate themselves from any aspersions that might be flung on them, the bishops of Downe and Rapho proposed the petitioning that they might join in an oath. Sir James Montgomery making some objections to the slavish conclusions in the oath, Strafford answered, "Sir James, you may petition, or not, as you will; but if you do not, or who doth not, shall do worse." The bishop of Rapho drew the oath, and the bishop of Downe complained that it was too cold and mean. Rushworth, vol. viii.

(p) The committees from the Irish parliament could not obtain leave to come over to England, till, by the desire of the English parliament, the restraint which Strafford had laid on the inhabitants of that kingdom was taken off, and a free communication opened between the two nations. Rushworth, vol. viii. p. 409.

(q) After Strafford was impeached, the Irish house of commons seized the books and accounts of the farmers of tobacco, of which the earl of Strafford was chief, discharged their officers and collectors, ordered the keepers of their magazines to give a detail of the debts owing, and confiscated the whole, to the lord Strafford's damage above eighty thousand pounds. Carte's Life of Ormond, vol. i. p. 127.

(r) This commission was executed with the additional cruelty of wounding, beating, and imprisonment. Rushworth, vol. viii. p. 238.

(s) It was on the occasion of his laying a command on sir David Fowlis to repair a bridge: sir David told him, he could not do it by law. On this Strafford replied, "Sir, some are all for law and lawyers; but you shall know that the king's little finger is heavier than the loins of the law." Rushworth, vol. viii. p. 712.

(t) On seizing the money in the Mint, Strafford said, that the merchants ought to bear the damage; though they thought it a strange business here, yet beyond sea it was not thought so; if they speeded amiss they might thank themselves; they were more ready to help the rebels than to give his majesty his due: fourteen thousand pounds they owed for ship money. Rushworth, vol. viii.

(u) This tax was raised by military force. Warrants were given out for paying it, on pain of death. Strafford pretended, that he acted in this affair with the consent of the council of peers: the truth of this assertion those lords denied by a solemn protestation in parliament. Rushworth, vol. viii. p. 37, & seq. 616.

(v) Not one individual of the Irish clergy had spirit enough to exhibit a complaint against him for the arbitrary manner in which he enforced the English canons on their church: so that black part of his conduct was not in his charge.

(w) The lords had given leave, that the members of their house should be examined upon oath.

(x) This tax, according to the manner of levying it, dictated by Strafford, was so heavy, that the earl of Cork in one year paid thirty-six hundred pounds for his own share. The Irish commons house having made an order for the manner of levying subsidies in future, Charles, in imitation of the behaviour of king James to the English parliament, commanded the order to be torn out of their Journals. Carte's Life of Ormond, vol. i. p. 100, 107.

(y) All the articles of grievances debated in the parliament of Ireland were opposed by the whole bench of bishops there. The bishop of Meath moved, that as all the lords spiritual were against the grievances, the naming them in their order might be spared. Carte's Life of Ormond, vol. i. p. 121.

(z) The commons sat bare-headed, whilst the lords were covered. This the absence of the lord keeper Littleton, who was indisposed (a), was appointed high steward to preside in the court (b). The commons objected to the bishops having a voice in the judgement given on Strafford, because they were forbidden by an old canon to assist in any trial of life. This canon had never yet been adhered to; but, on the present occasion, they did not think fit to irritate farther the anger of the commons, nor venture the rage of the public, by openly supporting Strafford; of themselves they thought proper to withdraw; and thus his lordship lost an advantage, which might have put some stop to the proceedings against his life. The commons also voted, that the new created peers ought to have no voice at this trial, because the accusation being agreed to whilst they were commoners, their consent to it was implied with that of the commons of England; and that they would be in the double capacity of judge and accuser. This was a very wise precaution, many commoners having been made peers on purpose to favour Strafford. The majority of this number assented to the determination of the commons; but sir Francis Seymour, a quondam patriot, who had gotten a title on this occasion, with some others, kept their seats, and the matter was no farther debated (c).

Westminster-Hall was crouded with spectators; a close gallery was prepared for the king and queen, who attended during the whole trial, which lasted eighteen days. The managers for the commons were, lord Digby, sir Walter Earle, John Pym, John Hampden, Oliver St. John, Jeoffrey Palmer, John Maynard, John Glyn, Esqs. They supported the impeachment by a variety of particular instances of an exorbitant exertion of arbitrary power. The first day was spent in reading the impeachment; on the second day Mr. Pym opened the pleadings. "Strafford boasts," said he, "that he was a means of calling a parliament: my lords, parliaments without parliamentary liberties are but a fair and plausible way into bondage. Sir Pierce Crosby, for speaking against a bill in the commons' house, was sequestered from the council-table, and committed to prison. Sir John Clotworthy was threatened that he should lose a lease he had. Mr. Barnwell and two other gentlemen were threatened they should have troops of horses put upon them for speaking in the house. Proxies by dozens were given. My lords, parliaments, coming in with these circumstances, they be grievances, mischiefs, and miseries; no works of thanks and honour. He says, he has executed his commission with moderation. When you find so many men imprisoned, some adjudged to death, some executed without law; when you find so many public rapines on the state; soldiers sent to make good his decrees; so many whippings in defence of monopolies; so many jurors fined for not giving verdicts of his side; men of quality disgraced, set in the pillory, and wearing papers; can you think there was moderation? If you compare his courses with other parts of the world, he will be found beyond all in tyranny and harshness; but if you compare them with his mind and disposition, perhaps there was moderation: the habit of cruelty in himself, no doubt, is more perfect than any act of cruelty he hath committed. If this be his moderation, I may truly say that is verified in him, 'The mercies of the wicked are cruel.' For his honourable way of increasing the king's revenue; if monopolies, if vexation of the subject, be honourable ways, we shall leave that to your lordships to judge. Most of his increases have been made upon monopolies. It is true, there is another way of bargaining; but it hath been mixed with rapine, rigour, and injustice: men have been driven to resign their estates. Is this a just way of improving a king's revenue? That I shall submit to your lordships (d)."

In Strafford's charge, as delivered by the managers, it appeared, that in all his employments he had exercised very arbitrary acts of power, and his whole conduct since he had been invested with authority had been highly insolent. Even in Ireland, the government of which had been ever tyrannical, he had outgone former governors, and had been guilty of many unprecedented acts of power.

His answer is hardly plausible, though drawn up with art: he could not deny the illegality of his actions, nor efface an air of insolence that ran through all his proceedings. Nothing can be more puerile than his defence on the main article, that of having advised the king to proceed in the way of arms; and, if he was denied money by parliament, to raise it by other means. Notwithstanding the atrociousness of the facts charged against him, and proved by a number of able testimonies, and by the whole tenor of his conduct and conversation; notwithstanding the frivolousness of his defence, a certain blandishment of behaviour which he assumed on this occasion; a certain air of importance misconstrued into dignity; a certain speciousness of manner, mistaken for decency and humility; these, with the particular circumstances of his situation, reduced in an instant from the summit of power and splendor, to plead as a criminal at the bar of a court of justice, produced sentiments in his favour from the weak part of the audience: the women, in particular, not comprehending, or being inattentive to, the solidity of the arguments urged by the commons, and being deaf to the eloquence and ability of the managers, attended with pity and partiality to the unhappy prisoner. Besides the favourable sentiments which he had the art to excite in his spectators, through the whole course of his pleadings, he endeavoured to prejudice his judges in his favour: his expressions were full of veneration for the body of peers, and he insinuated that their privileges were interested in his fate. Mr. Glyn noticed this management, and told the lords, that though the prisoner had magnified the peers of the realm almost to idolatry; yet when he was in his kingdom in Ireland, and had power over them, he shewed the respect he had to the peers of the kingdom, judging some to death, committing others to prison, and seizing their estates.

The members of the house of commons had unquestionably proved an intention in the earl of Strafford to subvert the fundamental laws of the kingdom: this is not within the description of treason in the statute of 25 Edward III. They proceeded against him on a salvo of that act, which provides, that the king and parliament have power of determining what is treason, and what not. They therefore voted, that the facts proved upon him were of a treasonable nature.

On the 13th of April, 1641, he was called to the bar, and commanded by the lords to sum up his evidence: this he did in a long speech, the argumentative part of which is certainly very weak; and his endeavour to extenuate his crimes very impotent. His arbitrary, extrajudicial acts, he called an over-exercising of a jurisdiction. It was not high treason in a judge to enlarge his jurisdiction. "But, my lords," said he, "if all these had been done without any manner of authority, it had not been a subversion, but rather a diversion of the law; so long as I keep the rule of the law, and do the same thing that another man does in a more legal way, I mean in a more warrantable place, I say, my doing of the same thing in an improper place, is not a subversion, but a diversion of the law (e). If you will bring in the Thames about Lambeth, to come in again below the bridge, the river is the same, though the course be diverted to another place: so the fundamental law is the same, though the course be

This the commons condescended to for the following reason: because they sat as a committee only of the commons' house, whilst the lords represented their whole house. The commons declared, they might come as a house if they pleased. They resolved, "That if the earl of Strafford had liberty given him to speak in his defence, before the managers appointed to manage the evidence entered into the management of it, they should forbear to proceed till they had farther orders from the house." Rushworth, vol. viii. p. 40.

(a) On Finch's flight, he was promoted to the seals, and created a baron.

(b) The earl of Lindsey was high-constable.

(c) The lords resolved, that no use should be made of proxies on Strafford's trial. It was determined, that council should not be admitted him as to matters of fact, but only as to matters of law. The lords reserved to themselves the liberty of judging what were matters of fact, and what matters of law; and the commons declared, that no proceedings in this case should be a precedent to their prejudice.

(d) Mr. Maynard, in his pleadings against Strafford, asserted, that treason against the person of the prince fell short of the treasons he had committed: one prince might be succeeded by another; but when law and justice were taken from the throne, and will placed in their stead, there was no hope of remedy. Mr. Stroud said, that to incite a prince to tyrannical acts was a greater offence than to kill him: he might die otherwise with a fair reputation. Rushworth, vol. viii.

Strafford was totally ignorant of the transactions which had passed in Ireland when the Irish remonstrance was produced at his trial, and that it appeared that the house of commons there had voted him guilty of high treason. He exclaimed, in the bitterness of his disappointment, that there was a conspiracy to take away his life. He was reprehended for this by the managers, and obliged to ask pardon on his knees. Besides those complaints of the Irish set forth in Strafford's impeachment, the lords, by a committee of their house, complained to the king, that they were obliged, on their absence from parliament, to leave their proxies with the officers of state. Guthrie. Carte's Life of Ormond.

(e) To divert a legal and just proceeding into an arbitrary one, Mr. Glyn observed, was not only turning but corrupting the clear and crystal streams of legal justice to muddy waters of bitterness and death.

diverted to another place. I say, the fundamental law is the same, only it is carried in another pipe."

The conclusion of Strafford's speech, in which he used every argument to repel the principal positions on which the bill depending in the house of commons was founded, has been so much extolled for its style and weight of reason, that the author of a history of these times might be accused of partiality in omitting it: "Where has this species of guilt been so long concealed, said he? where has this fire been so long buried, during so many centuries, that no smoke should appear till it burst out at once to consume me and my children? Better it were to live under no law at all, and, by the maxims of cautious prudence, to conform ourselves the best we can to the arbitrary will of a master; than fancy we have a law on which we can rely, and find at last that this law shall inflict a punishment precedent to the promulgation, and try us by maxims unheard-of till the very moment of prosecution. If I sail on the Thames, and split my vessel on an anchor, in case there be no buoy to give warning, the party shall pay me damages: but if the anchor is marked out, then is the striking on it at my own peril. Where is the mark set upon this crime? where is the token by which I should discover it? It has lain concealed under water, and no human prudence, no human innocence can save me from the destruction with which I am here threatened. It is now full two hundred and forty years since treasons were defined; and so long has it been since any man was touched to this extent, upon this crime, before myself. We have lived, my lords, happily to ourselves at home; we have lived gloriously abroad to the world: let us be content with what our fathers have left us; let not our ambition carry us to be more learned than they were in those killing and destructive arts. Great wisdom it will be in your lordships, and just providence for yourselves, for your posterities, for the whole kingdom, to cast from you into the fire these bloody and mysterious volumes of arbitrary and constructive treasons, as the primitive Christians did their books of curious arts, and betake yourselves to the plain letter of the statute, which tells you where the crime is, and points out to you the path by which you may avoid it. Let us not, to our own destruction, awake these sleeping lions, by rattling up a company of old records, which have lain for so many ages by the wall, forgotten and neglected. To all my afflictions add not this, my lords (the most severe of any) that I, for my other sins, not for my treasons, be the means of introducing a precedent so pernicious to the laws and liberties of my country. However these gentlemen at the bar say they speak for the commonwealth; and they believe so; yet, under favour, in this particular it is I who speak for the commonwealth: precedents like those endeavoured to be established against me, must draw along such inconveniencies and miseries, that in a few years the kingdom will be in the condition expressed in a statute of Henry IV. and no man shall know by what rule to govern his words and actions. Impose not, my lords, difficulties insurmountable upon ministers of state, nor disable them from serving with chearfulness their king and country. If you examine them, and under such severe penalties, by every grain, by every little weight, the scrutiny will be intolerable; the public affairs of the kingdom must be left waste, and no wise man, who has any honour or fortune to lose, will ever engage himself in such dreadful, such unknown perils. My lords, I have now troubled your lordships a great deal longer than I should have done, were it not for the interest of these pledges, which a saint in heaven has left me. I should be loth——" (Here Strafford pointed to his children, and his tears stopped his speech.) "What I forfeit for myself is nothing; but I confess, that my indiscretion should forfeit for them, it wounds me very deeply. You will be pleased to pardon my infirmity: something I should have said; but I see I shall not be able, and therefore I shall leave it. And now, my lords, I thank God I have been, by his good blessing, sufficiently instructed in the extreme vanity of all temporary enjoyments, compared to the importance of our eternal duration. And so, my lords, even so with all humility, and with all tranquillity of mind, I submit clearly and freely to your judgements; and whether that righteous doom shall be life or death, I shall repose myself, full of gratitude and confidence, in the arms of the great Author of my existence."

The earl of Strafford's situation is indeed very pathetically expressed in this conclusion of his speech; but certainly it is very deficient in point of argument; since it is apparent that a precedent of so great a criminal being condemned by the whole power of the legislature, could not, in its consequences, be so dangerous to the public, or the liberty of individuals, as the example of crimes of so atrocious a nature, and so destructive to the commonwealth, being committed with impunity. An honest and a wise man would never fear the severest scrutiny; and the weak and the wicked being deterred from accepting public offices, or, if they did accept them, being kept within just bounds by the terrors of an after enquiry and punishment, must be of infinite service to the well-governing the affairs of the kingdom.

Mr. Pym, in language manly and pathetic, breathing sentiments that nothing but the spirit of liberty could inspire, closed the pleadings of the commons. He affirmed, that it had been clearly proved that the earl of Strafford had endeavoured by his words, actions, and counsels, to subvert the fundamental laws of England and Ireland, and to introduce an arbitrary and tyrannical government. He then proceeded to shew the heinousness of the offence. In the course of his speech Mr. Pym observed, that the greatness of a king did not consist in domineering over his subjects at home, but to incline and dispose the affairs of other states and nations for the good of mankind, and the peculiar advantage of his own people; that this kind of greatness had been impaired by the late mischievous counsels. Strafford's crimes, continued the orator, were contrary to the covenant between the king and his people, confirmed by oath on both sides. He observed, that justice Thorpe was put to death for bribery, because in committing that injustice he had broken the king's oath, that solemn obligation which is the security to the whole kingdom. Strafford's offence was contrary to the end of government, which was, to prevent oppressions, to restrain the violence of great men, to open the passages of justice with indifferency to all. The end of government was, that virtue should be cherished, vice suppressed; but where arbitrary power was set up, a way was open for the advancement and encouragement of evil: such men as were apt for the exercise and maintenance of that power were only capable of preferment, whilst honest men, who would not be instruments of unjust and illegal commands, were not only not passable for employment, but subject to jealousy and danger. The end of government was, that all accidents and designs, all counsels and events, should be improved to the public good; but arbitrary power was apt to dispose all for maintenance of itself.

With respect to the absurdity of Strafford's excuses, Mr. Pym observed, that it was true, liberty belonged to counsellors; but then those matters which were good and beneficial to the commonwealth were the proper subjects of counsels; not treasons, such as the subversion of its laws, and the violation of its liberties: they could not be justifiable by any circumstance or occasion. Strafford being a counsellor made his fault more heinous, as being committed against a greater trust, and in a way of much mischief and danger. Part of Strafford's apology was, that his counsels were well intended: "Sometimes good and evil, continued Mr. Pym, truth and falsehood, can hardly be distinguished; matters hurtful and dangerous may be accompanied with such circumstances as may make them appear useful and convenient: in such cases good intentions will justify evil counsels, but when the matters propounded are evil in their nature, such as those wherewith the earl of Strafford is charged, to break public faith, and subvert laws and government, they can never be justified by any intentions, how good soever pretended. Mr. Pym concluded his harangue with observing, that the forfeitures inflicted for treason were, by the law of England, of life, honour, and estate, and all that could be forfeited; that nothing could be more equal than that Strafford should perish by the justice of that law he would have subverted. "Neither, says he, will this be a new way of blood; there are marks enough to trace this law to the very original of the kingdom; and if it hath not been put in execution, as he alledgeth for this two hundred and forty years, it was not for want of law, but that all that period hath not bred a man bold enough to commit such crimes as these; which is a circumstance that aggravates his offence, not makes him less liable to punishment."

The matters of fact being closed, Strafford demanded to be heard by his counsel on matters of law. The commons opposed this, because they had, from the first, intended to proceed by bill of attainder after closing the evidence evidence of facts. The lords were extremely unwilling to give up the privilege of being the sole judges of Strafford's guilt or innocence: they declared their resolution of hearing his counsel on the point of law; and Gardiner, the recorder of London, Lee, Lightfoot, and Lane, attorney to the prince of Wales, were the men appointed for this business. Lane's argument was an attempt to prove that the statute of 25 Edward III. was a declarative law, and so not to be interpreted as of consequence, equity, or construction, but by the express letter only; and that an act had passed in the sixth of Henry IV. which ordained, that the salvo should be holden repealed in all times to come, and nothing to be esteemed treason, but what was contained in the statute 25 Edward III. The commons thought it below their dignity to offer any answer to Lane's argument; but told the lords, they would depute one of their members to satisfy them on the legality of their proceedings. They passed votes, that it was sufficiently proved, that Strafford had endeavoured to subvert the ancient and fundamental laws of these realms of England and Ireland, and to introduce an arbitrary and tyrannical government against law, and that these endeavours were high-treason.

A paper was produced in the house, of notes taken by sir Henry Vane of a debate in council after the dissolution of the last parliament; the title of which was, "No danger of a war with Scotland, if offensive, not defensive." The notes were as follows:

"King Charles. How can we undertake offensive war, if we have no money?

Lord Strafford. Borrow of the city one hundred thousand pounds. Go on vigorously to levy ship-money. Your majesty having tried the affections of your people, is absolved and loosed from all rules of government, and to do what power will admit. Your majesty having tried all ways, and being refused, shall be acquitted before God and man; and you have an army in Ireland that you may employ to reduce this kingdom to obedience; for I am confident the Scots cannot hold out five months.

Archbishop Laud. You have tried all ways, and have always been refused; it is now lawful to take it by force.

Lord Cottington. Levies abroad there may be made for the defence of the kingdom. The lower house are weary of the king and church. All ways shall be just to raise money by, in this inevitable necessity, and are to be used, being lawful.

Archbishop Laud. For an offensive, not defensive war.

Lord Strafford. The town is full of lords: put the commission of array on foot; and if any of them offer to stir we will make them smart."

The above paper was such a corroborating evidence to what the privy-counsellors had already deposed on this debate, that a bill of attainder of the earl of Strafford passed the house, without any greater opposition than that of fifty-nine dissenting votes.

Mr. St. John was deputed by the commons to satisfy the lords on the legality of their proceeding by bill of attainder. His discourse was very prolix, and contained a vast display of law and learning. He told the lords, that the commons had found Strafford guilty of treason within the statute of 25 Edw. III. by levying war, upon the matter of the fifteenth article of their charge (f). They found him guilty of treason by assessing and laying soldiers (g) on the subjects of Ireland, within the Irish statute of 18 Hen. VI. (h) and lastly, they found him guilty of treason by the common law, in endeavouring to subvert the fundamental laws and government of the realms of England and Ireland, and instead thereof to introduce a tyrannical government against law. The principal stress of Mr. St. John's argument was, that Strafford was guilty of treason by the common law of the land, and that the statute of 1 Henry IV. was only to regulate the common courts of justice, not to limit the power of parliaments. There seems to be a great deal of reason in what he urged on this point. There have been precedents since that time of men being convicted at common law, and impeached and attainted by parliament, for treasons not specified in the statute of 25 Edw. III. Sir John Mortimer, after 1 Hen. IV. The duke of Suffolk in Henry VI.'s time, for making an improper peace with France; and Empson and Dudley, in Henry VIII.'s time, convicted at common law of high-treason, for subverting the laws of the land. The statute of 25 Edw. III. seems to have been framed with the laudable intention of protecting the subject against the violence of kings and ministers, and therefore has with great care enumerated treasons that related to the king, but meddles not with original ones, for which Strafford was impeached; concerning treasons against the nation, such as diminishing its power, its glory, or its interest in the way of trade: concerning treasons against the constitution and laws of the land it is entirely silent, and leaves their punishment to the discretion of the legislative power. If these treasons were as well defined as those which relate merely to the person of the king, it certainly would be advantageous to liberty; but a toleration of them is totally inconsistent with the safety of the constitution. St. John, however, did not strictly confine his arguments to points of law; for his warmth betrayed him into the indiscretion of advancing positions which have been much cavilled it: That were the testimony against Strafford not strictly what the law required, yet, in this way of bill, private satisfaction to each man's conscience was sufficient; that the earl had no title to plead law, because he had endeavoured to destroy the law. "It is true, added he, we give law to hares and deers, for they are beasts of chace; but it was never accounted cruel nor unfair to destroy foxes and wolves wherever they can be found, for they are beasts of prey."

Although it was highly imprudent to use such arguments as these in a discourse that should have been merely confined to matter of law, yet certainly there was some appearance of reason in what St. John advanced: a full conviction of crimes may be obtained from a complication of facts and circumstances, the nature of which, as in the present case, cannot admit of two witnesses to every article; but every article and circumstance may so corroborate the charge, as to amount to a more convincing proof than what is required by the forms of law: these forms ought never to be dispensed with in any accusation of a private nature; yet the man who would hesitate to prosecute or condemn a criminal, who it was rationally proved had, like Strafford, been guilty of atrocious acts of oppression, and made bold attempts to enslave his country, must be very lukewarm in the cause of public justice, and have very confined sentiments in regard to liberty. The arbitrary principles which it was apparent were diffused through all his government, made him a more noxious minister than a million of unjust acts which had been clear of this appearance. Arbitrary principles destroy liberty: the evil is universal and perpetual. Acts of mere injustice are temporary evils, and affect but individuals. Strafford preferred a petition to the lords, that he might be heard again in point of law, to make a defence against the bill of attainder. This the lords, out of respect to the lower house, thought fit to deny.

Charles, who had been flattered that the commons, in their proceedings against Strafford, would find a firm opposition from the peers, was so greatly alarmed at this piece of complaisance, that he went immediately to the upper house, and calling up the commons to the bar, made a speech to both houses to the following effect: "That he was convinced Strafford had been guilty of such misdemeanours, that he was not fit to serve him or the commonwealth in any place of trust; no not so much as to be a (f) Mr. St. John shewed, that the law made a distinction between subject's levying of war against subject on matters of a private nature, and the levying of war to enforce arbitrary power, and alter the laws, statutes, and government of the realm.

(g) This was inflicted by way of punishment for disobedience to the deputy's orders. The soldiers that were thus assessed on the subject killed their cattle, and consumed their provision at their pleasure. This burthen the subject was to sustain till they conformed in all things to the deputy's pleasure.

(h) Concerning this article Strafford pleaded, that by the statutes of 8 Edw. IV. and 10 Hen. VII. the English statutes were brought into Ireland, and consequently the Irish statute of 18 Hen. VI. was rendered invalid by the 1 Hen. IV. which says, that in no time to come treason shall be adjudged otherwise than is ordained by the statute 25 Edw. III. This objection was little efficacious, because an act of parliament, enacted at the same time of that of 10 Hen. VII. declares, that all the Irish statutes excepting two, whereof the Irish statute 18 Hen. VI. was none, should still be in force. To an objection Strafford made, that he could not be tried in England for offending against the Irish laws, Mr. St. John brought examples to prove that several deputies had been tried in England for offences committed in Ireland; that the common law, the expositor of statutes, was the same in both countries; and that writs of error in pleas of the crown, as well as in civil causes, had been brought even in the inferior courts of Westminster, upon judgement given in the courts of Ireland; and that writs of error lie in the parliament of England on erroneous judgement given in the Irish parliament; and that acts of parliament made in Ireland have been confirmed by the parliaments of England; and that there had been statutes made in England which concerned the lives of the Irish subjects. Rushworth, vol. viii.

high-constable. He had been present at the hearing of his trial from one end to the other, and could not in conscience condemn him of high-treason. He hoped they knew what a tender thing conscience was; he would do great matters to satisfy his people; but that no fear nor respect should ever make him go against his conscience."

This premature declaration set the commons in a flame. At their return to their house, they debated on the subject with extreme warmth, in which it was said, that his majesty had in his speech plainly asserted, that an attempt to subvert the fundamental laws of the kingdom, and introduce an arbitrary government, was not treason; that if the king might take notice of what bills were passing in either house of parliament, and declare his opinion before they came before him in a parliamentary course, it was to fore-judge their counsels, which would hinder them from applying remedies to the commonwealth suitable to the diseases it laboured under. On these arguments the house voted, that this act of the king's was the most unparalleled breach of privilege that had ever happened (i). The bill of attainder met with so great an opposition amongst the peers, that the commons would have found it a difficult matter to succeed in this important point, had they not been assisted by several favourable occurrences arising from the king's imprudence. The facility with which the parliament had hitherto obtained what they demanded of the king had been owing to his extreme desire to get rid of so troublesome a set of counsellors: he every day expected that they would disband both armies; and, according to what they had artfully flung out in several speeches, settle on the crown an ample revenue on an independent footing. In this situation he flattered himself, that he should be able to get rid of those fetters which his forced concessions had imposed on the monarchy. But finding, contrary to his hopes, that the commons, distrusting his sincerity, were determined, notwithstanding the expence, to detain their Scotch friends till they had perfected a reformation on a solid constitutional basis, he became inflamed with anger and impatience, and attempted a very criminal expedient to free himself from a situation which his pride could no longer endure. The two armies remained still in the northern parts, and were supplied from time to time with money from the parliament.

On one particular occasion that the Scots had made very pressing demands, ten thousand pounds were sent to them out of fifty thousand which had been designed for the English army. The English army, without attending to circumstances, or comprehending the difficulties the commons lay under, shewed symptoms of displeasure. Commissary Wilmot, a member of the lower house, told the speaker, that if the Scots could get money for sending a piece of paper, he did not doubt but the English officers would fall upon the same expedient. This circumstance coming to the king's ears, he endeavoured to turn the accident to his advantage, and attach the army to himself. In all his conversation with the general officers, he lamented the partiality of the parliament to the Scots, and promised if the English officers would be faithful to him, he would pawn his jewels to feed them and their soldiers. The earl of Northumberland and other principal officers being in London, the army was commanded by sir Jacob Ashley, a creature of the king's, and one whom Strafford had preferred to his service.

The queen, who had more than female propensity to intrigue, entered with greater violence than judgement into the extreme of the king's proposition, and formed a scheme for bringing the army up to London, to surprise the Tower, overawe the parliament, and fortify Portsmouth. Two poets, sir John Suckling and William Davenant, with a Mr. Jermyn, were her confidants and counsellors. The scheme was communicated to the son of lord Goring, an officer of a debauched and profligate character. The earl of Newcastle was to be general, Goring was to be lieutenant-general, and the king and prince of Wales, with one thousand horse, were to join the troops in Nottinghamshire. Piercy, brother to the earl of Northumberland, Wilmot, Ashburnham, Pollard, Berkeley, and O'Neal, had communicated with the king on a design to engage the army in his favour; and, according to directions, had drawn up a petition, which he promised to get subscribed by the officers of the army, against the lessening the power of bishops, against the disbanding the Irish army till the Scots were disbanded, and for settling the king's revenue; promising their assistance for the accomplishing these points (k). To this petition the king had the imprudence to sign C. R. as a token of his approbation.

Bold and dangerous as was the design, yet it did not match the violence of the queen's temper, nor entirely satisfy the king. Piercy, the principal agent between the king and these officers, was pressed by the king to admit Goring and Jermyn into their cabal; and this, notwithstanding Piercy represented that the things these men aimed at were beyond what the army could be brought to undertake, it was at length resolved, that the two sets of conspirators should meet to determine on a general plan of action, under an oath of secrecy not to communicate any thing that should pass among them. The army, very much to their honour, had the good sense to reject some proposals that were made to them from this cabal; and Goring, having quarreled with the party, discovered the whole plot to the leaders of the parliament.

Mr. Pym communicated the intelligence to the house. There were informations given, he said, of desperate designs, both at home and abroad, against the parliament and the peace of the nation. There was an endeavour to disaffect the army, and bring them to over-awe the parliament; there was a design upon the Tower, and attempts for the earl of Strafford to escape; that these combinations at home had a correspondency with practices abroad: the French were drawing down their forces to the sea-side; there was cause to fear their intent was upon Portsmouth; divers persons of eminency about the queen were deeply engaged in these plots. Both houses were so affected with the prospect of their danger, that a protestation, declaring that the subscribers would unite to defend their religion and liberties, was taken by almost every member of the commons house (l), and by all the lords, except Southampton and Roberts, who refused it on pretence that there was no law that enjoined it. A few days afterwards, by an order of the commons, the protestation was published, with an explanation that the doctrine of the church, specified in it to be defended, was only meant so far as it was opposite to popery and popish innovations; not to extend to the maintaining any form of worship, discipline, government, rites, or ceremonies of the church of England. The protestation, with this explanation, was recommended by the lower house to be taken by the whole nation.

The commons were by no means deficient in the necessary measures to defeat the designs of their enemies: they sent cloaths and provisions to the army, with a letter promising the speedy payment of their arrears. Lord Mandeville, sir Philip Stapleton, and sir John Clotworthy, were sent to Portsmouth to inspect the garrison, and, if they saw cause, to secure the governor: fifteen barrels of gunpowder, going that way, were stopped. Orders given that the forces in Wiltshire and Hampshire be drawn towards Portsmouth, and the forces in Kent and Sussex towards Dover. All the sea-ports were shut up, and Strafford made close prisoner. The commons declared, that whosoever should give counsel or assistance to bring any foreign force into the kingdom, unless by command of his majesty, with consent of both houses of parliament, should be adjudged as public enemies to the king and kingdom. The queen having declared her intentions to go to Portsmouth, was addressed by both houses to lay aside her journey.

On the first intimation of a discovery, Piercy concealed himself, and Jermyn fled the kingdom. Proclamations were issued for apprehending the conspirators. Goring delivered his evidence before the house; and Piercy wrote

(i) Strafford either being sensible of the bad effects which the king's interfering might have on his fate, or disgusted with the expressions he threw out concerning his conduct, was so much hurt with this step, that he wrote a letter to the king, signifying his wishes that he had left him to the justice of the lords.

(k) Clarendon pretends to give the true petition which was presented to the king; but Rapin has shewed, that this petition inserted in the History of the Civil Wars could not be the real one, because it mentions facts which happened after the time the plot was discovered. Rapin, vol. xi. p. 134.

(l) The preamble to the protestation relates, that the members of the commons' house finding the church in danger from the late bold practices of the adherents to the see of Rome, and that there had been and were endeavours, even during the sitting of parliament, to subvert the fundamental laws of England and Ireland, and to introduce an arbitrary government; that through the unhappy breach of parliaments the subjects had been vexed with divers oppressions, superstition brought into the church, multitudes driven out of his majesty's dominions, a popish army levied in Ireland, and two armies maintained in the bowels of the kingdom, to the consumption of the treasure of the realm; and finding that endeavours have been used to incline the English army to support by force wicked counsels, have, &c. Rushworth, vol. iv. p. 241.

a letter to the earl of Northumberland, confessing all the particulars (m): they both agreed in their testimonies with regard to the oath of secrecy, which circumstance was denied by Pollard, Ashburnham, and Wilmot. One captain Billingsley being examined upon oath, confessed that sir John Suckling had offered him promotion; that having notice to attend at the privy lodgings at Whitehall, he there received orders to get an hundred men to serve in the Tower under him, being threatened withal, that if he failed he should answer it with his life. Sir William Balfour, lieutenant of the Tower, deposed, that he had orders to receive captain Billingsley with an hundred men, into the Tower: that at the same time the earl of Strafford informed him of his intended escape; told him, that without his concurrence it could not be done; that if he would consent he would make him present payment of twenty-two thousand pounds, besides a good marriage for his son (n): that he, the lieutenant, replied, he was so far from concurring therein, that he was not to be farther moved in such a thing.

An address was presented from the parliament for disarming Papists (o), and removing them from court (p), and for disbanding the Irish army. Charles answered, that he would take care that there should be no just cause of scandal as to Papists; but he met with difficulties in disbanding the Irish army; that it would become the parliament to begin with disbanding the two armies in England. This answer, as might naturally be expected, exasperated both houses. Tumults daily increased. The frightened citizens were every day alarmed with the account of fresh conspiracies. In Lancashire great multitudes of Papists were gathered together: they held secret meetings, and appointed fasts for the success of some great event; and the priests had the imprudence to declare, that the parliament would soon be dissolved, for the English army was to march up to the assistance of the king, and that they would be joined by French forces. Intelligence was given of provision of arms making beyond sea. Sir Philip Cartwright, governor of Guernsey, wrote word, that he heard the French had a design on that island, or on some part of England. From letters that were stopped going to and coming from France, it appeared, that the earl of Strafford was expected there, and that the cardinal had been solicited to interrupt the proceedings of the parliament (q).

Twenty thousand inhabitants of London, of good rank and quality, presented a petition to both houses, that they would determine the fate of Strafford; it complained of grievances unredressed; and that the incendiaries of the kingdom, and other notorious offenders, were left unpunished. The names of the fifty-nine commoners who voted against the bill of attainder, were pasted up under the title of Straffordians, and betrayers of their country. The Spanish ambassador, whose house was a notorious receptacle of Papists, was insulted by the mob. The queen-mother, who remained still in England, was so terrified with the curses and imprecations of the people, that she desired to have a guard: no soldiers could be found who would undertake the employment. This being represented to the house, they agreed, that her person should be protected by a guard, but at the same time desired she might be moved to leave the kingdom, for the quieting of people's jealousies, occasioned by ill instruments about her person, and the flocking of priests and Papists to her house (r). The bill of attainder not having yet passed the lords, the people vociferously cried for justice, crouded round that house, and when any one of that body, who were thought not to favour the bill, appeared, they were surrounded by the populace, who professed that they would be governed and disposed by the honourable house of commons, and defend their privileges according to their late protestation. At length, when the dependants on the crown were frightened from their attendance by the rage of the people, the bill of attainder passed, with nineteen dissenting votes, on the 7th of May, the house being composed of forty-five members.

The passing this bill was not the only advantage the popular party gained by the terror and resentment of the public on the discovery of the late plot. All the money for the payment of the armies, and the gratifying the Scots, had been raised in the city of London; some part of it on the credit of particular persons who were members of the lower house. These creditors began now to consider on the desperateness of their situation, if the parliament should be suddenly dissolved before an act passed for their indemnification. The commissaries of the money negociation said, there was no hope of borrowing more money on the slender security of parliament, since it had been found out, by the late discovery of a plot, that there was no good meaning towards that assembly. To obviate these difficulties it was agreed, that a bill should be prepared, that this parliament should not be adjourned, prorogued, or dissolved, but by act of parliament. It was urged, that this expedient was the only way to calm the fears of the people, and satisfy them that the king's intentions were gracious; that for this reason he could never deny his assent. The motion was received with universal approbation: a short bill was prepared, and passed the house with little opposition; the lords proposed an alteration, that the time should be limited, and not be left indefinite; but the commons remaining firm to their own bill, the lords gave up the point, and passed it without any alteration.

While these affairs were carrying on, the king's situation was truly pitiable: the imprudence into which he had been betrayed had raised a ferment through the kingdom, which threatened a dangerous commotion; nor could he, in the present exigencies, find any resource, or security for his personal safety, than that of submitting to the will of the people. The judges, on being consulted, declared the bill was legal, and that the earl was guilty of treason. The privy-council, without one of the body venturing to interpose a contrary opinion, told him, that there was no other way to preserve himself and posterity than by passing the bill of attainder against Strafford: the queen became an importunate solicitor for his death. She was driven to this by her fears, and the artful insinuations of some of her confidants, particularly the earl of Holland, who flattered her with hopes that on the death of Strafford, and Laud, her authority over the king would be yet more absolute, and she might, by interposing her influence towards the obtaining what was so ardently desired by the public, gain some interest with the popular party. The king, in his anxiety of mind, put the case of conscience to several bishops; they applied themselves to remove his scruples: amongst these was Williams, who, notwithstanding his former discouragements and ill usage, cringed

(m) The king called God to witness, that he never knew of any design to bring the army up to London. This circumstance carries a strong mark of Charles's character. It appears by this deposition, says Rapin, that such a design was proposed in the assembly of officers, but not approved; so the king could affirm he knew of no such resolution, because, in effect, it was never resolved, though he was not ignorant of its having been proposed.

(n) He was offered a daughter of Strafford's for a match with his son. The lord Cottington, constable of the Tower, had mounted artillery on its walls; but on a representation of the commons, the artillery was dismounted, Cottington's command cancelled, and the care of the Tower wholly consigned to Balfour.

(o) In the English army there was a troop called Reformadoes. This troop, we apprehend, consisted of men who had renounced popery. The house of commons, however, were jealous of them, and ordered the lord general to disband them. By the same authority, all the officers and common soldiers who were Papists were turned out of the army.

(p) The parliament complained, that the proclamation which had issued out on a former petition against Papists was very fallacious and unsatisfactory; that they still obtained letters of grace to protect them; and that a complaint had been made before the judges in the King's-Bench; that there were above six thousand Recusants in one parish. In the heighth of that popular odium which the party of Recusants had incurred, one James, a Papist, assaulted and stabbed with a knife Heywood, a justice of peace, for having prepared a list of Recusants to be presented to the house of commons. This act of violence helped to inflame and alarm the nation to that degree, that Clarendon looks upon it as one of the incidents that hurried on the fate of Strafford.

(q) The following are passages of a curious letter written from Father Philips, the queen's confessor, to Wat Mountague, a Papist in France. "The good king and queen are left very naked: the Puritans, if they durst, would pull the good queen in pieces. Can the good king of France suffer a daughter of France, his sister, and her children, to be thus affronted? Can the wise cardinal suffer England and Scotland to unite, and not be able to discern that in the end it is like they will join together, and turn heads against France. A stirring, active ambassador might do good here. I have sent you a copy of the king's speech on Saturday last, at which time he discharged his conscience concerning the earl of Strafford, and was advised to make that speech by the earl of Bristol and lord Saville." Rushworth, vol. iv. p. 257.

Father Philips proceeds to give an account of tumults which happened at this time: "The king is much dejected, adds he, the lords much affrighted, which made the citizens and the house of commons shew their heads. Some have braved little less than to dethrone his majesty, who, if he had but an ordinary spirit, might easily suppress and quash these people." Rushworth, vol. viii. p. 751.

Clarendon accuses the lord Say of having, with a treacherous design, advised the king to make a speech in favour of Strafford. Father Philips is at this time a better authority for what related to the secrets of the court.

(r) Sir John Holland, in a speech he made concerning grievances, complained, that foreigners and strangers were entertained at the excessive charge of the crown. Parl. Hist. vol. ix. p. 75.

and fawned to Charles (s) and his party, and on these merits was promoted to the archbishopric of York. Williams stated the case to him in the following manner: "Whether, as his majesty refers his own judgement to his judges, in whose person they act in the courts of law, and it lies on them if an innocent man suffer, his majesty may not satisfy his conscience in the present matter; that since competent judges in law have awarded, that they find guilt of treason in the earl, that he may suffer that judgement to stand, though in his private mind he is not satisfied that the lord Strafford is criminous." Charles's scruples, however, were invincible; and he was at length brought to pass the act, though he thought in doing it he committed an unpardonable crime.

It is said, that what led to the determination of the king, was a letter which he received from Strafford, in which he intreated him to put an end to his unfortunate, however innocent, life; and quiet the tumultuous people by granting them that request for which they were so importunate. "My consent, said the writer, will more acquit you to God than all the world can do; beside, to a willing man, there is no injury (t). And as, by God's grace, I forgive all the world with a calmness and meekness of infinite contentment to my dislodging soul, so, Sir, to you I can resign the life of this world with all imaginable chearfulness." It is said that this letter was the dictates of despair, and that Strafford had certain intelligence that he should be deprived of his life in the Tower, if the king refused to pass the bill. It is probable, that he wrote the letter with an intention to excite the king to make an effort to save him. It is certain, he shewed signs of disappointment and surprize when he was informed by secretary Carleton, that the king had granted a commission to four lords to pass the bill of attainder. It was with some difficulty that he could believe the fatal tidings; but on being assured of its certainty, he rose up from his chair with marks of astonishment and horror, lifted up his eyes to Heaven, laid his hand on his breast, and exclaimed, "Put not your trust in princes, nor in the sons of men, for in them there is no salvation."

The commissioners appointed to pass the bill of attainder were at the same time empowered to give the royal assent to the bill for the continuance of the parliament. Charles, tortured with the pangs of shame and remorse for the yielding to Strafford's doom, passed this bill without attending to its importance. One fruitless effort was made by the king to save his unfortunate minister: he sent a letter to the lords, desiring that he might fulfil the natural course of his life in a close and perpetual imprisonment, but concludes, "if no less than his life can satisfy my people, I must say fiat justicia;" that is, "let justice be done." To this was added a postscript: "If he must die, it were charity to reprieve him till Saturday (u)." This letter of intercession, though delivered by the prince of Wales, did not alter the present determination of the lords: they deputed twelve of their house to satisfy the king, that even a delay of Strafford's execution would endanger his own and family's safety. Charles yielded to the necessity of the juncture, and told the lords, that he did not mean to save Strafford to his people's discontent. The 12th of May was appointed for the execution, and Strafford, being sensible that all endeavours to postpone it would be ineffectual, presented a petition to the peers, praying for their intercession with the king in behalf of his children, and prepared himself for death.

In these moments of terror, he wanted that consolation which supports innocence when oppressed by the stroke of power; he wanted that foretaste of glory, which accompanies great characters, when suffering in the cause of virtue; he wanted the compassion of mankind, which commonly attends the distressed. Deprived of these succours, he found in superstition, that cordial to the weak and wicked, ample resources on this tremendous occasion. Strafford, in the course of his administration, had been a great promoter of what was called the cause of God; viz. the interest of the church: many of his oppressions in his Irish government were committed with a view to enrich churchmen, and exalt the power of the hierarchy. This was regarded by Laud as the most orthodox of Christian virtues. Although Strafford had directed his conduct in this point to the sole view of promoting his interest with this prelate, yet he flattered himself he had attained great merit in having been a promoter of the glory of the church; and, as his oppressions on this head were part of his accusation, he esteemed himself a kind of martyr to the cause of God. The day before his execution he had earnestly sollicited an interview with Laud; on being denied, he sent him a message, that he desired his prayers that night, and his blessing on the morning.

In passing from his apartment to Tower Hill, he stopped under Laud's windows, and entreated the assistance of his prayers in those aweful moments which were approaching. A very tender scene passed between these fellow-sufferers, who had been associates in power: the aged prelate, dissolved in tears, pronounced, with a broken voice, a blessing on his departing friend and convert; then, over-pressed with the tide of sorrow, sunk down in the arms of his attendants. Strafford, with a determined countenance, marched on to meet his fate: archbishop Usher, primate of Ireland, attended him on the scaffold. On seeing his brother sir George Wentworth weeping, he told him not to lament, but rejoice in his innocence and approaching happiness; that no thoughts of envy, no dreams of treason, jealousies, or cares for the king or state, or for himself, would interrupt that easy sleep. He then kneeled down, and, in a solemn manner, made a protestation, that as far as he could understand he was not guilty of the crime laid to his charge, nor ever had intention to prejudice the king, the state, the laws, or the religion of the kingdom. He desired leave to make a speech to the people: in this speech he asserted, that he was very far from being against parliaments, and did always think parliaments to be the happy constitution of the king and kingdom, and the best means under God to make the king and his people happy. He professed, that he was an obedient son of the church of England, and wished prosperity and happiness might ever attend her. He sent a charge to his son to prove a faithful subject to the king, and to beware of meddling with church-livings, for that would prove a canker to him in his estate; and advised him to be a servant to his country, as a justice of peace in his own country, not aiming at higher preferments. Having bid a last adieu to his brother, and the friends who attended him, and sent a blessing to his absent relations, he added, "I have now nigh done; one stroke will make my wife a widow, my dear children fatherless, deprive my poor servants of their indulgent master, and separate me from my affectionate brother and all my friends: but let God be to you and them all in all." On preparing himself for the block, he said, "I thank God I am no way afraid of death, nor am daunted with any terrors, but do as chearfully lay down my head at this time, as ever I did when going to repose." The executioner performed his fatal office with one blow (v).

Thus, by the stroke of justice and the voice of his country, in the forty-ninth year of his age, died Thomas viscount Wentworth, earl of Strafford. This nobleman was one of the heroes of the monarchical party, and most historians agree that he was a great man; but none of them have taken pains to delineate his character, or tell us what were the eminent qualities of his head or heart, which constitute that greatness. It has been alledged, that Strafford was a great statesman, a character of the highest estimation in its just sense: but in that exalted appella-

(s) Besides the prosecutions already mentioned, Laud had entered another against this prelate, in order to degrade him. Williams appealed to a parliament; but the difficulties of the ministry increasing, the affair was dropped. Williams had lain above three years and a half in the Tower when this parliament met: he in vain petitioned the king for his liberty, and his writ as a peer to sit in parliament. The house of lords, sixteen days after their meeting, sent an order to the lieutenant of the Tower to deliver him, and he was conducted by their usher to the house. Williams had drawn up a history of his sufferings, with an intention to present it to the parliament; but he no sooner was in a capacity to perform servile offices for the crown, than he opposed all the popular motions in a manner which at length drew some civilities from the king, who sent to confer with him concerning his affairs, directed all orders filed against him to be erased, and promoted him to the see of York. Hacket's Life of Williams, fol. & oct. ed.

(t) The king had sent a letter to Strafford during his confinement, in which he assured him, upon the word of a king, that he should not suffer in life, honour, or fortune. Strafford's Letter, vol. ii. p. 416.

(u) Burnet says, that he was told by Hollis himself, whose sister Strafford had married, that he drew up a petition for Strafford, and a speech for the king to make to both houses in his favour; that the queen not only prevented the king going to the parliament, and changed the speech into a message, but prevailed with him to add the postscript, "If he must die, it were charity to reprieve him till Saturday." Burnet's History of His Own Times, vol. i. p. 82.

(v) A few weeks after the earl of Strafford's execution, the parliament remitted to his children the more severe consequences of his sentence: and the first parliament after the restoration of Charles the Second, reversed the bill of attainder.

tion, nothing more is meant by the vulgar, than being a proficient in the narrow circle of ministerial artifice, the abilities of a Scapin to cheat the credulous and unwary! A knowledge in the extensive science of politics, the different constitutions of different societies, the just interests of nations, and the operative effect which political institutions have on the public weal, when united to a head and a heart capable of employing it to the real service of mankind, constitute the character of a great statesman. In the latter sense Strafford will be found extremely deficient; in the other he must be allowed to excel. His talents were of that inferior kind, which are always found united to a base mind: the badness of his judgement had so corrupted his heart, that at the time when he was engaged in the defence of the liberty of his country, he does not seem to have been actuated by any just, honest, or liberal principle. He was too ignorant of the nature of the constitution, and the laws of England, to form a right judgement of the state of the question between the king and his people; and entered into the quarrel with a factious view to oppose particular persons to whom he had an inveterate enmity, and to make himself of consequence enough to be noticed by the ministry. His patriotism dissolved on the first beam of court favour; he was intoxicated on the first taste of power, and became a more bold and zealous instrument of tyranny than any minister this country ever produced. He was of a revengeful, insolent disposition; but his supreme vice was an insatiable ambition, directed to false and unlawful objects. Among his weaknesses we may reckon his vanity: this was the source from whence flowed his crimes, and this the prime cause of his misfortunes. No instance can give us a juster idea to what a height he possessed this folly, than his persecution of many people for not complying with those servile ceremonies which he imagined due to his authority. His revival of several foppish formalities of state, during his command in Ireland, is another example of the same kind. In all his letters to the king, and his patron Laud, he assumed to himself great merit and importance; whilst he degraded the services of every other man, excepting those of his own creatures. His behaviour was insolent to his fellow-subjects, and abject to his prince. He was continually stimulating him to acts of tyranny, by representing, in phrases bombast, the sublimity of his power, and that it was necessary to curb the insolent opposition of his subjects, by severe and vigorous measures. Laud he constantly courted, because he knew the absolute power this prelate had obtained over the king. Such was the man whom the world has loaded with applause. His talents as an orator have been much admired: the conclusion of his defence is infinitely preferable to any other of his productions of this kind. In his general style of writing and speaking there is an insolence, a petulance, a quaintness, which mark the genius and disposition of the man, and which ran through the whole tenor of his conduct. The criminality and arrogance of his behaviour rendered him so dangerous and noxious, that no less than three kingdoms engaged with warmth in his prosecution; and the sentence of death passed upon him appeared to give general satisfaction.

Charles now expected, as a return for this instance of compliance with the will of the parliament, that they would show him some indulgence, and fall into that unanimity, to which, at the expence of his own power, and of his friend's life, he so earnestly courted them: but in this he was disappointed; for the attempt to engage the army against them served with many as a confirmation of their idea that he wanted cordiality. It was natural for the king to seek some resource, while all the world seemed to desert him, or combine against him; and this probably was the utmost of that embryo-scheme which was formed with regard to the army. But the popular leaders still insisted, that a desperate plot was laid to bring up the forces immediately, and offer violence to the parliament. By means, however, of these suspicions, was the same implacable spirit still kept alive; and the commons proceeded to carry their inroads with great vigour into the king's now defenceless prerogative (w).

The two ruling passions of this parliament were, zeal for liberty, and an aversion to the church; and to both of these nothing could appear more exceptionable than the court of high commission, whose institution rendered it entirely arbitrary, and assigned to it the defence of the ecclesiastical establishment. The star-chamber also was a court which exerted high discretionary powers; and had no precise rule or limit, either with regard to the causes which came under its jurisdiction, or the decisions which it formed. A bill unanimously passed the houses to abolish these two courts; and in them, to annihilate the principal and most dangerous articles of the king's prerogative. By the same bill, the jurisdiction of the council was regulated, and its authority abridged (x). Charles hesitated before he gave his assent. But finding that he had gone too far to retreat, and that he possessed no resource in case of a rupture, he at last affixed the royal sanction to this excellent bill. But to show the parliament that he was sufficiently apprized of the importance of his grant, he observed to them, that this statute altered in a great measure the fundamental laws, ecclesiastical and civil, which many of his predecessors had established (y).

By removing the star-chamber, the king's power of binding the people by his proclamations was indirectly abolished; and that important branch of prerogative, the strong symbol of arbitrary power, and unintelligible in a limited constitution, being at last removed, left the system of government more consistent and uniform. The star-chamber alone was accustomed to punish infractions of the king's edicts: but as no courts of judicature now remained, except those in Westminster Hall, which take cognizance only of common and statute law, the king may thenceforth issue proclamations, but no man is bound to obey them. It must, however, be confessed, that the experiment here made by the parliament, was not a little rash and adventurous. No government at that time appeared in the world, nor is perhaps to be found in the records of any history, which subsisted without the mixture of some arbitrary authority, committed to some magistrate; and it might reasonably, before-hand, appear doubtful, whether human society could ever reach that state of perfection, as to support itself with no other control than the general and rigid maxims of law and equity. But the parliament justly thought, that the king was too eminent a magistrate to be trusted with discretionary power, which he might so easily turn to the destruction of liberty. And in the event it has hitherto been found, that, though some sensible inconveniences arise from the maxim of adhering strictly to law, yet the advantages overbalance them, and should render the English grateful to the memory of their ancestors, who, after repeated contests, at last established that noble though dangerous principle. At the request of the parliament, Charles, instead of the patents during pleasure, gave all the judges patents during their good behaviour: a circumstance of the greatest moment towards securing their independency, and barring the entrance of arbitrary power into the ordinary courts of judicature.

The marshal's court, which took cognizance of offensive words, and was not thought sufficiently limited by law, was also, for that reason, abolished. The stannary courts, which exercised jurisdiction over the miners, being liable to a like objection, underwent a similar fate. The abolition of the council of the north and the council of Wales followed from the same principles. The authority of the clerk of the market, who had a general inspection over the weights and measures throughout the kingdom, was transferred to the mayors, sheriffs, and ordinary magistrates.

In short, if we take a survey of the transactions of this memorable parliament, during the first period of its operations, we shall find that, excepting Strafford's attainder, which many consider as a complication of justice and iniquity, their merits in other respects so much outweigh their mistakes, so as to entitle them to praise from all lovers of liberty. Not only were former abuses remedied, and grievances redressed: great provision, for the future, was made by law against the return of like complaints. And if the means, by which they obtained such advantages, savour often of artifice, sometimes of violence; it is to be considered, that revolutions of government cannot be effected by mere force of argument and reasoning; and that factions being once excited, men can neither so firmly regulate the tempers of others, nor their own, as to ensure themselves against all exorbitances.

The parliament now came to a pause. The king had promised his Scottish subjects, that he would this summer pay them a visit, in order to settle their government; and though the English parliament was extremely importunate with him, that he should lay aside that journey; they could not prevail with him so much as to delay it. The king therefore set out on the 8th of August on his journey to Scotland. As he must necessarily in his passage have gone through the troops of both nations, the commons seem to have entertained great jealousy on that account, and to have now hurried on, as much as they formerly delayed, the disbanding of the armies. The arrears therefore of the Scots were fully paid them; and those of the English in part. The Scots returned home, and the English were separated into their several counties, and dismissed.

The parliament then, on the 9th of September, adjourned to the 20th of October; and a committee of both houses, a thing unprecedented, was appointed to sit during the recess, with very ample powers. Pym was elected chairman of the committee of the lower house. Farther attempts were made by the parliament, while it sat, and even by the commons alone, for assuming sovereign executive powers, and publishing their ordinances instead of laws. The committee too, on their part, was ready to imitate the example.

A small committee of both houses was appointed to attend the king into Scotland, that they might have an opportunity, as was pretended, of seeing that the articles of pacification were executed; but the fact seems to be that they were intended as spies upon him, and with a view to extend still farther the ideas of parliamentary authority, as well as to eclipse the majesty of the king (z).

Endeavours were used, before Charles's departure, to have a protector of the kingdom appointed, with a power to pass laws without having recourse to the king. So little regard did the parliament now pay to royal authority, or to the established constitution of the kingdom.

The Scots, who began these fatal commotions, thought that they had finished a very perilous undertaking, much to their profit and reputation. Besides the large pay voted them for lying in good quarters during a twelvemonth, the English parliament had conferred on them a present of three hundred thousand pounds for their brotherly assistance. In the articles of pacification, they were declared to have ever been good subjects; and their military expeditions were approved of, as enterprizes calculated and intended for his majesty's honour and advantage. To carry farther the triumph over their sovereign, these terms, so ignominious to him, were ordered, by a vote of parliament, to be read in all churches, upon a day of thanksgiving, appointed for the national pacification: all their claims for the restriction of prerogative were agreed to be ratified: and what they more valued than all these advantages; they had a near prospect of spreading the presbyterian discipline in England and Ireland. Never did refined Athens so exult in diffusing the sciences and liberal arts over a savage world; never did generous Rome so please herself in the view of law and order established by her victorious arms; as the Scots now rejoiced, in communicating zeal and theological fervour to the neighbouring nations.

Charles, despoiled in England of a considerable part of his authority, and dreading still farther encroachments upon him, arrived in Scotland, on the 14th of August, with an intention, says Hume, of abdicating almost entirely the small share of power which there remained to him, and of giving full satisfaction, if possible, to his restless subjects in that kingdom.

The lords of articles were an ancient institution in the Scottish parliament. They were constituted after this manner. The temporal lords chose eight bishops: the bishops elected eight temporal lords: these sixteen named eight commissioners of counties, and eight burgesses: and without the previous consent of the thirty-two, who were denominated lords of articles, no motion could be made in parliament. As the bishops were entirely devoted to the court, it is evident that all the lords of articles, by necessary consequence, depended on the king's nomination; and the prince, besides one negative after the bills had passed through parliament, possessed indirectly another before their introduction; a prerogative of much greater consequence than the former. The bench of bishops being now abolished, the parliament laid hold of the opportunity, and totally set aside the lords of articles: and till this important point was obtained, the nation, properly speaking, could not be said to enjoy any regular freedom.

Notwithstanding this institution, the royal authority was always deemed much lower in Scotland than in England. Bacon represents it as one advantage to be expected from the union, that the too extensive prerogative of England would be abridged by the example of Scotland, and the too narrow prerogative of Scotland be enlarged from the imitation of England. The English were, at that time, a civilized people, and obedient to the laws: but among the Scots, it was of little consequence how the laws were framed, or by whom voted, while the aristocracy had it so much in their power to prevent their regular execution.

The peers and commons formed only one house in the Scottish parliament: and as it had been the practice of James, continued by Charles, to grace English gentlemen with Scottish titles, all the determinations of parliament, it was to be feared, would in time depend upon the prince, by means of these votes of foreigners, who had no interest or property in the nation. It was therefore a law deserving approbation, that no man should be created a Scotch peer, who possessed not ten thousand marks (above six hundred pounds) of annual rent in the kingdom.

A law for triennial parliaments was likewise passed; and it was ordained, that the last act of every parliament should be to appoint the time and place for holding the parliament next ensuing. The king was deprived of that power, formerly exercised, of issuing proclamations, which enjoined obedience, under the penalty of treason: a prerogative which invested him with the whole legislative authority, even in matters of the highest importance.

But the most fatal blow given to royal authority, and what in a manner dethroned the prince, was the article, that no member of the privy council, in whose hands, during the king's absence, the whole administration lay, no officer of state, none of the judges, should be appointed but by advice and approbation of parliament. Charles even agreed to deprive of their seats, four judges who had adhered to his interests; and their place was supplied by others more agreeable to the ruling party. Several of the covenanters were also sworn of the privy council. And all the ministers of state, counsellors, and judges, were, by law, to hold their places during life or good behaviour.

The king, while in Scotland, conformed himself entirely to the established church; and assisted with great appearing gravity, at the long prayers and longer sermons which the presbyterians were accustomed to use. He bestowed pensions and preferments on Henderson, Gillespy, and other popular preachers; and practised every seeming art to soften, if not to gain, his greatest enemies. The earl of Argyle was created a marquis, lord Loudon an earl, Lesley was dignified with the title of earl of Leven. His friends, he was obliged, for the present, to neglect and overlook: some of them were disgusted; and his enemies were not reconciled; but ascribed all his caresses and favours to artifice and necessity; in which, perhaps, they were not far from the truth.

Argyle, Lanert, and Hamilton, being seized with an apprehension that the earl of Crawfurd and others meant to assassinate them, left the parliament suddenly, and retired into the country. They had very good reasons for their apprehensions; for Montrose had the villainy to suggest to the king, that it would be for his interest to procure the murder of Argyle and the two brothers; and even offered himself to undertake the execution of the scheme. But upon invitation and assurances, returned in a few days. This event was commonly denominated the incident. But though the incident had no effect in Scotland, it was attended with serious consequences in England. The English parliament, which assembled on the 20th of October, being willing to awaken the people's tenderness by exciting their fears, immediately took the alarm; as if the malignants, (for by that appellation they called the king's party,) had laid a plot at once to murder them and all the godly in both kingdoms. They applied, therefore, to Essex, whom the king had left general in the south of England; and he ordered a guard to attend them.

But while the king was employed in pacifying the commotions in Scotland, and was preparing to return to England, in order, as he pretended, to apply himself to the same salutary work in that kingdom; he received intelligence of a dangerous rebellion broken out in Ireland, with circumstances of the utmost horror, bloodshed, and devastation. On every side this unfortunate prince was pursued with murmurs, discontent, faction, and civil wars; and the fire from all quarters, even by the most independent accidents, at once blazed up about him.

To secure the dominion of Ireland to the British crown, those lands which had been forfeited by rebellion, and others fraudulently and forcibly obtained from the inhabitants, were conferred on British planters, who, allured by gain, had gone over in large colonies to settle in that country. The old Irish held their property by a whimsical tenure, called Tanistry. Individuals had no hereditary right: a whole sept, or clan, had a title to a whole territory; these used to chuse the chieftain (a), who took upon him the title of king, or lord: he, thus elected, had the seignory of all the lands within his territory, with a power to make an arbitrary distribution to his vassals (b), who were all tenants in villanage, and were neither qualified to be sworn on juries, or to perform any public service. The chieftain himself held the seignory but for life (c), and each new lord had the power to make a new distribution according to his pleasure. Thus, neither the descendants of the chieftains or vassals had a right to particular lands; but, as the lord was always chosen out of the principal branches of the sept, the immediate descendants of the old chieftains fancied they had a right to these seignories, and fondly imagined, if they could throw off their dependance on the state of England, matters would be adjusted to their satisfaction. As, from the uncertainty of the estates of the old Irish, they neglected to build, or improve their lands, and were in a manner disunited from the government, by an immediate and absolute dependance on their chiefs, who governed them in an arbitrary manner, inflicting on them what punishments they pleased. In the reign of James and Charles it was the particular care of the lieutenants and governors of that country to obtain surrenders, and re-grant them on English tenures (d). Sir Arthur Chichester, lieutenant of Ireland in king James's time, coming into his government with the advantage of a subdued rebellion, went great lengths towards the entire destruction of the Irish lordships. The customs of Tanistry and the Brehon law (e) were in all their branches abolished; he offered the protection of the English laws to all the natives; sent judges into every county of Ireland; appointed sheriffs; prohibited the chieftains from tyrannizing over their tenants; and directed these, if they met with oppression, to complain to the ministers of justice. Steps were daily taken by the government to secure the property, as well as protect the persons, of these barbarians; yet such was their ignorance, that they disdained these offers, and envied the possessions of the British, whom they looked on as robbers and invaders; notwithstanding that the instructions they had received in tillage, buildings, manufactures, and other civilized arts, was a large return for their uncultivated lands. It was not only those who aspired to seignories that kept up a spirit of discontent among the wild Irish, but the priests, who, though, during the reigns of James and Charles, they had been indulged with a connivance amounting to a toleration (f), yet, as they were deprived of their ecclesiastical revenues, they took effectual means to communicate their displeasure, and prevent any cordial reconciliation between the old and new inhabitants. The successive administrations of Chichester, Grandison, and Falkland, though attended with some circumstances arbitrary and unjust, had been upon the whole very advantageous to the native Irish, and the favourable inclination of the Stuart family to the principles of the Roman Catholic faith had occasioned them uncommon indulgences in the article of religion; yet such was the power, and such the intriguing spirit of the priests, that in the short space between the years 1603 and 1615, three different conspiracies were raised against the English government (g).

When the earl of Strafford was entrusted with the administration of the affairs of Ireland, he, for the better accomplishment of his purpose to establish a tyranny, endeavoured to make a balance in parliament between the Protestants and Papists, that both parties, intent on thwarting each other, and thus diverted from the objects of their mutual interest, might become an easy prey. By his means the recusants were not only possessed of an equal share of the legislative power, but were treated with more mildness and distinction than the dissenters. Notwithstanding these advantages, so obvious grew his diabolical purpose, so tyrannical were the means he was necessitated to use, such was the provoking insolence of the man, that these very Papists on whom he seemed to have conferred obligations, these very Papists whom he judged the most proper to be trusted with arms to scourge the Scots for their endeavours to maintain their liberty, these very Papists for whose ease and emolument he had so heavily taxed the Protestants (h), joined in the prosecution against him, and became the chief instruments of his being brought to the block. The difficulties with which the king, by his ill conduct, was entangled, proved as advantageous to Irish as to British liberty. The English house of commons, by the good correspondence they maintained with the Irish committee, who were all of them papists, shewed, that they looked on that privilege to be the common right of men of all persuasions, and that they took a brotherly concern in the interest of that conquered country. By means of this encouragement and protection, the Irish obtained advantages beyond their most sanguine hopes: the list of grievances their committee had brought over were considered by the king and his privy-council, now composed of those popular noblemen, Manchester, Essex, Warwick, Say, and other members of respectable characters: by their influence, the Irish obtained a favourable answer to almost all their demands (i). These were but the first-fruits of what might be expected from (a) These elections were generally obtained by force and violence.

(b) He might make new distributions as often as he pleased; nor were these tenants in villanage more secure in the possession of their goods and chattels, or even of their wives, than of their lands; these being all liable to be taken away at the pleasure of the lord. Carte's Life of Ormond, vol. i. p. 13.

(c) The estates that were held by the chieftains were annexed to the seignory, and did not descend by inheritance. Carte's Life of Ormond, vol. i. p. 13.

(d) The civilizing or governing of Ireland was so little attended to by the predecessors of the Stuart family, that all intercourse between the natives and the English was by law forbidden, lest the English should degenerate into Irish manners. On subdued rebellions the Irish were re-granted their lands on their own barbarous tenures; and that country having been chiefly conquered by private adventurers of the English nation, these were permitted to establish separate jurisdictions and principalities.

(e) By the Brehon law, no crime, however enormous, was punished by death. Murder itself was atoned for by a pecuniary mulct, and each man, according to his rank, had a different rate affixed to him. Hume's Hist. of James I.

(f) Papists were not only in a manner tolerated, but many of them were admitted to lucrative employments in the state and army, were indulged with the more substantial advantages of purchasing and inheriting lands, of sitting as jurors on the determination of life and property, of voting for representatives in parliament, and even having seats in both houses themselves. They practised at the bar, they were promoted in the law, they obtained peerages, and almost every indulgence in common with the Protestant subject. Clarendon gives the following testimony of the indulgence with which they were treated. "It cannot be denied, that the whole nation enjoyed an undisturbed exercise of their religion. Even in Dublin, where the seat of the king's chief governor was, they went as publicly and uninterruptedly to their devotions as he went to his. The bishops, priests, and all degrees and orders of secular and regular clergy, were known to exercise their functions among them; and though there were some laws against them still in force, yet they were so rebated by the clemency of the king, that no man could say he had suffered prejudice or disturbance in or for his religion." To such a degree did royal indulgence extend to the Irish Papists, that the fifth of November was forbidden to be celebrated in that country, lest it should give them offence. Borlace's Hist. of the Irish Insurrection, p. 17. Temple's Hist. of the Irish Rebellion, p. 24. Fiction Unmasked, a tract published in 1752, p. 45. Clarendon's Vindication of the Duke of Ormond, 8vo. ed. 1756, p. 8. & seq.

(g) In the year 1626, on the accession of Charles to the throne, pope Urban VIII. sent a bull directed to the catholic subjects of Great Britain, exhorting them rather to lose their lives than to take that noxious and unlawful oath of allegiance, by which the sacred sceptre of the universal church might be plucked out of the hands of the vicars of God. Fiction Unmasked, p. 46.

(h) A round tax used to be gathered from the Papists, as a penalty for their not attending the public service of the established church. This Strafford more than made up to the king, by screwing up the subsidies to an exorbitant sum.

(i) Subsidies were to be assessed with moderation and equality; a free regress out of Ireland was granted; the rates of customs on goods were to be settled at five per cent.; the duty on French wines to be referred to the parliament; the extra-judicial proceedings of the council-board and castle-chamber were to be prohibited for the present, and a future regulation made, according to what was done in England; all monopolies were to be cancelled; the high-commission court suspended; gunpowder was to be sold by the subject in Ireland, at the same rate it was sold in England; the restraint on hawking and hunting was to be forborne; the votes of the privy-counsellors to be free; the regulation of fees in the civil and ecclesiastical courts, and those of the custom house officers, were to be determined by parliament: wool was to be transported into England without licence; wearing apparel and horses, for the use of private persons, were to be brought in and out custom-free; from the favourable disposition of public affairs, and the hearty concurrence of the English reformers in not only redressing all grievances, but in laying a firm establishment for an exalted system of liberty.

When the earl of Strafford was summoned to fight against the Scots, he left the government of Ireland, with the title of deputy, to his creature Wandesford, the master of the rolls. Wandesford, observing that the current ran strong against his patron, prorogued the parliament, and attempted to stop their committee from repairing to England; but, on the interposition of the English house of commons, was commanded to give way. On the prosecution of Strafford, Wandesford died of fear and vexation. Sir William Parsons, master of the wards, and sir John Borlasse, master of the ordnance, men at this time very agreeable to the Irish committee, were invested with the government (k), under the title of lords justices: they were united to the prevailing party in the English parliament, and strongly abetted the popular interest in Ireland. They admitted the abatement of the subsidy from forty thousand pounds to twelve thousand; prohibited the handling of civil causes at the council board; expedited the drawing of the bills obtained by the Irish committee; and gave every encouragement to the parliament in the work of legal reformation. The house of commons in Ireland seem to have imbibed from the English a spirit utterly unknown to their rude and servile ancestors: they put twenty-four queries to the judges concerning the state of law in Ireland; but the judges not caring to condemn themselves, and render their past conduct subject to impeachment, gave unsatisfactory answers: this produced twenty-one spirited declarations.

The university at Dublin did not escape these diligent inquisitions into grievances. Strafford, who had left the stain of imperious will in every department of government, innovated the settled regulations of the university of Dublin: Laud, for this purpose, was chosen chancellor: he drew up a body of statutes on the same arbitrary plan as he had done those of Oxford. The Irish house of commons appointed a select committee to examine the charters of the college, and statutes in force: they excepted against many of them, passed a vote in condemnation of the government of the university, authorised a committee to propose out of the old statutes a new draught, and forbid the provost and fellows to make any elections, or to grant any leases until they had authority from parliament.

Thus was the state of liberty in Ireland attended with those additional blessings, plenty, peace, and security. Trade and manufactures flourished; taxes and contributions were now in a manner unknown to the happy subjects. Nature, admitting the improvements of art, adorned the fertile soil with a new face of beauty; whilst the enjoyment of these benefits was heightened by the conscious pleasure that law had rendered them permanent.

the tenures of fairs and markets were to be determined upon a special verdict by the judges of the King's Bench; the assessing and billeting of soldiers to be restrained according to law; quo warranto's not to be sued but upon just causes, otherwise reparation to be made by the king's officers to the party aggrieved; the power of provosts marshal to be limited, and exercised only upon proclaimed rebels, or to bring in offenders to be answerable to the law; the proceedings of the court of Wards and Castle-chamber to be regulated according to the course of the Star-chamber and court of Wards in England. An act of parliament was to pass, to limit the title of the clergy to forty years; all parties, who had been constrained by Strafford to give up impropriated tythes and lands to the church, were to commence suits for the recovery of their rights, without any interposition of authority. By the advice of the privy council, all the graces, the establishment of which had been heretofore promised, but shamefully eluded by Strafford, were to be confirmed by parliament: in these were concluded the limiting the title of the crown to sixty years, and for securing the estates of the inhabitants of Connaught, and the counties of Clare, Limerick, and Tipperary; consequently the intended plantation was to be discharged, and by bill to be declared void. Votes of peers in parliament were restrained to those possessed of a certain portion of lands in Ireland; a baron two hundred a-year, a viscount four hundred, and an earl six hundred; this body of men were likewise to be indulged with an act, enforcing some trifling yet pleasing regulations for ranking in parliament. Carte's Life of Ormond, vol. i. p. 140, & seq.

(k) The king would have appointed Ormond, another creature of Strafford's, and especially recommended by him, to the office of deputy; but the Irish committee would not give way to it, nor to the appointment of lord Dillon, who had engrafted himself by marriage into the Wentworth family with the earl of Strafford's sister, and had been active in some of the late illegal proceedings. Carte's Life of Ormond, p. 116. Borlace, p. 6.

(l) Such was the advantage that the native Irish found from English commerce and cohabitation, that many of the Irish chieftains turned their Irish tenants out of their lands, and took in English; who not only improved their farms, but were able to give better rents; on the other hand, the English, because they could be served at a cheaper rate, employed the Irish. Temple's History of the Irish Rebellion, ed. 1746, p. 24, & seq.

The old and new inhabitants, Protestants and Papists, were equal partakers of these advantages (l), and linked together in the strong tie of interest. Nor was this the only balsam to heal ancient animosities; the yet more powerful influence of social converse, alliance, inter-marriage, and consanguinity, had operated for the course of many years. Such was the seeming harmony which reigned in this country between papist and protestant, that it gave no umbrage to the latter that the former now enjoyed the privilege of practising at the bar as lawyers, acting in the capacity of sheriffs, and other magistracies, without taking the oath of supremacy; and that priests were as open in the exercise of their religion as the Protestant clergy: nor did the English parliament shew at this juncture any distaste at these immunities.

This was but a short-lived calm, a fatal state of fond security, by which the working heads of ambitious priests were able to introduce more diabolical mischiefs than perverted religion, in the most depraved state of man, had ever yet effected. Roger More, a man of indigent fortune, yet swollen with fanciful ideas of greatness derived from family descent, and Owen O'Neal, a colonel in the Spanish service, were the men who first formed a project to expel the English, and assert the independence of Ireland (m). The plan was proposed to lord Macguire and sir Phelim O'Neale, two other dissolute adventurers, then to all the Irish chieftains, who readily embraced the proposal, on receiving intelligence, from Toole O'Connolly, a priest, that Owen O'Neal would be with them with his regiment of Irish Papists fifteen days after the rising. They were likewise assured by More, that the Irish of the pale (n), or the old English, being all of them Papists, would join their brethren; that the Irish officers in the Spanish service had promised assistance; the pope would supply money; cardinal Richelieu had given assurance of a powerful aid (o); and the Spanish ambassador had declared, that they should not fail of succours from Spain (p). It was resolved, that the castle of Dublin should be seized (q) by Macguire, Macmahon (r), More, Plunket, Paul O'Neal, an active priest, and others; whilst, on the same day, the rest of the adventurers undertook to seize the castles and forts of the several provinces. On the 22nd of October, the day preceding that assigned for the enterprize (s), the city of Dublin was full of conspirators. The lords justices had received some dark and general hints that schemes of importance were transacting among the Irish; but such was that apparent harmony and union of interest between the Protestants and Papists, that the intelligence was totally disregarded. One O'Conolly, an Irishman and a Protestant, was trusted with the secret: at almost the very period of its intended execution, he discovered it to the justices: the justices fled for safety to the castle, reinforced the guards, and gave the alarm to the town. Macguire and Macmahon were taken. The discovery of a general insurrection and massacre was extorted from these criminals,

(m) In the year 1639, Strafford had the intimation of a plot that was intended against the Protestants in Ireland; but not finding it ripe for execution, and not caring at that critical time to raise any apprehensions of a body of men he intended to arm, he gave the messenger who brought him the information a reward, and charged him to conceal the matter, and never again appear in that capacity. During the time that Strafford was in Ireland, his chief comrade was sir Toby Mathews, one of the most turbulent of the English Jesuits. The Plot or Progress of the Irish Rebellion, a pamphlet printed in 1644. Carte's Life of Ormond, p. 155.

(o) Cardinal Richelieu had formerly promised Tyrone to assist him in an enterprize on Ireland, as soon as the wars in Italy were over. Macguire's Evidence. Nalson, vol. i. p. 549.

(p) The Spanish ambassador told colonel Bourn, an Irishman, that if the Irish Papists would take advantage of the times, and rise, their messengers for supply would be received in Spain under canopies of gold. Macguire's Evidence. Nalson, vol. i. p. 548.

(q) The execution of such a design would have been easy: there were no fortifications about the city and suburbs; the lords justices, out of a due regard to the privileges of the inhabitants, had taken care not to quarter any soldiers in the town, though it contained fifteen Papists to one Protestant. Thus the guarding of the castle was consigned to the care of eight warders, old and weak men, and forty halberdiers. Carte's Life of Ormond, vol. i. p. 168, & seq.

minals (t), but too late to prevent the execution. Sir Phelim O'Neal, and the rest of the infernal gang, were barbarously punctual to the villainies they had promised to perform. The persons, houses, cattle, and goods of the English were seized; an universal massacre ensued (u); nor age, nor sex, nor infancy were spared; all conditions were involved in the general ruin. In vain did the unhappy victim appeal to the sacred ties of humanity, hospitality, family connection, and all the tender obligations of social commerce; companions, friends, relations, not only denied protection, but dealt with their own hands the fatal blow. In vain did the pious son plead for his devoted parent; himself was doomed to suffer a more premature mortality. In vain did the tender mother attempt to soften the obdurate heart of the assassin, in behalf of her helpless children; she was reserved to behold them cruelly butchered, and then to undergo a like fate. The weeping wife, lamenting over the mangled carcase of her husband, experienced a death no less horrid than that which she deplored. This scene of blood received yet a deeper stain from the wanton exercise of more execrable cruelty than had ever yet occurred to the warm and fertile imagination of Eastern barbarians. Women, whose feeble minds received a yet stronger impression of religious frenzy (v), were more ferocious than the men; and children, excited by the example and exhortation of their parents, stained their innocent age with the blackest deeds of human butchery (w). The persons of the English were not the only victims to the general rage: their commodious houses and magnificent buildings were either consumed with fire, or laid level with the ground. Their cattle, though now part of the possession of their murderers, because they had belonged to abhorred heretics, were either killed outright (x), or covered with wounds, turned loose into woods and desarts, there to abide a lingering painful end (y). This amazing unexpected scene of horror was yet heightened by the bitter revilings, imprecations, threats, and insults, which every where resounded in the ears of the astonished English. Their sighs, groans, shrieks, cries, and bitter lamentations, were answered with "Spare neither man, woman, nor child; the English are meat for dogs; there shall not be one drop of English blood left within the kingdom." Nor did there want the most barbarous insults and exultation, on beholding those expressions of agonizing pain which a variety of torments extorted. This was the scene which Ulster produced.

In the other provinces, where they professed humanity, they committed many acts of blood and cruelty, and not only expelled the English their houses, despoiled them of their goods, wasted their lands, but stripped them naked, and turned them out to the severities of a very sharp season. Among the multitudes that experienced this treatment, the greater number, through feebleness of age, or sex, or constitution, sunk under the rigour of cold and hunger; many of those who reached Dublin died of the diseases they had contracted, notwithstanding great care and application were used to recover them; others, of keen sensations, reflecting on the horror of their fate, from a state of plenty reduced to all the miseries of poverty, with the additional loss of parents, husbands, wives, and children, abandoning themselves to despair, refused all resource but death, the only relief that could be found for such multiplied calamities (z). Nor was the exercise of rapine and blood confined to the lower class of rebels; men of rank not only practised these enormities, but stimulated the brutal inclinations of their followers (a). The opportunity they

(t) Whilst Macmahon was examining, he drew on the walls those representations which presented themselves to his fancy concerning the tortures he supposed then inflicting on the Protestants. With the most hardened impudence, he told the justices, that all the Papists in the kingdom were engaged in the plot; that what was to be done in other parts of the kingdom was so far advanced, that it was impossible for the wit of man to prevent it: it was true they had him in their power, and might use him as they pleased, but he was sure he should be revenged. Borlace's Hist. of the Irish Insurrection, ed. 1680, p. 20, & seq.

(u) Carte says that the Irish were at first busy in plunder; that the massacre did not begin till the second week of the insurrection, when the rebels had secured to themselves the entire counties of Tyrone, Monaghan, Longford, Leytrim, Fermanagh, Cavan, Donnegal, and Derry. On their seizing the persons and goods of the English, they would tell them, "We only take your goods now, but worse will follow." Carte, vol. i. p. 175, & seq. Report of the Examinations taken before Commissioners appointed by the King's Authority.

(v) Slaughtering the English was represented by the priests as the most meritorious of religious acts: they exhorted the people, with tears in their eyes, to rid the world of these declared enemies to the Catholic faith and piety. The murdering of Protestants, they said, would be a good preservative against the pains of purgatory; nor would they administer the sacrament, but on condition that neither man, woman, nor child, should be spared. Many of the rebels would say, after bragging of the number of barbarous murders they had committed, that they knew if they should die, their souls would go immediately to Heaven. Nay, so much did they plume themselves on the merit of these exploits, that an abbot was heard to say, he would not appeal to the mercy, but to the justice of God, for good success to the undertakings of the papists in Ireland. The Siege of Drogheda in Ireland. Appendix to the Siege of Drogheda. Depositions in Temple's History of the Irish Rebellion.

(w) Though the faithful page of history must hand down to posterity, with a minute exactness, the villanies as well as the virtues of mankind, yet, as a particular detail of the sufferings inflicted on the poor defenceless, innocent Protestants, is a representation too shocking to be dwelt on by a delicate humane mind, I think it necessary to give the reader an item, that the following note will impress on his imagination images of the most horrid kind. Some thousands of English were burnt in their houses, others were stripped naked, and, in hundreds in a drove, pricked forwards with swords and spikes to river sides, and from thence pushed headlong into the stream; some were manacled and thrown into dungeons, and there left to perish at leisure; others were mangled, and left to languish in the highways; some were happy enough to suffer the milder death of hanging; other more unfortunate wretches were buried alive—this was the fate of a poor little infant, who, whilst he was putting in the grave, cried out to his dead parent, "Mammy, mammy, save me!" yet could not his innocent cry pierce the heart of the hardened wretch from whom he received his fate; some were mangled and hung upon tenter-hooks; some, with ropes round their necks, were dragged through woods, bogs, and ditches, till they died; some were hanged up by the arms, and then cut and slashed, to see how many wounds an Englishman could endure; some were ripped up, and their entrails left hanging about their heels. These kinds of cruelties were exercised on children of all ages, and many women with child suffered the same fate. Children were forced to carry their sick and aged parents to the place of slaughter; there were of these barbarians some so ingenious in their cruelty, as to tempt their prisoners, with the hopes of preserving their lives, to imbrue their hands in the blood of their relations. Children were, in this manner, impelled to be the executioners of their parents, wives of their husbands, mothers of their children; and then, when they were thus rendered accomplices in guilt, they were deprived of that life they endeavoured to purchase at so horrid a price. Children were boiled to death in cauldrons; some wretches were flayed alive; others were stoned to death; others had their eyes plucked out, their ears, nose, cheeks, and hands cut off, and thus rendered spectacles to satiate the malice of their enemies; some were buried up to the chin, and there left to perish by degrees. One Protestant minister was put into a cask lined with iron spikes, and then rolled up and down till he was dead. Parents were roasted to death before their children, and children before their parents. When any one, on the brink of mortality, desired leave to say a short prayer, the bigoted barbarians would exult over the fearful wretch, and tell him, that the agonies to be inflicted were but the beginning of infinite and eternal torments. When any of these victims, by the dread of suffering, were drawn to profess the articles of popery, they would tell them, they were in a good faith, that they would prevent their falling from it and returning to heresy; and on this would cut their throats. If any escaped the murdering hands of these human fiends, they were hunted, baited, and worried to death by their dogs. Nor could the miserable condition of these wretches' excruciating pangs, their anguish of mind, their agony of despair, assuage that lust of cruelty which precept, bigotry, national prejudice, and the contagion of example, had kindled in the depraved nature of their brutal enemies. In the last stroke of death they expressed their malice with the following valediction, "Thy soul to the devil;" and, at the hazard of a contagion, obstinately refused burial to their mangled bodies.—The number of those who died of the inhumanities suffered from the Irish papists, are not thoroughly ascertained: according to the computation of the rebels, they had slain one hundred and fifty-four thousand in the province of Ulster only.—Milton's Eiconaclastes. The Siege of Drogheda in Ireland. Appendix to the Siege of Drogheda. Report of the Examinations taken before Commissioners appointed by the King's Authority. Remonstrance from Ireland.

(x) If they turned any of these poor beasts to use, they cut their legs and flesh off when alive, and then kept them three or four days in exquisite torment. Carte says, that many thousands of these animals, whom rapine had made their own, and which were necessary for their sustenance, they destroyed in these senseless expressions of rage. Temple's Hist. of the Irish Rebellion, 8vo. ed. p. 197. Carte's Life of Ormond, vol. i. p. 177.

(y) The wickedness of these acts was improved by a perfidious breach of the laws of hospitality; the Irish lodging themselves the night before and feasting at the expence of those they intended to murder the next day. Charlemont, a considerable fort, was surprized in this manner by sir Phelim O'Neal: he sent to sir Tobias Caulfield, the governor, that he would visit him: sir Tobias, according to the hospitable custom of the Irish, feasted him and all his train; towards the evening the unsuspecting landlord and his whole house were seized, and almost all murdered, a few making their escape. Borlace's Hist. p. 13, & seq. Carte's Life of Ormond, p. 172, & seq.

(z) Such numbers of refugees died in the city of Dublin, that the church-yards in the town not being sufficient to contain them, two large pieces of new ground were taken in, and set apart for this particular use. Temple, 8vo ed. p. 94, & seq.

(a) It is pretended, that the barbarities committed by the Irish sprung from the impious policy of Ever Macmahon, titular bishop of Downe, and sir Phelim O'Neal, who finding himself successful beyond his most sanguine wishes, and having gathered together, in the space of a week, thirty thousand followers, had the foolish presumption to set himself up as king of Ulster. He, being a weak man, had no other plan of keeping his adherents attached to him, but by making them partakers in his they found to glut their malice has been imputed to a default in the conduct of the unhappy sufferers; who, instead of deserting their habitations, and assembling together for mutual defence, relied on the protection offered them by their supposed friends, their landlords, tenants, and neighbours, of the Irish families (b), who, on the faith of the most solemn engagements, got possession of their goods, and then either murdered them themselves, or delivered them up to other destroyers. If, by a courage assumed from despair, any families stood on their defence, they were disarmed by promises of safety given under hand and seal, with the severest execrations; but, on their surrender, they experienced from the hands of the perfidious villains the same fate which had been imposed on their countrymen. In this manner was the English colony exterminated in Ulster.

The Scots, from their numbers being more feared by the rebels, they affected at first to spare (c), on the consideration that they were not foreigners, but, in their original, of the common stock with the Irish (d). This policy did not take its intended effect; the Scots rose, to the number of five thousand, and made some head against the rebels; but these encreasing daily in strength, the Scots were in their turn attacked, murdered, obliged to take shelter in their native country, or fly to places of security, and thus leave their lands, to be despoiled by the enemy (e).

The saving of Dublin having preserved a place of refuge to the English, it received within its gates multitudes of those wretched supplicants; and there not being at this time above three thousand troops in the whole kingdom (f), some of the most vigorous of these fugitives, with others, in all to the number of four thousand, were immediately enlisted; and bodies of the army, which were not surrounded by the rebels, were summoned to defend the town. There were in the castle at this time fifteen hundred barrels of gunpowder, match and bullet proportionable, arms for ten thousand men, and thirty-five pieces of artillery. This military store, provided by Strafford to arm Irish Papists in support of tyranny, providentially turned out the means to preserve the cause of Freedom, and the Protestant interest in Ireland. Such a plenitude of liberty, and so full a possession of property, did the inhabitants of this country enjoy, at the very time when this insurrection broke out, that there was very little or no money in the royal treasury. This was remedied by the care of the officers of state, who representing to the people their necessities, the castle was soon victualled with provisions to maintain the army for many months. Commissions were sent by the justices for the raising the Scots in the Northern parts. Sir Charles Coote, a zealous Protestant, was made governor of the city of Dublin, and the castle was put under the care of sir Francis Willoughby, an old-experienced soldier. Six hundred men were sent to the relief of Drogheda, a place of importance, then besieged by the Irish: the design being betrayed by the English of the Pale (g), who wished well to the rebellion, though they had not yet declared themselves, the convoy, which consisted of new-raised and unexperienced men, were suddenly attacked by the enemy, and defeated. This victory helped to supply the rebels with arms; and that reputation which attends success encreased the number of their followers to so formidable an extent, that the justices laid aside all thoughts of acting offensively, and applied their whole attention to the providing for the security of the capital.

When the news of this rebellion reached the parliament of England (h), it was immediately resolved in the lower house, that a conference be desired of the lords on the following articles: that fifty thousand pounds be borrowed of the city of London (i); that a committee of both houses be appointed to consider of the affairs of Ireland; and that this committee may have power to open all packets going to and coming from that kingdom. It was farther resolved, that Owen O'Conolly who discovered the treason, should have a gift of five hundred pounds, and two hundred a-year pension; that the custody of the Isle of Wight should be sequestered in other hands (k); that the persons of Papists of quality be secured, and that such English Papists having within one year last past removed themselves to Ireland, not having an ancient estate or habitation there, be commanded by proclamation to return, and, if not obeyed, some course be taken by act of parliament for confiscation of their estates; that the lords be desired to join concerning the dissolution of the capuchins, and the speedy sending them away; that the ambassadors may be sent to to deliver up such priests of the king's subjects as are lodged in their houses; that a list be brought in of the queen's priests, and other her servants; that a proclamation be issued commanding all strangers who are not of the Protestant religion to deliver in tickets of their names, and an account of their stay, otherwise to depart the kingdom; that all innkeepers, and others who entertain lodgers, be commanded to give in tickets of the names of all such lodgers in their houses to the lord-mayor and aldermen of London, or to the next justice of the peace in Middlesex. The house of commons farther ordered, that the oaths of allegiance and supremacy should be tendered to the Irish, and such other suspected recusants as were students at the inns of court; and that such his horrid villainies, and dipping them so deep in blood and acts of cruelty, that, despairing of pardon from the English government, they should find themselves obliged from necessity to adhere to his fortunes. His scheme so far succeeded as to produce the following reflection in these ruffians: "Now, argued they, we have, without injury, without any king of provocation, assaulted the English in this cruel manner, they who have nourished us in their families as their own children, and have made no difference between their countrymen and us, now that we have requited them such bitter evil for good, they will never trust us hereafter, and we must either destroy them entirely, or be destroyed by them." Temple, 8vo. ed. p. 166. Carte, vol. i. p. 176.

(b) They were in some manner obliged to repose this kind of confidence in the Irish, from the circumstance of their not being provided with arms to defend themselves. The impious policy of Strafford had in a manner disarmed the subjects; they were forbid to sell, or keep in their houses, either powder or arms, save only what was allowed from the king's store-house at Dublin. Powder they were obliged to buy of the king for two shillings a pound, and were not allowed to have above five pounds by them at a time.

(c) A proclamation was issued out, that no Scotchman, on pain of death, should be molested in body, goods, or land. Carte's Life of Ormond, vol. i. p. 178.

(d) On the presumption of treaties still subsisting between the old Irish and the Scotch Highlanders, the Irish fancied the Scotch so much their friends, that even when forces landed from that country to assist the English government, they fondly believed that they came in the character of friends; and on this event released some of their Scotch prisoners, with an injunction that they should act with these forces. Appendix to the History of the Siege of Drogheda.

(e) To take off the odium which the principles of Popery have incurred, from various crimes of perfidy and cruelty having been perpetrated by that sect, the friends and followers of the Romish faith have endeavoured to deceive the credulous, the ignorant, and the idle, into an opinion that circumstances have been greatly aggravated in relation to the bloody facts which, at various times, have been charged on Papists. The Irish insurrection, a fact which, with all its circumstances of horror, has been handed down to posterity with the concurrent evidence of its contemporary writers, and on the most authentic authorities, has, on various occasions, been attempted, by all the arts of sophistry, to be softened, and the Irish massacrists have met with their advocates: but it is only modern times has produced one bold enough to exculpate them entirely from guilt. Such is the design of a performance, entitled "The Trial of the Roman Catholics," and published in 1764; but surely not with the approbation of that body. We would hope, in this enlightened civilized age and country, that the Papists themselves, abhorring the atrocious deeds of their deluded ancestors, would, from principles of justice, humanity, and a spirit of proper resentment, rejoice to see them handed down to posterity with all the marks of infamy they so well deserve. Notwithstanding our wish to indulge a favourable opinion of the present Roman Catholics, we cannot help thinking, that it would be highly prejudicial to the interests of the Protestants, if the Irish Catholics were indulged in their favourite system of Emancipation, which they have been endeavouring to obtain for some years past. Should they once gain their desires, we see no reason to doubt but similar atrocities against heretics would be excited by the priests of that persuasion, which holds it meritorious in the eyes of Heaven to exterminate a race of men who are averse to the absurd articles of their creed.

(f) The standing army in Ireland was usually two thousand men. Charles, to support the tyranny of Strafford's administration, had raised them to five thousand; but the parliament of England, nor chusing to trust him with more of those dangerous implements than they deemed necessary to preserve the English government in Ireland, obliged him to reduce them to fourteen troops of horse, amounting to nine hundred and forty-three, and forty-one companies, making two thousand two hundred and ninety-seven foot; a much inferior force than this having in James's time kept the peace of that country.

(g) One of lord Gormonstone's grooms, by command from his master, went to Slaine, where the rebel army was lodged, and called them out of their beds to encounter the English forces. Temple, 4to ed. p. 136. Borlace, p. 37, & seq.

(h) The commons first received the news of the Irish rebellion, from several of the chief officers of state, members of the house of peers, and lords of the privy-council. After these had desired leave of admittance in the usual form, the house ordered chairs to be set for them: they entered the house uncovered, nor did they attempt to put on their hats till after themselves and the commons were seated; after which both the commons and the lords remained covered. Rushworth, vol. iv. p. 398.

(i) The city of London was to have eight per cent. for the loan, and the security of an act of parliament. Rushworth, vol. iv. p. 411.

(k) The earl of Portland, a suspected Papist, had at this time the government of the Isle of Wight.

Irishmen

Irishmen as endeavoured to pass into Ireland without notice should be stopped, examined, and the oath of allegiance tendered to them; that no Irishman should pass out of any of the parts of this kingdom to return to Ireland without special licence from the committee of both houses for Irish affairs, or the lords of the privy-council, or the lord-lieutenant of Ireland; that no arms, ammunition, nor powder, should be transported without such a licence; and that, on the lord-lieutenant's certifying to the justices of Ireland the names of suspected persons, and the grounds of the suspicion, the said justices and the rest of the council should enter into examination of the parties, and should have power to commit them to prison till the truth was discovered; that the servants belonging to the king, queen, prince, or any of the king's children, should, according to law, take the oaths of supremacy and allegiance. The earl of Leicester (l), who had been lately appointed lord-lieutenant of Ireland, was directed to write to the justices to encourage them in their duty towards the defence of that kingdom, with assurances of a speedy assistance. These were the resolutions which passed in the parliament of England on the first item of the Irish insurrection (m).

When Charles received intelligence of the rebellion, he immediately communicated it to the Scots, who dispatched a small body of men to support their own colony in Ulster, and appointed a committee to treat with the English parliament on the terms in which they should engage farther in the Irish war. Unfortunately for the king, the zeal that he shewed in this business was entirely prevented from having its intended effect by the declaration of the rebels, who called themselves the Queen's Army, and not only gave out that they had their party both in England and Scotland, that their reason for taking up arms was to vindicate royal prerogative invaded by a puritanical parliament, that they had authority from the king and queen, but even shewed a commission under the great seal of Scotland, in which they were directed to seize on the forts and strong places in Ireland, and arrest the goods, estates, and persons, of the English Protestants to the king's use, lest, as the commission expressed, the Protestant party should carry things as violently against him in that kingdom as they did in England (n). It is easily to be imagined, that a rebellion attended with such enormous circumstances, declared to have been undertaken by the king's authority, with the concurrence of, and under promise of assistance from, the whole body of Papists, operated with great power on the Protestants, rousing all that latent terror and aversion which the past conduct of this sect had impressed on their minds. It was natural for the people to look on the authority and power of the parliament to be their only safeguard from the terror of popish plots and conspiracies; it was natural for them to determine that a rebellion, so grateful as this was supposed to be to the prevailing faction at court, would not be suppressed by a war conducted by that faction, and that the parliament was the only power to whom, with safety to the cause of religion and liberty, it could be committed. Such being the affections and such the opinion of the public, on an expression falling from the king, that he committed the care of Ireland to the English parliament (o), that assembly, affecting to interpret it in an unlimited sense, assumed the entire management of the war (p), and at once disarmed the crown of that part of the executive power which, on this occasion, had been universally apprehended.

Fresh intelligence coming from Ireland of the exceeding spreading of that rebellion, with the cruelties in which it was every where signalized, the house of commons came to the following resolutions: That two hundred thousand pounds be forthwith raised for the present occasions of Ireland: that a convenient number of ships be supplied for guarding its coasts: that six thousand horse and two thousand foot be raised for a present expedition into Ireland: that magazines of victuals be forthwith provided at West-Chester, to be sent over to Dublin as the occasion of that kingdom shall require: that the magazines of arms, &c. now in Carlisle, shall be forthwith sent over (q): that the earl of Newport, master of the ordnance, shall have power to send his commands, and issue forth warrants for the bringing up the magazine of arms and ammunition, remaining now in Kingston upon Hull, unto the Tower of London, for the securing the kingdom: that directions shall be given for the drawing a bill for the pressing of men for the Irish service.

The king, having, at the expence of many of his prerogatives, endeavoured to gain at least a neutrality from the Scots, in the contest likely to ensue between him and his English subjects, put an end to their parliament; and taking a kind farewel of his countrymen returned to London. His entrance into this city was on the twenty-fifth of November. By the indefatigable pains and intrigues of sir Richard Gurnay, the lord-mayor, a bigoted royalist, he was received and feasted with great ostentation of public joy; nor was there wanting any kind of expence, parade, and pageantry, to render the compliment perfectly agreeable.

Charles was so elevated on these demonstrations of affection, which he looked on to be general and sincere, that he at once re-assumed his former haughty conduct; and the first step he took after his return was to dismiss the guard which the parliament had appointed for their security (r). Sir William Balfour, who had been faithful to the trust reposed in him by parliament, was deprived of his (l) This earl of Leicester was grandson of sir Henry Sidney, who, at different times, had been eleven years governor of Ireland.

(m) Before any of those circumstances of horror which attended it were known; the lords justices' letter, being dated two days after the rebellion commenced, speaks only of a common insurrection, and a design to surprize the castle of Dublin. Nalson, vol. ii. p. 514, & seq.

(n) The Irish committee returned to Ireland the same month the king went to Scotland. There had been many and frequent conferences between them and the king and queen, but particularly with the latter; whom they flattered with hopes that they could easily seize into their hands the government of Ireland, and then they would assist the king to chastise the hot spirits of Westminster. In these conferences the plot of the insurrection is supposed to have been formed. On the return of the Irish committee, they left lord Dillon behind them, who was sent by the queen into Scotland. At this time, it is said, the king was prevailed on to permit the commission to be signed with the broad seal of this kingdom, that deposit not being yet settled in the hands of a proper officer, but entrusted with the king's confidants; sometimes with the marquis of Hamilton, sometimes with Endymion Porter, the king's domestic, and sometimes with one John Hamilton, a fiery prelatist.

(o) The parliament gave instructions to their committee to inform the king, that they looked upon the conspiracy in Ireland to be the effect of the same counsels which had so long distracted England and Scotland; that if persons of such aims should continue in credit and authority, the great aids which they would be forced to draw from the people for subduing the rebellion would be employed for the fomenting it, and encouraging the like attempts in England; that if his majesty would not condescend to their petition of employing such councils and ministry as should be approved of by parliament, they should be obliged, in discharge of their trust, to resolve upon some way of defending Ireland, as should concur to the securing themselves from the mischievous councils and designs which had lately been, and still were, in practice and agitation against them. The English parliament paid all that deference to the authority of the parliament of Scotland which they expected should be paid to them: they advised the king, that one regiment, consisting of a thousand men, should be immediately transported into the northern parts of Ireland; but this was to be done by the council and authority of his parliament in Scotland, to be provided in a manner, and commanded, as should seem best to their great wisdom and experience. Rushworth, vol. iv. p. 423, & seq.

(p) As the rebels, by an unprecedented piece of indiscretion, had thought fit to plead the king's commission for the enormities they had committed, he was obliged passively to submit to what undoubtedly he thought an usurpation; lest opposition should render him suspected of favouring the progress of the rebellion.

Clarendon, as is elsewhere shewn, laments the inconveniences both the king and the rebels incurred from this piece of indiscretion, in a very remarkable manner, and says, "That report raised by the Irish Catholics, of the king's being a party in the insurrection, obliged him to commit the whole management of the war to his two houses of parliament; who, if any thing was proposed of over-much rigour, if the king made any scruple or pause in giving his consent to the same, they straight declared, they were obstructed in sending relief to Ireland; and published some particular relations of the lamentable and inhuman massacre made there by the Irish, which were confirmed by multitudes of miserable undone people who landed from thence in several places of England, who reported the rebels' discourses of executing all by the king's directions; so that indeed it was not in his power to deny what they thought fit to say was necessary for the good work." Clarendon's Vindication of Ormond, p. 16, & seq.

(q) Letters arrived from Ireland, dated the twenty-fifth of November, in which the justices gave thanks to the parliament for their care in sending over provisions and money. The same letters intimated, that the rebellion grew every day more general; that the rebels were come within four miles of Dublin; that they acknowledged the king for their sovereign; and, by the mouth of lord Dillon, viscount Costilough, had sent in some high demands concerning the repeal of the penal laws against Recusants, and farther immunities respecting the Irish. Rushworth, vol. iv.

(r) On the parliament's expostulating with the king on this dismission he sent them word, that it was his royal pleasure the guard should be dissolved; his presence would protect them; he knew they had no cause to fear; but he was so tender of their safety, that, to secure them not only from real but imaginary dangers, he would command the earl of Dorset to appoint some of the trained-bands, for a few days only, to wait on both houses. The house of commons passed an order, That the guards the king appointed should be dismissed, and that the constable of Westminster should appoint a strong and sufficient watch in their stead. They gave the following reasons for their fears; viz. The numbers of suspicious disorderly persons, especially Irish, lurking about London; his office of lieutenant of the Tower; and one Lunsford, a soldier of fortune, of a profligate character, put in his place (s). The seals were taken from sir Henry Vane (t); and a proclamation was issued for obedience to the laws for establishing the true religion in England (u). Falkland, Culpepper, Hyde, Capel, and other distinguished members of the lower house, who had hitherto concealed their change of sentiments with great industry, made no scruple to avow their apostacy from the popular cause; and not only declaimed against the proceedings of its leaders, but sided with the court in every question. The house of lords had lately been very refractory: they had given the commons no satisfaction on the exclusion-bill, nor yet in their demand for sequestering the sixteen impeached bishops; and had made some objections to the bill for pressing soldiers for the Irish service (v).

These circumstances irritated, but did not intimidate, the leaders of the opposition. They knew the strength of their popularity, and were determined to make an appeal to the people. A remonstrance was accordingly drawn up: it contained the state of the kingdom, and the grievances it had suffered from the ill government of the king, and from a malignant and pernicious design of subverting the fundamental laws and principles of government, which had taken place from the beginning of his reign: it represented the advantage the people had received from the operations of this parliament: it complained of the bad counsels which the king still followed: of the cabals and wicked intrigues of Papists, and other malignants: that these cabals and evil counsels had been productive of the Irish rebellion; and that England would have been the prologue to this tragedy, had not former designs been discovered and prevented: that the malignant party which had been at first suppressed by the vigour and authority of this parliament, were now reviving, to the distraction of public affairs, and to the obstruction of those good designs which the commons had in view for the advantage of the commonwealth. The commons justify themselves from those aspersions which the malignant party had flung on their proceedings; shew that there is no hopes of establishing things on a right footing, whilst bishops and recusant lords were so prevalent in the upper house; and conclude the remonstrance with a detail of the courses they thought necessary to be pursued for perfecting the work of reformation, and removing all impediments to the happiness and peace of the kingdom.

Among these are some farther restraints upon Papists, "Seeing their religion, says the remonstrance, has such principles as do necessarily tend to the destruction and extirpation of all Protestants." That the king should employ such counsellors and ministers as the parliament could confide in; that counsellors of state should be sworn to observe the laws which concern the subject in his liberty; that good courses be taken to perfect the union of the two kingdoms of England and Scotland, and to labour, by offices of friendship, to unite all the foreign churches to Great Britain, that, by a mutual concurrence to the same common end, the good of the whole body of the Protestant profession be secured. In this remonstrance the commons declare, that their intention is not to set up an independency in matters of religion: they profess, that they intend to reduce that pomp and power which the prelates had assumed, contrary to the word of God and the laws of the land; that they intend to unburthen consciences of superstitious ceremonies, suppress innovations, and take away the monuments of idolatry: they own that the king is to be entrusted with the ecclesiastical law, as well as with the temporal, but then he is to regulate the discipline of the church of England by such rule of order as is established by parliament; to effect this establishment, they profess, that they desire the assistance of a general synod of the most pious and learned divines, both of this island and of foreign parts. The court faction, and those inclining to that side, were at this time so strong, even in the lower house, that it was not without great difficulty that this remonstrance passed. The leaders of the popular interest looked on it as the touchstone of the strength of each party, and spared neither argument, entreaty, nor artful management, to procure success. It was at length obtained, with great difficulty, the debate lasting from nine in the morning till twelve at night, and the question only carried by a majority of a hundred and fifty-nine, against a hundred and forty-eight (w).

The question for the printing it, put by Mr. Hampden, was

London; the plot in Scotland against the lives of three members of parliament, spoken of here before it happened there, with an intimation that the like was intended against divers members of both houses here; the former plot against the English parliament; the conspiracy and massacre in Ireland, conducted with such secrecy, that, but for the providential discovery at Dublin, it had been executed in one day throughout the kingdom, and some of the chief conspirators have confessed that the like was intended in England and Scotland; several advices from abroad of designs against religion, and the parliaments of Scotland and England; the secret meetings, consultations, and devotions of Papists, for the success of some great design in hand; from divers examinations taken of their dangerous speeches, they did conceive there was just cause to apprehend some wicked and mischievous practice to interrupt the peaceable proceedings of parliament still in hand; but rather than admit of so dangerous a precedent as to have a guard appointed them under the command of any person themselves should not choose, they would run any hazard: but they left it to his majesty to consider, whether it will not be fit to suffer his high court of parliament to enjoy that privilege of providing for their own safety, which was never denied inferior courts.

Some little time before the king's return from Scotland, one Beale, a taylor, informed the house of commons, that, walking in the fields, he had overheard certain persons discoursing of a dangerous conspiracy; that one hundred and eight ruffians were hired to murder one hundred and eight of the Puritan members of both houses of parliament; and that when the city of London should be in an uproar on this assassination, which was appointed to be perpetrated on the 18th of November, there were to be risings of Papists in six several parts of the land, viz. in Warwickshire, Worcestershire, Lancashire, and two other places, which he remembers not; that he had heard one Philips, Mr. Sheldon (a Papist), and two priests, father Jones and father Andrews, mentioned as being concerned in the plot. This information being sent to the lords, orders were issued for seizing the persons of Jones and Andrews, and other seminary priests and Jesuits; that Mr. Sheldon and his son should be taken into safe custody; and that the deputy-lieutenants of Worcester, &c. have a charge to secure the said counties. An ordinance passed both houses for putting the kingdom immediately into a posture of defence, and that the earl of Essex should command the trained-bands on the South side, and the earl of Holland on the North side, the Trent. The commons desired the lords to join with them in the nominating particular men of trust to take care of the militia, and that the persons of Recusants should be secured: it was some time before the lords agreed to this article, and then with some restrictions, that it should only take place on those who were the most active and exceptionable of that body. The commons passed an order, That all Papists should leave the town, under pain of being proceeded against according to law: the same directions were sent to the mayor of Berwick. Lord Strange, the lord-lieutenant of Lancashire, confirmed the suspicions of the public by writing word, that there was great need to look after Lancashire. It is not to be supposed, but that the popular party in both houses made a politic use of these rumours, and that their fears were not so strong as they pretended; but that the parliament was totally void of suspicions, is, we think, as improbable. The votes which passed on these occasions were pretty unanimous; and when the apprehensions of men are alarmed with real dangers, every slight appearance has its effect. Nalson, vol. ii. p. 646, & seq. 654, 688.

(s) He was a person of great licence, and only known by some desperate acts, for which he had formerly been imprisoned, and, having made his escape, fled the kingdom. One of these desperate acts was an attempt to murder sir Thomas Pelham. On being challenged for an affront he had given to one captain Buller, he refused to give him the satisfaction he demanded, but sent him word he would cut his throat. Clarendon's History, vol. i. p. 262. Nalson, vol. ii. p. 774.

(t) The king had before deprived him of the office of treasurer of the household, and conferred it on lord Saville. Saville had been promised the presidentship of the North, if that commission had not been declared illegal. Clarendon, vol. i. p. 255.

(u) By the True Religion was meant all those ceremonies which the commons had by ordinance forbidden, and a conformity to the present form of divine worship, though it was repugnant to the consciences of the greater number of the people, and had been acknowledged to need alteration, by a committee of bishops and other divines, who had been appointed by the house of lords to consider on the matter. Nalson, vol. ii. p. 765.

(v) Differences had gone so far between the two houses, that, in a conference on the fore-mentioned subjects, the lords were given to understand, that if they would not consent to the passing the bill the commons had already sent up, and some others necessary for the safety and preservation of the kingdom, that the commons (being the representative body of the whole kingdom, and their lordships being but as particular persons, and coming to parliament in a particular capacity) might join with those lords who were sensible of the public danger, and represent the same unto his majesty.

(w) This remonstrance was looked on by the opposers of the court to be absolutely necessary to their farther curtailing the power of the crown; and the farther curtailing the power of the crown they looked on as essential to the preservation of those privileges the public had already obtained. Indeed, this circumstance was so obvious to common reason, that the party did not expect to meet with the difficulty they found in gaining their point. On the remonstrance being called for late in the day, lord Falkland, at this time a zealous courtier, moved, that it should be entered on the next morning. Oliver Cromwell, as staunch in court opposition, asked, "Why he would have it put off? for it would be quickly determined." "Sure, answered Falkland, it will take up some debate." To this Cromwell replied, "That he believed it would be a sorry one." The next day, when the debate was over, Cromwell told Falkland, "That he would take his word another time. If, added he, the remonstrance had been rejected, I would immediately have sold all I have; and I know there are many more honest men of the same resolution." Sir Edward Deering, a man of a vain and variable disposition, had been first flattered by the puritanical party was in all probability gained by the impetuosity of Mr. Hyde, who, contrary to the customs and order of the house, desired leave to protest against it. Mr. Hyde's example excited Jeffery Palmer and others to exclaim, in a tumultuous manner, "They did protest." This not only put a stop to all quiet and free debate, but might have occasioned bloodshed, had not Mr. Hampden put an end to the dispute by proposing to adjourn till two o'clock the next afternoon. On the re-meeting, Mr. Pym represented the disorders of the preceding day, the house having been nearly engaged in blood, the consequence, as he alleged, of Mr. Hyde's transgression. The rhetoric of a Pym was not necessary to convince the house that much mischief would result from such a precedent, if permitted to go unpunished. Mr. Palmer was committed to the Tower; and the house being incensed at the growing insolence of the declared partizans of the court, the question for printing the remonstrance passed with little opposition. It was strongly attacked by the king's party, as a signal that the commons intended farther encroachments on royal prerogative, and that nothing less than a total abolition of monarchical power would satisfy that aspiring body. These insinuations had little effect on the minds of the people, or were more than balanced by a review of the king's illegal violent administration. That apparent combination of prelatical, papistical, and monarchical interest, which had made such bold attempts to destroy every principle of liberty which yet remained in the constitution, had entered into so many conspiracies against the authority of parliament, and now dealt forth unparalleled destruction in Ireland, were, to the public, objects of a much more terrible nature than the apprehensions of idle selfish courtiers, and bigoted formalists. They remembered with what perfidy, with what violation of every thing that was sacred, the Petition of Right had been invaded, and were determined, even at the hazard of impairing a government from which themselves and their ancestors had received nothing but injuries, to secure their new-acquired privileges from future attacks of the crown.

The remonstrance of the commons was presented to the king with a petition which openly insinuated his concurrence in the Irish rebellion, complained of those bad counsels which had occasioned such variety of mischiefs, and demanded, as a security from farther evils, that bishops, who had long acted as corrupt instruments of despotism and popery, should be deprived of their votes in parliament, the immoderate power they had usurped over the clergy abridged, and that every office of command should be alone trusted to persons on whom the parliament could confide. The king's answer to this petition was in vague and general terms: after blaming the commons for publishing it, contrary to his express intimation, and censuring their declaration as an unparliamentary proceeding, he tells them, that he does not know what they mean by a wicked and malignant party prevalent in the government; he had ever concurred with all the just desires of his people to preserve the peace and safety of the kingdom from the designs of the popish party (x). Though the remonstrance did not accuse the king of being a papist in his heart, yet he takes a great deal of pains to clear himself on this particular, and insinuates, that, since he is convinced of the purity of the Protestant religion, it is not possible he should encourage the Popish faith (y). He asserts, that the right of the bishops of voting in parliament is grounded on the fundamental law of the kingdom; that the power of the clergy is well moderated by the taking away the high-commission court; he is contented to call a national synod to examine such ceremonies as give just offence; but as for corruption in religion, which they had objected, he is persuaded that there cannot be found on earth that church which professed the true religion with more purity of doctrine than the church of England. After a high panegyric on the beauty of its discipline and excellency of its doctrine, he declares, he will, to the end of his life, maintain it in its glory, not only against all invasions of Popery, but also from the irreverence of those many schismatics and separatists wherewith the kingdom abounded. To that part of the petition of the commons concerning counsellors, the king asserts, that it is his undoubted prerogative to call those to his secret counsels, to public employments, and his particular services, as he should think fit; and tells them, that he has never elected any to these offices but what had given good testimonies of their abilities and integrity. The answer to the remonstrance was as vague as this answer to the petition, as little calculated to give satisfaction to the commons on the articles of their demands, and as totally deficient in point of justifying the king's conduct. It finishes with a promise to observe and maintain the established laws; but in the same general terms which the king had before frequently used, and to which he had always given what sense he thought proper.

During these disputes between the king and the house of commons, the affairs of Ireland grew every day more desperate. The succour which the Scots had offered for the subduing this rebellion had not, on prudential reasons, been immediately accepted by the English house of commons: they had received intelligence from their committee in that kingdom, that if they agreed to the providing for an effectual number of men to be raised in Scotland, the king would have insisted on the commanding them himself; a circumstance of the most dangerous kind. This apprehension being removed on the return of the king, the commons voted, that ten thousand Scots should be sent into Ireland, on condition that they would be commanded by the government of England settled in Ireland. It was resolved, that ten thousand foot and two thousand horse should be raised in England for the same service. It was some time before this resolution was carried into practice, the house of lords having refused their assent to a preamble in the bill for pressing of men for the particular service of Ireland, declaratory of the subjects' privileges; viz. "That the king had in no case, excepting that of invasion from a foreign power, authority to press men into his service." This assertion abolished that noxious prerogative which the crown had assumed of obliging men to perform any task of pretended public service which should be imposed on them; a prerogative which, in this reign, had been used as a punishment to refractory members of parliament, and to all ranks of men who had refused to comply with the king's illegal commands, to the great detriment of their fortune and health. Notwithstanding that such a limitation of regal authority was necessary to the security and free enjoyment of person, time, and property, yet the peers, who had shewn lately some symptoms of distrust and jealousy, were very obstinate on this article; besides the whole bench of bishops, who were always a dead weight on the side of prerogative, the greater number of temporal lords began to apprehend that that noble spirit of liberty which flamed in the lower house, and from thence diffused itself through the whole nation, might in its consequences affect their particular privileges; and, as the nature, use, and operations of government began to be pretty generally understood, that the commons would, in their researches on this subject, discover this important truth, "That invidious distinctions and privileges are so far from being instrumental to the authority of laws, or the order, regularity, and decency of society, that they must necessarily act contrary to these purposes." To the baseness of a selfish consideration did the nobility sacrifice the principles of reason, justice, and honour; and all, except a few, who, sailing with the full tide of popular favour, were transported beyond the current of their natural affection, inclined to take shelter under the tyranny of the crown, from the dreaded invasion of democracy. Nor did the bleeding persecuted state of the Irish Protestants, nor the insolent pretensions of the Papists, who demanded a full toleration of their religion in Ireland, prevail with them to pass the pressing acts for raising land and sea forces. In vain did the commons protest, that the loss of Ireland must be imputed to the lords; the lords continued inflexible: and the commons, finding that no arguments could prevail, ordered their committee on the Irish affairs to meet no more. This disagreement occasioned a fatal pause in the military preparations. It was at length composed by the interposition of the king; who, apprehending that the lords would give way to the extreme urgency of the occasion, came to the party in parliament into being an active agent against episcopacy, on some disgust, was now shrunk back into his original orthodoxy in civil and religious politics, and made two violent speeches against the remonstrance. Clarendon's History, vol. i. p. 246, & seq. Nalson, vol. ii. p. 664, & seq.

(x) On this assertion of the king, Rapin justly observes, that it was true he had never rejected the petitions presented to him on this occasion; but then it was no less true, that his promises in this respect had never been executed. Rapin, vol. xi. p. 261.

(y) Notwithstanding, as Rapin observes, his conduct had shewn that this consequence did not necessarily follow. Rapin, vol. xi. p. 267.

house, and taking notice of the bill then depending, offered to pass it with a salvo jure for the king and people; at the same time testifying his displeasure at those who began a dispute which, he said, concerned his ancient and undoubted prerogative. This unconstitutional measure acted like magic on the counsels of the upper house: the popular lords did not fail to enlarge themselves on the subject; the assembly, prejudiced as it was, took fire at so manifest a violation of their rights, and voted, that their privileges were broken by the king's taking notice of the bill whilst in agitation, by his propounding a provisional clause before it was presented to him, and by his expressing his displeasure against persons for matters moved in parliament. The same votes passing with the commons, both houses united in a declaration vindicatory of their privileges; at the same time petitioning the king, that he would declare the authors of the misinformation and evil counsel, that they might be brought to punishment. The king excused himself from having been guilty of any designed breach of privilege, but utterly refused the naming any person who had given him information or counsel on the subject.

Notwithstanding the harmony which seemed to subsist between the two houses, the public affairs continued yet in an unsettled state. The pressing act had not yet passed the upper house; the important business of Ireland consequently stood still. Nothing was determined in the grand point of ecclesiastical policy; bishops, the supposed obstacles to both civil and religious reformation, yet maintained their seats in parliament. The public were continually harrassed and alarmed with the fears of popish plots and conspiracies. Lunsford was yet, in spite of the endeavours of the lower house, continued in the command of the Tower; and, upon some examinations which passed at this time, the commons voted, "That there was sufficient evidence to believe there had been a second attempt to bring up the army against the parliament, and an intention to make the Scotch army stand neuter." On this examination, Daniel O'Neal being voted guilty of high treason (z), was impeached by the commons, and committed to prison by the lords. Sir John Berkeley, sir Hugh Pollard, Ashburnham, and Wilmot, were voted guilty of misprision of treason (a). A fast was at this time resolved on (b). It was ordered, that a declaration should be drawn for clearing his majesty's honour from false reports cast upon him by the rebels in Ireland; and a provision to be made that there may be no conclusion of that war to the prejudice of this kingdom. Fresh addresses were made to the king for putting the laws against papists in execution; conferences were held on the subject of securing their persons; and it was proposed by the commons, that a stop should be put to the toleration of so dangerous a superstition. In the midst of that indignation which at this time was excited against these sectaries, the king solicited the consent of parliament in reprieving seven priests, who had been convicted and condemned by due course of law. Both houses being exasperated with a letter they had just received from Ireland, containing a particular account of the cruelties which had been committed in that kingdom, and were still carrying on, by the authority and influence of priests, joined in a petition to the king, that he would suffer the criminals to be executed: with this request the king did not think fit to comply; but offered to banish them, if the parliament would give their consent, which was accordingly done.

Every thing which could excite passion, and fix attention, actually subsisted at this critical juncture. The fears of men were alarmed, their expectations raised, and the pulse of the public beat high for a full enjoyment of liberty: the mechanic neglected his art, the apprentice his employment; shops were left empty; and even the women, laying aside their domestic cares, engaged with the men in political intrigues: a rage for reformation seized the whole community. Such being the disposition of the public, the popular leaders had recourse to the spirit without doors, to get the better of the opposition they found within. Several common-council-men, and others of good repute in the city, in a petition which set forth their fears on the occasion of colonel Lunsford's having the command of the Tower, entreated the commons to take such means as should secure the city and kingdom against farther mischiefs. The commons conferred with the lords; the lords refusing to join in an address for the removal of Lunsford, the commons, after voting that they held colonel Lunsford unfit to be lieutenant of the Tower of London, as he was a person in whom the commons of England could not confide, set forth a declaration, protesting their innocence of the mischiefs likely to ensue; and asserting, that the malignant party were not only encouraged by the success of the rebels in Ireland, but likewise by the interruptions which the public business received in the house of peers, occasioned by the number of bishops and papists, notoriously disaffected to the public good, who had voices in that assembly. This declaration being read in the upper house, it was moved and carried, that the debates on it should be adjourned. On this the popular lords, to the number of twenty-one, entered their protest; and the commons ordered the earl of Newport, the then supposed constable of the Tower, to reside in the place, and take on himself its custody and guard. The earl of Newport sent them word, that the king had discharged him from that trust. This made the public discontent rise so high, that the lord mayor informed the king, that there would be a general rising in the city, to attempt the Tower. On this the keys were taken from Lunsford, and given to sir John Byron, a man almost as disagreeable to the public as his predecessor.

When the commons deputed their committee to treat with the city concerning a loan of money for the Irish wars, they were told, with a just freedom, that the privilege of parliament was a great hindrance to their trade. The citizens farther delivered their opinion: that popish lords, and other suspected persons of quality, ought to be secured; and that the bishops maintaining their seats in parliament was an impediment to the progress of those good laws and motions which had been sent up by the commons to the peers. To prevent the destructive plots of the papists and their adherents, the petitioners prayed, that considerable forces might be sent into Ireland; this kingdom put into a posture of defence; that the commons would be a means to obtain the concurrence of the king and lords, in the punishment of delinquents, the redressing the grievances of church and commonwealth; and that they would take into particular consideration the abuses crept into the ancient government of the city. To the better effecting of this, that popish lords, and bishops, should be removed out of the house of peers, as had been desired by the representative body of the city, when fifty thousand pounds were freely lent to raise forces for Ireland.

This petition was in its nature too pleasing to the prevailing party in the house of commons not to meet with encouragement. An assembly having met together in Southwark, on a business of the same kind, they were disturbed by a meddling officious constable of the high-church faction; a riot ensued, but, on a writ being directed to the sheriff, to proceed against the parties, the leading men in the house of commons declared, that the matter affected their privileges, the constable having interrupted a set of well affected men, who had met together to address that assembly. On this an order passed, that the under sheriff should be enjoined not to suffer proceedings to be made upon any inquisition that might concern persons who were met together to subscribe a petition to be preferred to that house.

Whilst the partizans of liberty were thus uniting their forces, and making vigorous efforts to remove the obstacles which impeded their designs, Charles, who had been hitherto unable to divert the popular current which had run so strongly for his enemies, was making impotent attempts to obstruct its course. He not only gave private orders to Lunsford and others to withstand the mob in their tumultuous clamours against bishops and popish lords, but, affecting fears for his own person, retained a guard of dis-

His plea was not allowed; and a resolution passed on this occasion, "That it belonged to the house of peers to interpret acts of parliament, in time of parliament, in any cause which should be brought before them." Nalson, vol. ii. p. 625.

Days were appointed for gathering collections towards the relief of those English who had been stripped and spoiled by the Irish rebels: to these contributions sir John Packer gave one hundred pounds. Some time after this it was ordained, by the desire of both houses, that a monthly fast should be observed during the troubles of Ireland. Nalson, vol. ii. p. 660, 775, 795.

banded officers, who waited to be employed in the Irish war, and were ready to engage in any mischievous design which should be proposed. These desperadoes were entertained and fed with great pomp at Whitehall. The gentlemen of the inns of court were likewise tampered with, and some of them offered their assistance to defend the persons of the king and queen: of this idle crew there were that went so far as to say, "Let us not suffer these fellows at Westminster to domineer thus, but bring up our tenants to pull them out." The mob was not only insulted with contemptuous words, such as "round-headed dogs (c)," but swords were drawn, and many of them wounded (d). The gentleman-usher of the house of lords, having, by the command of that assembly, ordered the concourse of people to disperse, was told, that they were willing to go; but that colonel Lunsford and others were laying in wait for them in Westminster Hall, and that many of their fellows, in their way home, had been wounded by his soldiers. The lords appointed a committee to examine what warrant had been given to the soldiers to come to the parliament house? what notice had been given to any others to come to Westminster in multitudes? and who gave the occasion that swords were drawn and blows given in Westminster Hall? On an inquisition which the house of commons made on this business, they were informed by one of their own members, that, on his questioning a guard of soldiers, which he found in the way, he was told that they were set there by the command of the lord archbishop of York. Mr. Hollis was sent up to the lords to complain of the outrages which had been committed on the persons of the king's subjects; and, that this might be a free parliament, to desire them, according to their own proposition, to join with the house of commons in a petition to his majesty, that the parliament might have a guard, and such a one as should be approved by the two houses, to be commanded by the earl of Essex. The lords not then thinking fit to agree with the repeated requests of the commons, they directed, that the justices of the peace of the city of Westminster should take care that good watches, sufficiently armed, should be set in such convenient places as should be necessary for their safeguard; and that halberts should be provided for the service of the house. They farther declared, that it should be lawful for every member to bring his own servant to attend at the door, armed with such weapons as they should think fit. The king was addressed on this subject in the name of the lower house: this address set forth, that there had been several attempts heretofore to bring destruction on their whole body at once; that a malignant party, bitterly envenomed against them, was daily gathering strength and confidence, and was now come to such a height as to give boldness to some not only to imbrue their hands in the blood of the subjects at the very doors of the parliament, and at the king's own gates, but had thrown out insolent and menacing speeches against the parliament itself; so that they conceived they could not, with the safety of their persons, on which the peace of the whole kingdom depended, sit any longer unarmed and without a guard. The king's party having been the aggressors in the fore-mentioned fray, the commons regarded it as a levying war on his subjects; and it afforded them a pretence for protecting the mob (e). The king set forth a proclamation against tumultuous meetings; but some citizens having been committed on the occasion of riots, they were, by the express orders of the lower house, set at liberty (f); and David Hyde, a reformed officer, who called out, "he would cut the throats of those round-headed dogs that bawled against bishops," was secured by the citizens, and brought before the house of commons, who committed him to prison, and cashiered him from all employment in Ireland.

The lords, alarmed at the pretensions, and dreading the vigour, of the commons, kept firm to their resolution of defending the bishops in their privilege of voting in parliament, when an unexpected accident subdued that obstinacy which had withstood the general voice of the people, and the repeated endeavours of the commons. Williams, the present archbishop of York, in his way to the house of lords fell in with a body of apprentices, who had just delivered in a petition for the laws to be put in execution against priests and Jesuits; that the papists, and other dangerous persons, might be secured; and for the removal of prelates and popish lords (g). He observing one particular youth who was louder than the rest in his clamours against bishops, had the imprudence to lay hands on him: this produced a contest; the youth was rescued by his fellows, and the bishop's robes were torn in the scuffle. Hereupon Williams summoned all his fellow prelates who were in town, and proposed to them to join in a protestation, to be addressed to the king and the house of peers. This proposal being agreed to, he immediately prepared a paper, which set forth, "That though the bishops had an undoubted right to sit and vote in parliament, and ought to be protected by the king in this privilege, yet in going thither they had been menaced and assaulted by the multitude, to the danger of their lives, and could find no redress, upon sundry complaints made to both houses on these particulars; that as they could no longer with safety attend their duty in the house, they did protest against all laws, votes, and resolutions, as null and void, which should pass during the time of their forced and violent absence." This paper was directed to the king, with an humble desire that he would send it to the lords, and command that it should be entered in the Journals of the House. The archbishop hurried to Whitehall for the royal approbation: Charles, too precipitate in his determinations, entered into the politics of the bishops: "The house of peers could do nothing in their absence; this would affect the resolutions of the lower house; this would put an effectual stop to the progress of the intended reformation; the house of peers might espouse the cause of bishops with a warmth that might occasion such a disagreement as should oblige the commons to give up their pretensions in this point; or it might introduce a favourable opportunity to bring about a dissolution." Thus sanguine were the king's hopes on every plausible expedient that was proposed to him. The paper was immediately delivered into the hands of the lord keeper Littleton, on the 27th of December, with an injunction that he should present it to the house as soon as it met. Littleton, who was a state Puritan by principle, though a courtier in practice, was desirous to perfect a reconciliation with the prevailing party in the house of commons; and finding that great use might be made of this protestation, he did not offer an objection, but, observing the strict letter of the command, read it openly in the house of lords, not without making some comments on it very much to the disadvantage of the protesting party. The assembly of peers was at this time not only purged of the company of bishops, but the popish lords were likewise frightened away by the rage of the people. This protestation, therefore, to the confusion and disappointment of the king and the prelates, acted diametrically opposite to their expectations: the popular lords, in a transport of joy, cried out, that the hand of God now appeared in bringing that to pass which they could never otherwise have effected. The house unanimously agreed to desire an immediate conference with the commons; the protestation was read by the keeper, and delivered to them with this advice, That he had received it from the king's own hand, with a command to present it to the house of peers: he told them, in the name of that assembly, that the protestation containing

(c) Dugdale says, that the German reformers cut their hair round, in contradiction to the conformists, who were vain and costly in their attire, and wore a great quantity of hair: the reformers in England took example from their German brethren. The queen, who had a great deal of levity in her conduct and manner, observing Samuel Barnardiston (one of the ringleaders of the non-conforming sect) marching at the head of a body of apprentices, cried out, "see what a handsome young round-head is there;" the appellation was affected by her whole party, and was publicly used by Hyde. The king's guard of bravoes were in return called Cavaliers. These terms were afterwards used to distinguish the two parties. Dugdale, p. 8. Rapin, vol. xi. p. 294. Clarendon's Hist. vol. i. p. 267.

(d) The news that Lunsford and others of the gang had drawn their swords upon the people being carried into the city, great multitudes of that body ran down to Westminster, with staves and other weapons. This occasioning a more than ordinary uproar, the assiduous lord-mayor ordered the gates to be shut, and put the trained bands in arms; whilst the king, on his part, commanded the militia of London and Westminster to assemble by turns, and guard his person. Rapin, vol. xi. p. 294.

(e) These mobs are not to be considered as composed only of the lowest order of citizens. In a fray occasioned by the archbishop of York's detaining some rioters who had got into the abbey, several citizens were hurt by stones thrown from the leads; and one sir Richard Wiseman died of the wounds he received. Rushworth, vol. iv. p. 465.

matters of dangerous consequence, extending to the deep trenching upon the fundamental privileges and being of parliaments, they thought fit to communicate it to the commons, as a thing of great and general concernment. On the report of this conference, it was resolved in the lower house, that the twelve bishops who had signed the paper should be accused of high-treason, for endeavouring to subvert the fundamental laws and being of parliaments. Mr. Glyn was sent up on this errand: he desired, in the name of the commons, that the bishops might be put in safe custody. The lords complied with the request; the parties were brought to the bar as delinquents (h), and then committed to the Tower (i); not an individual in either house having ventured to speak a word in their vindication: one person only said, that "he did not believe them guilty of high-treason, but they were stark mad, and ought to be sent to Bedlam (k)."

A few days after, in the beginning of 1642, the king fell into another indiscretion, much more fatal: an indiscretion, to which all the ensuing disorders and civil wars ought immediately and directly to be ascribed. This was the impeachment of lord Kimbolton and the five members.

When the commons employed, in their remonstrance, language so strong and energetic, they had not been actuated entirely by passion: their views were more solid and profound. They considered, that, in a violent attempt, such as an invasion of the ancient constitution, the more leisure was afforded the people to reflect, the less would they be inclined to second that rash and dangerous enterprize; that the peers would certainly refuse their concurrence, nor were there any hopes of prevailing on them, but by instigating the populace to tumult and disorder; that the employing of such means for so obvious an end, would, at long-run, lose them all their popularity, and turn the tide of favour to the contrary party; and that, if the king only remained in tranquillity, and cautiously eluded the first violence of the tempest, he would, in the end, certainly prevail, and be able at least to preserve the ancient laws and constitution. They were therefore resolved, if possible, to excite him to some violent passion; in hopes that he would commit indiscretions, of which they might make advantage.

It was not long before they succeeded beyond their most sanguine expectations. Charles was enraged to find that all his seeming concessions but increased their demands; that the people were instigated, by his chicanery, to sedition and tumults; that the blackest crimes were alledged against him, and even the Irish massacre ascribed to his counsels and machinations, (of which there appeared plausible reason to charge him,) and that a method of address was adopted not only unsuitable towards so great a prince, but which no private gentleman could hear without resentment. When he considered the increasing demands of the commons, he was apt to ascribe them, in a great measure, to his own indolence and facility. The queen and the ladies of the court farther stimulated his passion, and represented, that, if he exerted the vigour, and displayed the majesty of a monarch, the daring usurpations of his subjects, as they called them, would shrink before him. Lord Digby, a creature of the court, and hurried on by precipitate passions, suggested like counsels; and Charles, who was ever disposed to hasty resolutions, gave way to the fatal importunity of his friends and servants.

On the 3rd of January, 1642, Herbert, the attorney general appeared in the house of peers, and, in his majesty's name, entered an accusation of high treason against lord Kimbolton and five commoners, Denzil Hollis, sir Arthur Hazlerig, Hampden, Pym, and Strode. The articles were, That they had traiterously endeavoured to subvert the fundamental laws and government of the kingdom, to deprive the king of his regal power, and to impose on his subjects an arbitrary and tyrannical authority; that they had endeavoured, by many foul aspersions on his majesty and his government, to alienate the affections of his people, and make him odious to them; that they had attempted to draw his late army to disobedience of his royal commands, and to side with them in their traiterous designs; that they had invited and encouraged a foreign power to invade the kingdom; that they had aimed at subverting the rights and very being of parliament; that, in order to complete their traiterous designs, they had endeavoured, as far as in them lay, by force and terror, to compel the parliament to join with them, and, to that end, had actually raised and countenanced tumults against the king and parliament; and that they had traiterously conspired to levy, and actually had levied, war against the king.

The whole world stood amazed at this important accusation, so suddenly entered upon, without concert, deliberation, or reflection. Some of these articles of accusation, men said, to judge by appearance, seem to be common between the impeached members and the parliament; nor did these persons appear any farther active in the enterprizes of which they were accused, than so far as they concurred with the majority in their votes and speeches. Though proofs might, perhaps, be produced, of their privately inviting the Scots to invade England; how could such an attempt be considered as treason, after the act of oblivion which had passed, and after that both houses, with the king's concurrence, had voted that nation three hundred thousand pounds for their brotherly assistance! While the house of peers are scarcely able to maintain their independency, or to reject the bills sent them by the commons; will they ever be permitted by the populace, supposing them inclined, to pass a sentence, which must totally subdue the lower house, and put an end to their ambitious undertakings? These five members, at least Pym, Hampden, and Hollis, are the very heads of the popular party; and if these be taken off, what fate must be expected by their followers, who are many of them accomplices in the same treason? The punishment of leaders is ever the last triumph over a broken and routed party; but surely was never before attempted, in opposition to a faction, during the full tide of its power and success.

But men had not leisure to wonder at the indiscretion of this measure: their astonishment was excited by new attempts, still more precipitate and imprudent. A serjeant at arms, in the king's name, demanded of the house the five members; and was sent back without any positive answer. Messengers were employed to search for them and arrest them. Their trunks, chambers, and studies, were sealed and locked. The house voted all these acts of violence to be breaches of privilege, and commanded every one to defend the liberty of the members. The king, irritated by all this opposition, resolved next day to go in person to the house, with an intention to seize in their presence, the persons whom he had accused.

This resolution was discovered to the countess of Carlisle, sister to Northumberland, a lady of spirit, wit, and intrigue. She privately sent intelligence to the five members; and they had time to withdraw, a moment before the king entered. He was accompanied by his ordinary retinue to the number of above two hundred, armed as usual, some with halberts, some with walking swords. The king left them at the door, and he himself advanced alone through the hall; while all the members rose to receive him. The speaker withdrew from his chair, and the king took possession of it. The speech which he made was as follows: "Gentlemen, I am sorry for this occasion of coming to you. Yesterday, I sent a serjeant at arms, to demand some, who, by my order, were accused of high treason. Instead of obedience, I received a message. I must here declare to you, that, though no king that ever was in England could be more careful of your privileges than I shall be, yet in cases of treason no person has privilege. Therefore, am I come to tell you, that I must have these men wheresoever I can find them. Well, since I see all the birds are flown, I do expect that you will send them to me as soon as they return. But I assure you, on (h) Archbishop of York, bishops of Durham, Coventry and Litchfield, Norwich, St. Asaph, Bath and Wells, Hereford, Oxford, Ely, Gloucester, Peterborough, and Landaff. The commons having obtained this point, dropped their first prosecution against the thirteen bishops. On this impeachment of the bishops, Mr. Rouse made a speech to the house to persuade them to interpose their authority to prevent the consecration of three of the bishops newly appointed: two of them had undergone that ceremony, and were already invested in their office. Hall, bishop of Norwich, had, at the instigation of Laud, written a treatise to vindicate the jus divinum of bishops. Though this absurd doctrine is strongly inculcated in this work, yet it was done with too much moderation for the archbishop, who corrected it and improved it with his own hand, before he suffered it to be published. Parl. Hist. vol. x. p. 146, & seq.

(i) The two archbishops, Laud and Williams, having ever been of the same principles, and having only differed as their several interests thwarted each other, those interests being now reconciled by the similarity of their situations, became perfect friends, each of them expressing contrition for that mutual animosity which had contributed to the overthrow of a superstition calculated to support the prelates in power, pomp, and luxury.

(k) The disgrace of the bishops was celebrated with bonfires, and all sorts of public rejoicings.

the word of a king, I never did intend any force, but shall proceed against them in a fair and legal way: for I never meant any other. And now since I see I cannot do what I came for, I think this is no unfit occasion to repeat what I have said formerly, that whatever I have done in favour and to the good of my subjects, I do intend to maintain it."

When the king was looking around for the accused members, he asked the speaker, who stood below, whether any of these persons were in the house? The speaker, falling on his knee, prudently replied: "I have, Sir, neither eyes to see, nor tongue to speak in this place, but as the house is pleased to direct me, whose servant I am. And I humbly ask pardon, that I cannot give any other answer to what your majesty is pleased to demand of me."

The commons were in the utmost disorder; and, when the king was departing, some members cried aloud, so as he might hear them, "Privilege! privilege!" And the house immediately adjourned till next day.

That evening, the accused members, to show the greater apprehension, removed into the city, which was their fortress. The citizens were the whole night in arms. Some people, who were appointed for that purpose, or perhaps actuated by their own terrors, ran from gate to gate, crying out, that the cavaliers were coming to burn the city, and that the king himself was at their head.

The next morning Charles sent to the mayor, and ordered him to call a common-council immediately. About ten o'clock, he himself, attended only by three or four lords, went to Guildhall. He told the common-council, that he was sorry to hear of the apprehensions entertained of him; that he was come to them without any guard, in order to show how much he relied on their affections; and that he had accused certain men of high-treason, against whom he would proceed in a legal way, and therefore presumed that they would not meet with protection in the city. After many other expressions of a similar cajoling nature, he told one of the sheriffs, who of the two was thought the least inclined to his service, that he would dine with him. He departed the hall without receiving the applause which he expected. In passing through the streets, he heard the cry, "Privilege of parliament! privilege of parliament?" resounding from all quarters. One of the populace drew nigh to his coach, and called out with a loud voice, "To your tents, O Israel!" the words employed by the mutinous Israelites, when they abandoned Rehoboam, their rash and ill-counselled sovereign.

When the house of commons met, they affected the greatest dismay; and adjourning themselves for some days, ordered a committee to sit in merchant-taylors hall in the city. The committee made an exact inquiry into all circumstances attending the king's entry into the house: every passionate speech, every menacing gesture of any, even the meanest of his attendants, was recorded. An intention of offering violence to the parliament, of seizing the accused members in the very house, and of murdering all who should make resistance, was inferred, and that perhaps with justice, since he came attended by two hundred men in arms. And that unparalleled breach of privilege was still ascribed to the counsel of Papists and their adherents. This expression, which then recurred every moment in speeches and memorials, begat at that time the deepest and most real consternation throughout the kingdom.

A letter was intercepted, and communicated to the committee, who laid great stress upon it. One Catholic there congratulates another on the accusation of the members; and represents that incident as a branch of the same pious contrivance, which had excited the Irish insurrection, and by which the profane heretics would soon be exterminated in England.

The house again met; and after confirming the votes of their committee, instantly adjourned, as if exposed to the most imminent perils from the violence of their enemies. This practice they continued for some time. When the people were wrought up to a sufficient degree of rage and terror, through the king's imprudence, it was thought proper, that the accused members should, with a triumphant and military procession, take their seats in the house. The river was covered with boats, and other vessels, laden with small pieces of ordnance, and prepared for fight. Skippon, whom the parliament had appointed major-general of the city-militia, conducted the members to Westminster Hall; and when the populace, by land and by water, passed Whitehall, they still asked with insulting shouts, "What has become of the king and his cavaliers? and whither are they fled?"

The king, in his turn, becoming apprehensive of danger from the enraged multitude, had retired to Hampton Court, deserted by all the world, and overwhelmed with grief, shame, and remorse, for the fatal measures into which he had precipitated himself. His distressed situation he could no longer ascribe to the rigours of destiny, or the malignity of enemies: his own precipitancy and indiscretion must bear the blame of whatever disasters should henceforth befal him. The most faithful of his adherents, between sorrow and indignation, were confounded with reflections on what had happened, and what was likely to follow. Seeing every prospect blasted, the parliament triumphant, the discontented populace inflamed to a degree of fury, they utterly despaired of success in a cause to whose ruin friends and enemies seemed equally to conspire.

The prudence of the king, in his conduct of this affair, nobody pretended to justify. The legality of his proceedings met with many apologies from his partizans; but they were generally offered to unwilling ears. No maxim of law, it was said, is more established or more universally allowed, than that privilege of parliament extends not to treason, felony, or breach of peace; nor has either house, during former ages, ever pretended in any of those cases to interpose in behalf of its members. Though some inconvenience should result from the observance of this maxim; that would not be sufficient, without other authority, to abolish a principle established by uninterrupted precedent, and founded on the tacit consent of the whole legislature. But what are the inconveniences so much dreaded? The king, on pretence of treason, may seize any members of the opposite faction, and, for a time, gain to his partizans the majority of voices. But if he seize only a few; will he not lose more friends by such a gross artifice than he confines enemies? If he seize a great number; is not this expedient force, open and barefaced? And what remedy at all times against such force, but to oppose to it a force which is superior? Even allowing that the king intended to employ violence, not authority, for seizing the members; though at that time, and ever afterwards, he positively asserted the contrary; yet will his conduct admit of excuse. That the hall, where the parliament assembles, is an inviolable sanctuary, was never yet pretended. And if the commons complain of the affront offered them, by an attempt to arrest their members in their very presence; the blame must lie entirely on themselves, who had formerly refused compliance with the king's message, when he peaceably demanded these members. The sovereign is the great executor of the laws; and his presence was here legally employed, both in order to prevent opposition, and to protect the house against those insults which their disobedience had so well merited.

Such was the reasoning of the courtiers; but Charles knew to how little purpose he should urge these reasons against the present fury of the commons. He proposed, therefore, by a message, that they would agree upon a legal method, by which he might carry on his prosecution against the members, lest farther misunderstandings happen with regard to privilege. They desired him to lay the grounds of accusation before the house; and said that they must first judge whether it were proper to give up their members to a trial. The king then informed them, that he would wave for the present all prosecution: by successive messages, he afterwards offered a pardon to the members; offered to concur in any law that should acquit or secure them; offered any reparation to the house for the breach of privilege, of which, he acknowledged, they had reason to complain. It cannot be supposed, from the tyrannical disposition of Charles, that he would have made these concessions if he had not known that he had been guilty of a fault. They were resolved to accept of no satisfaction, unless he would discover his advisers in that illegal measure: a condition to which, they knew, that, without rendering himself for ever vile and contemptible, he could not possibly submit. Meanwhile, they continued to inveigh against the violation of parliamentary privileges, and, by their violent outcries, to inflame the whole nation. The secret reason of their displeasure, however obvious, they carefully concealed. In the king's accusation of the members, they plainly saw his judgement of the late parliamentary proceedings; and every adherent of of the popular party dreaded the same fate, should royal authority be re-established according to his ideas. By the most unhappy conduct, Charles, while he extremely augmented in his opponents the will, had also increased the ability of hurting him.

To shew how greatly the people were displeased at the manner in which Charles had acted, petitions were sent from most parts of the kingdom. A petition from the county of Buckingham was presented to the house by six thousand subscribers, who promised to live and die in defence of the privileges of parliament. The city of London, the county of Essex, those of Hertford, Surrey, Berks, imitated the example. A petition from the apprentices was graciously received. Nay, one was presented from the porters; whose numbers amounted, as they said, to fifteen thousand. The address of that great body contained the same articles with all the others; the privileges of parliament, the danger of religion, the rebellion of Ireland, the decay of trade. The porters farther desired, that justice might be done upon offenders, as the atrociousness of their crimes had deserved. And they added, "That if such remedies were any longer suspended, they should be forced to extremities not fit to be named, and make good the saying, "That necessity has no law."

Another petition was presented by several poor people, in the name of many thousands more; in which the petitioners proposed as a remedy for the public miseries, "That those noble worthies of the house of peers, who concur with the happy votes of the commons, may separate themselves from the rest, and sit and vote as one entire body." The commons gave thanks for this petition.

The very women imitated the example of the men. A brewer's wife, followed by many thousands of her sex, brought a petition to the house; in which the petitioners expressed their terror of the Papists and prelates, and their dread of like massacres, rapes, and outrages, with those which had been committed upon their sex in Ireland. They had been necessitated, they said, to imitate the example of the women of Tekoah: and they claimed equal right with the men, of declaring, by petition, their sense of the public cause; because Christ had purchased them at as dear a rate, and in the free enjoyment of Christ consists equally the happiness of both sexes. Pym came to the door of the house; and having told the female zealots, that their petition was thankfully accepted, and was presented in a seasonable time, he begged that their prayers for the success of the commons might follow their petition.

In the mean time, not only all petitions, which favoured the church or monarchy, from whatever hand they came, were discouraged; but the petitioners were sent for, imprisoned, and prosecuted as delinquents; and this unequal conduct was openly avowed and justified. Whoever desire a change, it was said, must express their sentiments; for how, otherwise, shall they be known? But those who favour the established government in church or state, should not petition; because they already enjoy what they wish for.

The king had possessed a great party in the lower house, as appeared in the vote for the remonstrance; and this party, had every new cause of disgust been carefully avoided, would soon have become the majority; from the odium attending the violent measures embraced by the popular leaders. A great majority he always possessed in the house of peers, even after the bishops were put in confinement; and this majority could not have been overcome, but by outrages which, in the end, would have drawn disgrace and ruin on those who incited them. By the present fury of the people, as by an inundation, were all these obstacles swept away, and every rampart of royal authority laid level with the ground. The victory was pursued with impetuosity by the sagacious commons, who knew the importance of a favourable moment in all popular commotions. The terror of their authority they extended over the whole nation; and all opposition, and even all blame vented in private conversation, were treated as the most atrocious crimes by these severe inquisitors. Scarcely was it permitted to find fault with the conduct of any particular member, if he made a figure in the house; and reflections thrown out on Pym, were at this time treated as breaches of privilege. The populace without doors were ready to execute, from the least hint, the will of their leaders; nor was it safe for any member to approach either house, who pretended to control or oppose the general torrent. After so undisguised a manner was this affair conducted, that Hollis, in a speech to the peers, desired to know the names of such members as should vote contrary to the sentiments of the commons: and Pym said in the lower house, that the people must not be restrained in the expressions of their just desires.

By the flight, or terror, or despondency of the king's party, an undisputed majority remained every where to their opponents; and the bills sent up by the commons, which had hitherto stopped with the peers, now passed, and were presented for the royal assent. These were, the pressing bill with its preamble, and the bill against the votes of the bishops in parliament. The king's authority was at that time reduced to the lowest ebb. The queen too, being secretly threatened with an impeachment, and finding no resource in her husband's protection, was preparing to retire into Holland. The rage of the people was, on account of her religion, as well as on account of her intriguing disposition, universally levelled against her. The commons, in their fury against priests of the Roman Catholic persuasion, had seized her very confessor; nor would they release him upon her repeated applications; because it was averred he had been a party in instigating the massacres in Ireland. Even a visit of the prince to his mother had been openly complained of, and remonstrances against it had been presented to her. Apprehensive of attacks still more violent, she was desirous of facilitating her escape; and she prevailed with the king to pass these bills, in hopes of appeasing for a time the rage of the multitude.

These concessions, however important, the king immediately found to have no other effect, than had all the preceding ones: they were made the foundation of demands still more exorbitant; for the commons believed that he could now refuse them nothing. And they regarded the least moment of relaxation, in their invasion of royal authority, as highly impolitic, during the uninterrupted torrent of their successes. The moment the commons were informed of these last acquisitions they opened some intercepted letters written to her by lord Digby: they carried up an impeachment against Herbert, attorney-general, for obeying the king's commands in accusing their members. And they prosecuted with fresh vigour, their plan of the militia, on which they rested all future hopes of an uncontrolled authority.

The commons were sensible that monarchical government, which, during so many ages, had been established in England, would soon regain some degree of its former dignity, after the present tempest was overblown; nor would all the new-invented limitations be able totally to suppress an authority, to which the nation had hitherto been accustomed. The sword alone, to which all human ordinances must submit, could guard their acquired power, and fully ensure to them personal safety against the rising indignation of the king. A large magazine of arms had been placed in the town of Hull, and the commons dispatched thither sir John Hotham, a gentleman of considerable fortune in the neighbourhood, and of an ancient family, whom they made governor. They sent orders to Goring, governor of Portsmouth, to obey no commands but such as he should receive from the parliament. They obliged the king to displace Lunsford, whom he had appointed governor of the Tower, and solicited him to displace sir John Biron, whom he had put in his place, and afterwards requested him to bestow that command on sir John Conyers, in whom alone, they said, they could repose confidence. After making a fruitless attempt, in which the peers refused their concurrence, to give public warning, that the people should put themselves in a posture of defence against the enterprizes of Papists and other ill-affected persons, they now resolved, by a bold and decisive stroke, to seize at once the whole power of the sword, and to confer it entirely on their own partizans.

The severe votes passed in the beginning of this parliament against lieutenants and their deputies, had totally disarmed the crown, and had not left in any magistrate military authority sufficient for the defence and security of the nation. To remedy this inconvenience now appeared necessary. A bill was introduced and passed the two houses, which restored to lieutenants and deputies the same powers of which the votes of the commons had bereaved them; but at the same time the names of all the lieutenants were inserted in the bill; and these consisted entirely of men in whom the parliament could confide. And for their conduct, they were accountable, by the express terms of the bill, not to the king, but to the parliament.

The policy pursued by the commons, and which had hitherto succeeded to admiration, was to astonish the king by by the boldness of their enterprizes, and to make him sensible in what little estimation they held both his person and his dignity. To a bill so destructive of royal authority, they prefixed the following preamble: "Whereas there has been of late a most dangerous and desperate design upon the house of commons, which we have just cause to believe an effect of the bloody counsels of Papists and other ill-affected persons, who have already raised a rebellion in the kingdom of Ireland. And whereas, by reason of many discoveries, we cannot but fear they will proceed, not only to stir up the like rebellions and insurrections in this kingdom of England; but also to back them with forces from abroad, &c."

Charles, having determined upon rigorous measures, did not absolutely refuse, but delayed to sanction the bill. When the demand for his giving the royal assent was made, he was at Dover, attending the queen and the princess of Orange, in their embarkation. He replied, that he had not now leisure to consider a matter of so great importance, and must therefore respite his answer till his return. The parliament dispatched another message to him, on the 22nd of February, with solicitations still more importunate. They expressed their great grief on account of his majesty's answer to their just and necessary petition. They represented, that any delay, during dangers and distractions so great and pressing, was not less unsatisfactory and destructive than an absolute denial. They insisted, that it was their duty to see put in execution a measure so necessary for public safety. And they affirmed, on the 28th, that the people, in many counties, had applied to them for that purpose, and, in some places, were, of themselves, and by their own authority, providing against those urgent dangers with which they were threatened.

Even after this insolence, the king durst not venture upon a flat denial. Besides excepting to the preamble, which threw such dishonour upon him, and protesting the innocence of his intentions when he entered the house of commons; he only desired that the military authority, if it were defective, should first be conferred upon the crown; and he promised to bestow commissions, but such as should be revocable at pleasure, on the same persons whom the parliament had named in the bill. By a former message he had expressed his wishes, that they would lay before him, in one view, all the concessions which they deemed requisite for the settlement of the nation. They answered, that they were exposed to perils so dreadful and imminent, that they had not leisure for such a work. The expedient proposed by the king seemed a plausible remedy during this emergence; but yet it maintained the prerogatives of the crown entire and unbroken.

But the intentions of the commons were wide of this purpose, and their panics could be cured by one remedy alone. They replied, that the dangers and distempers of the nation were such as could endure no longer delay; and, unless the king speedily complied with their demands, they should be constrained, for the safety of prince and people, to dispose of the militia by the authority of both houses, and were resolved to do it accordingly. They asserted, that those parts of the kingdom which had, from their own authority, put themselves in a posture of defence during these prevailing fears and jealousies, had acted suitably to the declarations and directions of both houses, and conformably to the laws of the kingdom. And while they thus menaced the king with their power, they invited him to fix his residence at London, where they knew he would be entirely at their mercy.

"I am so much amazed at this message," said the king in his reply, "that I know not what to answer. You speak of jealousies and fears! lay your hands on your hearts, and ask yourselves, whether I may not likewise be disturbed with fears and jealousies: and if so, I assure you that this message has nothing lessened them. As to the militia, I thought so much of it before I gave that answer, and am so much assured that the answer is agreeable to what in justice or reason you can ask, or I in honour grant, that I shall not alter it in any point. For my residence near you, I wish it might be safe and honourable, and that I had no cause to absent myself from Whitehall: ask yourselves whether I have not. What would you have? Have I violated your laws? Have I denied to pass any bill for the ease and security of my subjects? I do not ask what you have done for me. Have any of my people been transported with fears and apprehensions? I offer as free and general a pardon as yourselves can devise. All this considered, there is a judgement of Heaven upon this nation if these distractions continue.

"God so deal with me and mine as all my thoughts and intentions are upright for the maintenance of the true Protestant profession, and for the observance and preservation of the laws; and I hope God will bless and assist those laws for my preservation."

No sooner did the commons despair of obtaining the king's consent to their bill, than they voted, that those who advised his majesty's answer were enemies to the state, and mischievous projectors against the safety of the nation; that this denial is of such dangerous consequence, that if his majesty persist in it, it will hazard the peace and tranquillity of all his kingdoms, unless some speedy remedy be applied by the wisdom and authority of both houses; and that such of the subjects as have put themselves in a posture of defence against the common danger, have done nothing but what is justifiable, and approved by the house.

Lest the people might be averse to the seconding of all the plan of the parliament, they were plied anew with rumours of danger, with the terrors of invasion, with the dread of the English and Irish Papists; and the most unaccountable panics were spread throughout the nation. Lord Digby having entered Kingston in a coach and six, attended by a few livery servants, the intelligence was conveyed to London; and it was immediately voted, that he had appeared in a hostile manner, to the terror and affright of his majesty's subjects, and levied war against the king and kingdom. Petitions from all quarters loudly demanded of the parliament to put the nation in a posture of defence; and the county of Stafford, in particular, expressed such dread of an insurrection among the Papists, that every man, they said, was constrained to stand upon his guard, not even daring to go to church unarmed.

Charles now resolved to remove farther from London; and accordingly, taking the prince of Wales and the duke of York along with him, he arrived, by slow journies, at York, which he determined for some time to make the place of his residence. The distant parts of the kingdom, being removed from that furious vortex of new principles and opinions which had transported the capital, still retained some regard for the church and monarchy; and the king here found marks of attachment beyond what he had before expected. Some of the nobility and gentry, the partizans of the court, either personally, or by messages and letters, expressed their duty towards him; and exhorted him to save himself and them from that ignominious slavery with which they were threatened.

Charles, finding himself supported by some of the nobility, began to speak in a firmer tone, and to retort the accusations of the commons with a vigour which he had not before exerted. Notwithstanding their remonstrances, he still persisted in refusing their bill; and they proceeded to frame an ordinance, in which, by the authority of the two houses, without the king's consent, they named lieutenants for all the counties, and conferred on them the command of the whole military force, of all the guards, garrisons, and forts of the kingdom. He issued proclamations against this manifest usurpation: and, as he professed a resolution strictly to observe the law himself, so was he determined, he said, to oblige every other person to pay it a like obedience. The name of the king was so essential to all laws, and so familiar in all acts of executive authority, that the parliament was afraid, had they totally omitted it, that the innovation would be too sensible to the people. In all commands, therefore, which they conferred, they bound the persons to obey the orders of his majesty, signified by both houses of parliament. And, making a distinction between the office and the person of the king; those very forces which they employed against him, they levied in his name, and by his authority.

It is remarkable how much the topics of argument were now reversed between the parties. The king, while he acknowledged his former error, of employing a plea of necessity, in order to infringe the laws and constitution, warned the parliament not to imitate an example on which they threw such violent blame; and the parliament, while they clothed their personal fears or ambition under the appearance of national and imminent danger, made unknowingly an apology for the most exceptionable part of the king's conduct. That the liberties of the people were no longer exposed to any peril from royal authority, so narrowly circumscribed, so exactly defined, so much unsupported by revenue and by military power, might be maintained upon very plausible topics: but that the danger was not of that kind, which dissolves all law, and levels all limitations, seems apparent from the simplest view of these transactions. So obvious indeed was the king's present inability to invade the constitution, that the fears and jealousies which operated on the people, and pushed them so furiously to arms, were undoubtedly not of a civil, but of a religious nature. The imaginations of men were agitated with a continual dread of popery, with a horror against prelacy, with an antipathy to ceremonies and the liturgy, and with a violent affection for whatever was most opposite to these objects of aversion. The religious spirit of the people being now let loose, confounded all regard to ease, safety, interest; and dissolved every moral and civil obligation.

Each of the parties seemed now willing to throw on its antagonist the odium of commencing a civil war; but both of them prepared for an event which they deemed inevitable. To gain the people's favour and good opinion, was the chief point on both sides. Never was there a people less corrupted by vice, and more actuated by principle, than the English during that period; never were there individuals who possessed more capacity, more courage, more public spirit, more disinterested zeal. The infusion of one ingredient, in too large a proportion, had corrupted all these noble principles, and converted them into the most virulent poison. To determine his choice in the approaching contests, every man hearkened with avidity to the reasons proposed on both sides. The war of the pen preceded that of the sword, and daily sharpened the humours of the opposite parties. Besides private adventurers without number, the king and parliament themselves carried on the controversy, by messages, remonstrances, and declarations; where the nation was really the party to whom all arguments were addressed.

To clear up the principles of the constitution, to mark the boundaries of the powers entrusted by law to the several members, to show what great improvements the whole political system had received from the king's late concessions, to demonstrate his confidence in his people, and his reliance on their affections, to point out the ungrateful returns which had been made him, and the enormous encroachments, insults, and indignities, to which he had been exposed; these were the topics which were insisted on in the king's declarations and remonstrances.

Though these writings were of consequence, and operated powerfully on the minds of some men to favour Charles, it was evident that they would not be decisive, and that keener weapons must determine the controversy. To the ordinance of the parliament concerning the militia, the king opposed his commissions of array. The counties obeyed the one or the other, according as they stood affected. And in many counties, where the people were divided, mobbish combats and skirmishes ensued. The parliament, on this occasion, voted, "That when the lords and commons in parliament, which is the supreme court of judicature, shall declare what the law of the land is, to have this not only questioned, but contradicted, is a high breach of their privileges." This was a plain assuming of the whole legislative authority, and exerting it in the most material article, the government of the militia. Upon the same principles, they pretended, by a verbal criticism on the tense of a Latin verb, to ravish from the king his negative voice in the legislature (l).

The magazine of Hull contained the arms of all the forces levied against the Scots; and sir John Hotham, the governor, though he had accepted of a commission from the parliament, was not thought so much disaffected to the church and monarchy. Charles, therefore, entertained hopes, that, if he presented himself at Hull before the commencement of hostilities, Hotham, overawed by his presence, would admit him with his retinue; after which he might easily render himself master of the place. But the governor was on his guard. He shut the gates, and refused to receive the king, who desired leave to enter with twenty persons only. Charles immediately proclaimed him traitor, and complained to the parliament of his disobedience. The parliament avowed and justified the action (m).

The county of York levied a guard for the king of six hundred men. The two houses, though they had already levied a guard for themselves; had attempted to seize all the military power, all the navy, and all the forts of the kingdom; and had openly employed their authority in every kind of warlike preparations; yet immediately voted, "That the king, seduced by wicked counsel, intended to make war against his parliament, who, in all their consultations and actions, had proposed no other end, but the care of his kingdoms, and the performance of all duty and loyalty to his person; that this attempt was a breach of the trust reposed in him by his people, contrary to his oath, and tending to a dissolution of the government; and that whoever should assist him in such a war, were traitors by the fundamental laws of the kingdom (n)."

The armies, which had been every-where raised on pretence of the service in Ireland, were henceforth more openly inlisted by the parliament for their own purposes, and the command of them was given to the earl of Essex. In London no less than four thousand men inlisted in one day. And the parliament voted a declaration, which they required every member to subscribe, that they would live and die with their general.

On the 10th of June, they issued orders for bringing in loans of money and plate, in order to maintain forces which should defend the king and both houses of parliament: for this style they still preserved. Within ten days, vast quantities of plate were brought to their treasurers. Scarcely were there men enough to receive it, or room sufficient to stow it; and many, with regret, were obliged to carry back their offerings, and wait till the treasurers could find leisure to receive them. Such zeal animated the pious partizans of the parliament, especially in the city! The women gave up all the plate and ornaments of their houses, and even their silver thimbles and bodkins, in order to support the good cause against the malignants.

In the mean time the splendour of the nobility, with which the king was environed, much eclipsed the appearance at Westminster. Lord-keeper Littleton, after sending the great seal before him, had fled to York. Above forty peers of the first rank attended the king; while the house of lords seldom consisted of more than sixteen members. Many members of the lower house also absented themselves from counsels which they deemed so full of danger. The commons sent up an impeachment against nine peers, for deserting their duty in parliament. Their own members also, who should return to them, they voted not to admit, till satisfied concerning the reason of their absence.

Charles made a declaration to the peers who attended him, that he expected from them no obedience to any commands which were not warranted by the laws of the land. The peers answered this declaration by a protest, in which they declared their resolution to obey no commands but such as were warranted by that authority. By these deliberate engagements, so worthy of an English prince and English nobility, had they been sincere, they meant to confound the furious and tumultuary resolutions taken by the parliament.

The queen, disposing of the crown-jewels in Holland, had been enabled to purchase a cargo of arms and ammunition. Part of these, after escaping many perils, arrived safely to the king. His preparations were not near so forward as those of the parliament; but the urgent necessity of his situation no longer admitted of delay. He now prepared himself for defence.

That the king might despair of all composition, the parliament sent him the conditions on which they were willing to come to an agreement. Their demands, contained in nineteen propositions, amounted to a total abolition of monarchical authority. They required, that no man should remain in the council, who was not agreeable to parliament; that no deed of the king's should have validity, unless it passed the council, and was attested under their hand; that all the officers of state and principal judges should be chosen with consent of parliament, and enjoy their offices for life; that none of the royal family should marry without consent of parliament or council; that the laws should be executed against Catholics; that the votes of popish lords should be excluded; that the reformation of the liturgy and church-government should have place, (l) The king, by his coronation oath, promises that he would maintain the laws and customs which the people had chosen, quas vulgus elegerit: The parliament pretended that elegerit meant shall chuse; and consequently, that the king had no right to refuse any bills which should be presented him. according to the advice of parliament; that the ordinance, with regard to the militia, be submitted to; that the justice of parliament pass upon all delinquents; that a general pardon be granted, with such exceptions as should be advised by parliament; that the forts and castles be disposed of by consent of parliament; and that no peer be made but with consent of both houses (o).

"Should I grant these demands," said the king in reply, "I may be waited on bareheaded; I may have my hand kissed; the title of majesty may be continued to me; and The King's Authority, signified by both houses, may still be the style of your commands; I may have swords and maces carried before me, and please myself with the sight of a crown and sceptre, though even these twigs would not long flourish, when the stock upon which they grew was dead: but as to true and real power, I should remain but the outside, but the picture, but the sign of a king (p)." War on any terms was esteemed, by the king and all his counsellors, preferable to so ignominious a peace. Charles accordingly resolved to support his authority by arms. "His towns," he said, "were taken from him, his ships, his arms, his money; but there still remained to him a good cause, and the hearts of his loyal subjects, which, with God's blessing, he doubted not, would recover all the rest." Collecting therefore some forces, he advanced southwards; and at Nottingham he erected his royal standard, the open signal of discord and civil war throughout the kingdom (q).

When two names, so sacred in the English constitution as those of KING and PARLIAMENT, were placed in opposition; we need not wonder that the people were divided in their choice, and were agitated with the most violent animosities and factions. Many of the nobility and more considerable gentry, dreading a total confusion of rank from the fury of the populace, enlisted themselves in defence of the monarch, from whom they received, and to whom they communicated, their lustre. Animated with the spirit of royalty, derived from their ancestors, they adhered to the ancient principles of the constitution, and valued themselves on exerting the maxims, as well as inheriting the possessions, of the old English families. And while they passed their time mostly at their country-seats, they were surprized to hear of opinions prevailing, with which they had ever been unacquainted, and which implied not a limitation, but an abolition almost total, of monarchical authority.

The city of London, on the other hand, and most of the great corporations, took part with the parliament, and adopted with zeal those democratical principles on which the pretensions of that assembly were founded. The government of cities, which even under absolute monarchies is commonly republican, inclined them to this party: the small hereditary influence, which can be retained over the industrious inhabitants of towns; the natural independence of citizens; and the force of popular currents over those more numerous associations of mankind; all these causes gave, there, authority to the principles of liberty which were propagated throughout the nation. Many families too, which had lately been enriched by commerce, saw with indignation, that, notwithstanding their opulence, they could not raise themselves to a level with the gentry: they therefore adhered to a power, by whose success they hoped to acquire rank and consideration. And the new splendour and glory of the Dutch commonwealth, whose liberty so happily supported industry, and where all men had equal rights, made the commercial part of the nation desire to see a like form of government established in this country.

The genius of the two religions, so closely at this time interwoven with politics, corresponded exactly to these divisions. The church government of the Presbyterian religion was republican, and suited to the genius of the populace: the established church had an air of greater show and ornament, and by its approximation in many instances to the church of Rome, bore an affinity to the kingly and aristocratical parts of the constitution. The devotees of Presbytery became of course zealous partizans of the parliament (r): the friends of the episcopal church valued themselves on defending the rights of monarchy. Some men also there were of liberal education who, being either careless or ignorant of those disputes bandied about by the clergy of both sides, aspired to nothing but an easy enjoyment of life, amidst the jovial entertainment and social intercourse of their companions. Many of these flocked to the kings's standard, where they breathed a freer air, and were exempted from that austerity which reigned among the parliamentary party.

Never was a quarrel more unequal than seemed at first that between the contending parties: almost every advantage lay against the royal cause. The king's revenue had been seized, from the beginning by the parliament, who issued out to him, from time to time, small sums for his present subsistence; and so soon as he withdrew to York, (as might have been expected,) they stopped all payments. London and all the sea-ports, except Newcastle, being in their hands, the customs yielded them a certain and considerable supply of money; and all contributions, loans, and impositions, were more easily raised from the cities which possessed the ready money, and where men lived under their inspection, than they could be levied by the king in those open countries, which after some time declared for him.

The seamen naturally followed the disposition of the sea-ports to which they belonged: and the earl of Northumberland, lord admiral, having embraced the side of the parliament, had appointed, at their desire, the earl of Warwick to be his lieutenant, who at once established his authority in the fleet, and kept the entire dominion of the sea in the hands of that assembly. All the magazines of arms and ammunition were from the first seized by the parliament; and their fleet intercepted the greater part of those which were sent by the queen from Holland. The king was obliged, in order to arm his followers, to borrow the weapons of the train-bands, under promise of restoring them so soon as peace should be settled in the kingdom.

The veneration for parliaments was at this time extreme throughout the nation. The custom of reviling those assemblies for corruption, as it had no pretence, so was it unknown, during all former ages. Few or no instances of their encroaching ambition had hitherto been observed: the reason of which was, because the sovereigns had hitherto acted rather arbitrarily, and compelled them to pass laws, which, in more favourable times, they would have refused. Witness the behaviour of Henry VIII. Elizabeth, James I. and even Charles himself. Men now considered the house of commons in no other light than as the representatives of the nation, whose interest was the same with that of the public, who were the eternal guardians of law and liberty, and whom no motive, but the necessary defence of the people, could ever engage in an opposition to the nation. The torrent, therefore, of general affection ran to the parliament. What is the great advantage of popularity, the privilege of affixing epithets, fell of course to that party. The king's adherents were the Wicked and the Malignant: their adversaries were the Godly and the Well-affected (s). And as the force of the cities was more united than that of the country, and at once gave shelter and protection to the parliamentary party, who could easily suppress the royalists in their neighbourhood, almost the whole kingdom, at the commencement of the war, seemed to be in the hands of the parliament.

What alone gave the king some compensation for all the advantages possessed by his adversaries, was the nature and qualities of his adherents. More bravery and activity were hoped for, from the generous spirit of the nobles and gentry, than from the disposition of the multitude. And as the men of estates, at their own expence, levied and armed their tenants, besides an attachment to their masters, greater force and courage were to be expected in these rustic troops, than in the vicious and enervated populace of cities.

The neighbouring states of Europe, being engaged in violent wars, little interested themselves in these civil commotions; and this island enjoyed the singular advantage (for such it surely was) of fighting out its own quarrels without the interposition of foreigners. France, from policy, had fomented the first disorders in Scotland; had sent over arms to the Irish rebels; and continued to give countenance to the English parliament: Spain, from bi-

(q) By acting in this manner the king declared war against the parliament, not the parliament against the king.
(r) To the Presbyterians must be added the Independents, who being republicans, in the strict sense of the word, in their religious principles, were, of course, republicans in their political notions.

gotry,

gotry, furnished the Irish with some supplies of money and arms. The prince of Orange, closely allied to the crown, encouraged English officers, who served in the Low Countries, to enlist in the king's army: the Scottish officers, who had been formed in Germany, and in the late commotions, chiefly took part with the parliament.

The parliament entertained the most complete contempt for the king's party; and many believed that he never would attempt resistance, but must soon yield to the pretensions of the two houses. Even after the king's standard was erected, men could not be brought to apprehend the danger of a civil war; nor was it imagined that he would have the imprudence to enrage his implacable enemies, and render his own condition more desperate, by opposing a force which was superior to his own. The low condition in which he appeared at Nottingham confirmed all these hopes. His artillery, though far from numerous, had been left at York, for want of horses to transport it. Besides the trained bands of the county, raised by sir John Digby, the sheriff, he had not gotten together above three hundred infantry. His cavalry, in which consisted his chief strength, exceeded not eight hundred, and were very ill provided with arms. The forces of the parliament lay at Northampton, within a few days march of him; and consisted of above six thousand men, well armed and well appointed. Had these troops advanced upon him, they must soon have dissipated the small force which he had assembled. By pursuing him in his retreat, they had so discredited his cause, and discouraged his adherents, as to have for ever prevented his collecting an army able to make head against them. But the earl of Essex, the parliamentary general, had not yet received any orders from his masters. What rendered them so backward, after such precipitate steps as they had before taken, is not easily explained; unless it be, that they imagined the king would of his own accord disband his soldiers, and make peace with them; or else, that the royalists, sensible of their feeble condition, and convinced of their slender resources, would disperse of themselves, and leave their adversaries a victory, so much the more complete and secure, as it would be gained without the appearance of force, and without the effusion of blood. Perhaps too, when it became necessary to make the concluding step, their scruples and apprehensions, though not sufficient to overcome their resolutions, were able to retard the execution of them.

Sir Jacob Astley, whom the king had appointed major-general of his intended army, told him, that he could not give him assurance but he might be taken out of his bed, if the rebels should make a brisk attempt to that purpose. All the king's attendants were full of well-grounded apprehensions. Some of the lords having desired that a message might be sent to the parliament, with overtures to a treaty, Charles, who well knew that an accommodation, in his present condition, meant nothing but a total submission, hastily broke up the council, lest this proposal should be farther insisted on. But next day, the earl of Southampton, whom no one could suspect of base or timid sentiments, having offered the same advice in council, it was hearkened to with more coolness and deliberation. He urged, that though such a step would probably increase the insolence of the parliament, this was so far from being an objection, that such dispositions must necessarily turn to the advantage of the royal cause: that if they refused to treat, which was more probable, the very sound of peace was so popular, that nothing could more disgust the nation than such haughty severity: that if they admitted of a treaty, their proposals, considering their present situation, would be so exorbitant, as to open the eyes of their most partial adherents, and turn the general favour to the king's party: and that, at worst, time might be gained by this expedient, and a delay of the imminent danger with which the king was at present threatened.

Charles, on assembling the council, had declared against all advances towards an accommodation; and had said, that, having now nothing left him but his honour, this last possession he was resolved steadily to preserve, and rather to perish than yield any farther to the pretensions of his enemies. But, by the unanimous desire of the counsellors, he was prevailed on to embrace Southampton's advice. That nobleman, therefore, with sir John Colepeper and sir William Uvedale, was dispatched to London, with offers of a treaty. The manner in which they were received gave little hopes of success. Southampton was not allowed by the peers to take his seat; but was ordered to deliver his message to the usher, and immediately to depart the city: the commons showed little better disposition towards Colepeper and Uvedale. Both houses replied, that they could admit of no treaty with the king, till he took down his standard, and recalled his proclamations, in which the parliament supposed themselves to be declared traitors. The king, by a second message, denied any such intention against the two houses; but offered to recal these proclamations, provided the parliament agreed to recal theirs, in which his adherents were declared traitors. They desired him, in return, to dismiss his forces, to reside with his parliament, and to give up delinquents to justice. Both parties flattered themselves, that, by these messages and replies, they had gained the ends which they proposed. The king believed that the people were made sufficiently sensible of the parliament's aversion to peace: the parliament intended, by this vigour in their resolutions, to support the vigour of their military operations.

The courage of the parliament was increased, besides their great superiority of force, by two recent events, which had happened in their favour. Goring was governor of Portsmouth, the best fortified town in the kingdom, and, by its situation, of great importance. This man seemed to have rendered himself an implacable enemy to the king, by betraying, probably magnifying, the secret cabals of the army; and the parliament thought that his fidelity to them might, on that account, be entirely depended on. But the same levity of mind still attended him, and the same disregard to engagements and professions. He took underhand his measures with the court, and declared against the parliament. But, though he had been sufficiently supplied with money, and long before knew his danger, so small was his foresight, that he had left the place entirely destitute of provisions, and in a few days he was obliged to surrender to the parliamentary forces.

The marquis of Hertford was a nobleman of the greatest quality and character in the kingdom, and, equally with the king, descended, by a female, from Henry VII. During the reign of James, he had attempted, without having obtained the consent of that monarch, to marry Arabella Stuart, a lady nearly related to the crown; and, upon discovery of his intentions, had been obliged, for some time, to fly the kingdom. Ever after, he was looked on with an evil eye at court, from which, in a great measure, he withdrew; and living in an independent manner, he addicted himself entirely to literary occupations and amusements. In proportion as the king declined in popularity, Hertford's character flourished with the people; and when this parliament assembled, no nobleman possessed more general favour and authority. By his sagacity, he soon perceived, that the commons, not content with correcting the abuses of government, were carried, by the natural current of power and popularity, into the opposite extreme, and were committing violations, no less dangerous than the former, upon the English constitution. Immediately he devoted himself to the support of the king's falling authority, and was prevailed with to be governor to the young prince, and reside at court, to which, in the eyes of all men, he gave, by his presence, a new lustre and authority. So high was his character for mildness and humanity, that he still preserved, by means of these popular virtues, the public favour; and notwithstanding his habits of ease and study, he now exerted himself in raising an army for the king; and being named general of the western counties, where his interest chiefly lay, he began to assemble forces in Somersetshire. By the assistance of lord Seymour, lord Paulet, John Digby, son of the earl of Bristol, sir Francis Hawley, and others, he had drawn together some appearance of an army; when the parliament, apprehensive of the danger, sent the earl of Bedford with a considerable force against him. On his approach, Hertford was obliged to retire into Sherborne castle; and, finding that place untenable, he passed over into Wales, leaving sir Ralph Hopton, sir John Berkeley, Digby, and other officers, with their horse, consisting of about a hundred and twenty, to march into Cornwall, in hopes of finding that county better prepared for their reception.

All the dispersed bodies of the parliamentary army were now ordered to march to Northampton; and the earl of Essex, who had joined them, found the whole amount to fifteen thousand men. The king, though his camp had been gradually reinforced from all quarters, was sensible that that he had no army which could cope with so formidable a force; and he thought it prudent, by slow marches, to retire to Derby, thence to Shrewsbury, in order to countenance the levies which his friends were making in those parts. At Wellington, a day's march from Shrewsbury, he made a rendezvous of all his forces, and caused his military orders to be read at the head of every regiment. That he might bind himself by reciprocal ties, he solemnly made the following declaration before his whole army:

"I do promise, in the presence of Almighty God, and as I hope for his blessing and protection, that I will, to the utmost of my power, defend and maintain the true reformed Protestant religion, established in the church of England, and, by the grace of God, in the same will live and die.

"I desire that the laws may ever be the measure of my government, and that the liberty and property of the subject may be preserved by them with the same care as my own just rights. And if it please God, by his blessing on this army, raised for my necessary defence, to preserve me from the present rebellion, I do solemnly and faithfully promise, in the sight of God, to maintain the just privileges and freedom of parliament, and to govern, to the utmost of my power, by the known statutes and customs of the kingdom, and particularly to observe inviolably the laws to which I have given my consent this parliament. Meanwhile, if this emergence, and the great necessity to which I am driven, beget any violation of law, I hope it shall be imputed by God and man to the authors of this war; not to me, who have so earnestly laboured to preserve the peace of the kingdom.

"When I willingly fail in these particulars, I shall expect no aid or relief from man, nor any protection from above: but in this resolution I hope for the cheerful assistance of all good men, and am confident of the blessing of Heaven."

Though the concurrence of the church increased the king's adherents, it may safely be affirmed, that the high monarchical doctrines, so much inculcated by the clergy, had never done him any real service. The bulk of that generous train of nobility and gentry who now attended the king in his distresses, breathed the spirit of liberty, as well as of loyalty; and in the hopes alone of his submitting to a legal and limited government, were they willing, in his defence, to sacrifice their lives and fortunes.

While the king's army lay at Shrewsbury, and he was employing himself in collecting money, which he received, though in no great quantities, by voluntary contributions, and by the plate of the universities, which was sent him, the news arrived of an action, the first which had happened in these wars, and where he was successful.

On the appearance of commotions in England, the princes Rupert and Maurice, sons of the unfortunate Palatine, had offered their services to the king; and the former, at that time, commanded a body of horse, which had been sent to Worcester, in order to watch the motions of Essex, who was marching towards that city. No sooner had the prince arrived, than he saw some cavalry of the enemy approaching the gates. Without delay, he briskly attacked them, as they were defiling from a lane, and forming themselves. Colonel Sandys, who led them, and who fought with valour, being mortally wounded, fell from his horse. The whole party was routed, and pursued above a mile; but the prince, hearing of Essex's approach, returned to the main body. This rencounter raised the reputation of the royalists, and acquired to prince Rupert the character of promptitude and courage; qualities which he eminently displayed during the whole course of the war.

The king, on mustering his army, found it amount to ten thousand men. The earl of Lindesey, who in his youth had sought experience of military service in the Low Countries, was general: Prince Rupert commanded the horse: sir Jacob Astley, the foot: sir Arthur Aston, the dragoons: sir John Heydon, the artillery. Lord Bernard Stuart was at the head of a troop of guards (t). Their servants, under the command of sir William Killigrew, made another troop, and always marched with their masters.

With this army the king left Shrewsbury, on the 12th of October, resolving to give battle as soon as possible to the army of the parliament, which, he heard was continually augmenting by supplies from London. In order to bring on an action, he directed his march towards the capital, which, he knew, the enemy would not abandon to him. Essex had now received his instructions. The import of them was, to present a most humble petition to the king, and to rescue him and the royal family from those desperate malignants, who had seized their persons. Two days after the departure of the royalists from Shrewsbury, he left Worcester. Though it be commonly easy in civil wars to get intelligence, the armies were within six miles of each other, ere either of the generals was acquainted with the approach of his enemy (u).

The royal army lay near Banbury: that of the parliament at Keinton, in the county of Warwick. Prince Rupert sent intelligence of the enemy's approach, on the 23rd of the same month. Though the day was far advanced, the king resolved upon the attack: Essex drew up his men to receive him. Sir Faithful Fortescue, who had levied a troop for the Irish wars, had been obliged to serve in the parliamentary army, and was now posted on the left wing, commanded by Ramsay, a Scotchman. No sooner did the king's army approach, than Fortescue, ordering his troop to discharge their pistols in the ground, put himself under the command of prince Rupert. Partly from this incident, partly from the furious shock made upon them by the prince; that whole wing of cavalry immediately fled, and were pursued for two miles. The right wing of the parliament's army had no better success. Chased from their ground by Wilmot and sir Arthur Aston, they also took to flight. The king's body of reserve, commanded by sir John Biron, judging, like raw soldiers, that all was over, and impatient to have some share in the action, heedlessly followed the chase, which their left wing had precipitately led them. Sir William Balfour, who commanded Essex's reserve, perceived the advantage: he wheeled about upon the king's infantry, now quite unfurnished of horse; and he made great havoc among them. Lindesey, the general, was mortally wounded, and taken prisoner. His son, endeavouring his rescue, fell likewise into the enemy's hands. Sir Edmund Verney, who carried the king's standard, was killed, and the standard taken; but it was afterwards recovered. In this situation, prince Rupert, on his return, found affairs. Every thing bore the appearance of a defeat, instead of a victory, with which he had hastily flattered himself. Some advised the king to leave the field; but he rejected their advice. The two armies faced each other for some time, and neither of them retained courage sufficient for a new attack. All night they lay under arms; and the next morning they found themselves in sight of each other. General, as well as soldier, on both sides, seemed averse to renew the battle. Essex first drew off, and retired to Warwick. The king returned to his former quarters. Five thousand men are said to have been found dead on the field of battle; and the loss of the two armies, as far as can be judged by the opposite accounts, was nearly equal. Such was the event of this first battle, fought at Keinton, or Edge-hill.

Some of Essex's horse, who had been driven off the field in the beginning of the action, flying to a great distance, carried news of a total defeat, and struck a mighty terror into the city and parliament. After a few days, a more just account arrived; and then the parliament pretended to a complete victory. The king also, on his part, was not wanting to display his advantages; though, except the taking of Banbury, a few days after, he had few marks of victory to boast of. He continued his march, and took possession of Oxford, the only town in his dominions which was altogether at his devotion.

After the royal army was recruited and refreshed, as the weather still continued favourable, it was again put in motion. A party of horse approached to Reading, of which Martin was appointed governor by the parliament. Both governor and garrison were seized with a panic, and fled with precipitation to London. The king, fondly supposing that every thing would now yield before him, advanced with his whole army to Reading. The parliament, who, instead of their expectations, that Charles would never be able to collect an army, had now the prospect of a civil war, bloody, and of uncertain event, were farther alarmed at the near approach of the royal army, while their own forces lay at a distance. They voted an address for a treaty. The king's nearer approach to Colebrook quickened their advances for peace. Northumberland and (t) The estates and revenue of this single troop, according to lord Clarendon's computation, were at least equal to those of all the members who, at the commencement of war, voted in both houses.

(u) Shrewsbury and Worcester, the places from which they set out, are not above twenty miles distant; yet had the two armies marched ten days in this mutual ignorance.

Pembroke, with three commoners, presented the address of both houses; in which they besought his majesty to appoint some convenient place where he might reside, till committees could attend him with proposals. The king named Windsor, and desired that their garrison might be removed, and his own troops admitted into that castle.

Essex, in the mean time advancing by hasty marches, had arrived at London. But neither the presence of his army, nor the precarious hopes of a treaty, retarded the king's approaches. Charles attacked at Brentford, two regiments quartered there, on the 30th of November, and after a sharp action beat them from that village, and took about five hundred prisoners. The parliament had sent orders to forbear all hostilities, and had expected the same from the king; though no stipulations to that purpose had been mentioned by their commissioners. Loud complaints were raised against this attack, as if it had been the most apparent perfidy, and breach of treaty. Inflamed with resentment, as well as anxious for its own safety, the city marched its trained bands in excellent order, and joined the army under Essex (v). After both armies had faced each other for some time, Charles drew off and retired to Reading, thence to Oxford.

While the principal armies on both sides were kept in inaction by the winter season, the king and parliament were employed in real preparations for war, and in seeming advances towards peace. By means of contributions or assessments, levied by the horse, Charles maintained his cavalry: by loans and voluntary presents, sent him from various parts of the kingdom, he supported his infantry; but the supplies were still very unequal to the necessities under which he laboured. The parliament had much greater resources for money; and had, by consequence, every military preparation in much greater order and abundance (w).

In the beginning of 1643, the king and parliament sent reciprocally their demands; and a treaty commenced, but without any cessation of hostilities, as had at first been proposed. The earl of Northumberland, and four members of the lower house, came to Oxford as commissioners. In this treaty the king perpetually insisted on the re-establishment of the crown in its legal powers, and on the restoration of his constitutional prerogative: the parliament still required new concessions, and a farther abridgement of regal authority, as a more effectual remedy to their fears and jealousies. Finding the king supported by more forces, and a greater party than they had ever looked for, they seemingly abated somewhat of those extravagant conditions which they had formerly claimed; but their demands were still too high for an equal treaty. Besides other articles, to which a complete victory alone could entitle them, they required the king in express terms utterly to abolish episcopacy; a demand which, before they had only insinuated: and they required, that all other ecclesiastical controversies should be determined by their assembly of divines. They insisted, that he should submit to the punishment of his most faithful adherents. And they desired him to acquiesce in their settlement of the militia, and to confer on their adherents the entire power of the sword. In answer to the king's proposal, that his magazines, towns, forts, and ships, should be restored to him, the parliament required, that they should be put into such hands as they could confide in: the nineteen propositions, which they formerly sent to the king, shewed their inclination to abolish monarchy: they only asked at present, the power of doing it. The conferences went no farther than the first demand on each side. The parliament, finding that there was no likelihood of coming to any agreement, suddenly recalled their commissioners.

A military enterprize which they had concerted early in the spring, was immediately undertaken. Reading, the king's garrison which lay nearest to London, was esteemed a place of considerable strength, in that age, when the art of attacking towns was not well understood in Europe, and was totally unknown in England. The earl of Essex sat down before this place with an army of eighteen thousand men, on the 15th of April, and carried on the siege by regular approaches. Sir Arthur Aston, the governor, being wounded, colonel Fielding succeeded to the command. In a little time the town was found to be no longer in a condition of defence; and though the king approached, with an intention of obliging Essex to raise the siege, the disposition of the parliamentary army was so strong, as to render the design impracticable. Fielding, therefore, was contented to yield the town, on the 27th of April, on condition that he should bring off the garrison with the honours of war, and deliver up deserters (x).

Essex's army had been fully supplied with all necessaries from London: even many superfluities and luxuries were sent them by the care of the citizens: yet the hardships, which they suffered from the siege, during so early a season, had weakened them to such a degree, that they were no longer fit for any new enterprize. And the two armies, for some time, encamped in the neighbourhood of each other, without attempting, on either side, any action of moment.

Besides the military operations between the principal armies, which lay in the centre of England, each county, each town, each family almost, was divided within itself; and the most violent convulsions shook the whole kingdom. Throughout the winter, continual efforts had every where been made by each party to surmount its antagonist; and the English, roused from the lethargy of peace, with eager, though unskilful hands, employed against their fellow citizens their long-neglected weapons. The furious zeal for liberty and presbyterian discipline, which had hitherto run uncontrolled throughout the nation, now at last excited an equal ardour for monarchy and episcopacy; when the intention of abolishing these ancient modes of goverment was openly avowed by the parliament. Conventions for neutrality, though in several counties they had been entered into, and confirmed by the most solemn oaths, yet, being voted illegal by the two houses, were immediately broken: and the fire of discord was spread into every quarter. The altercation of discourse, the controversies of the pen, but, above all, the declamations of the pulpit, indisposed the minds of men towards each other, and propagated the rage of party zeal. Fierce, however, and inflamed as were the dispositions of the English, by a war both civil and religious, that great destroyer of humanity, all the events of this period are less distinguished by atrocious deeds either of treachery or cruelty, than were ever any intestine discords, which had so long a continuance: a circumstance which will be found to reflect great praise on the national character of that people, now so unhappily roused to arms.

In the north, lord Fairfax commanded for the parliament, the earl of Newcastle for the king. The latter nobleman began those associations which were afterwards so much practised in other parts of the kingdom. He united in a league for the king the counties of Northumberland, Cumberland, Westmoreland, and the bishopric of Durham, and engaged, some time after, other counties in the same association. Finding that Fairfax, assisted by Hotham and the garrison of Hull, was making progress in the southern parts of Yorkshire; he advanced with a body of four thousand men, and took possession of York. At Tadcaster, he attacked the forces of the parliament, and dislodged them; but his victory was not decisive. In other rencounters he obtained some inconsiderable advantages. But the chief benefit which resulted from his enterprizes was, the establishing of the king's authority in all the northern provinces.

In another part of the kingdom, lord Broke was killed by a shot, while he was taking possession of Litchfield for the parliament (y). After a short combat, near Stafford, between the earl of Northampton and sir John Gell, the former, who commanded the king's forces, was killed while he fought with great valour; and his forces, dis-

(v) The parliamentary army now amounted to above twenty-four thousand men, and was much superior to that of the king.

(w) Besides an imposition levied in London, amounting to the five-and-twentieth part of every one's substance, they established on that city a weekly assessment of ten thousand pounds, and another of twenty-three thousand five hundred and eighteen, on the rest of the kingdom. And as their authority was at present established in most counties, they levied these taxes with regularity; though they amounted to sums much greater than the nation had formerly paid to the public.

(x) This last article was thought so ignominious and so prejudicial to the king's interests, that the governor was tried by a council of war, and condemned to lose his life, for consenting to it. His sentence was afterwards remitted by the king.

(y) He had taken possession of Litchfield, and was viewing from a window St. Chad's cathedral, in which a party of the royalists had fortified themselves. He was cased in complete armour, but was shot through the eye by a random ball. Lord Broke was a zealous Puritan, and had formerly said, that he hoped to see with his eyes the ruin of all the cathedrals of England. It was a superstitious remark of the royalists that he was killed on St. Chad's day, by a shot from St. Chad's cathedral, which pierced that very eye by which he hoped to see the ruin of all cathedrals. Dugdale, p. 118. Clarendon, &c.

couraged by his death, retreated into the town of Stafford.

Sir William Waller began to distinguish himself among the generals of the parliament. Active and indefatigable in his operations, rapid and enterprizing; he was fitted by his genius to the nature of the war; which, being managed by raw troops, conducted by unexperienced commanders, afforded success to every bold and sudden undertaking. After taking Winchester and Chichester, he advanced towards Gloucester, which was in a manner blockaded by lord Herbert, who had levied considerable forces in Wales for the royal party. While he attacked the Welsh on one side, a sally from Gloucester made impression on the other. Herbert was defeated; five hundred of his men killed on the spot; a thousand taken prisoners; and he himself escaped with some difficulty to Oxford. Hereford, esteemed a strong town, defended by a considerable garrison, was surrendered to Waller, by colonel Price, the governor. Tewkesbury underwent the same fate. Worcester refused him admittance; and Waller, without placing any garrisons in his new conquests, retired to Gloucester, and he thence joined the army under the earl of Essex.

But the most memorable actions of valour, during this winter season, were performed in the west. When sir Ralph Hopton, with his small troop, retired into Cornwall before the earl of Bedford, that nobleman, despising so inconsiderable a force, abandoned the pursuit, and committed the care of suppressing the royal party to the sheriffs of the county. But the affections of Cornwall were much inclined to the king's service. While sir Richard Buller and sir Alexander Carew lay at Launceston, and employed themselves in executing the parliament's ordinance for the militia, a meeting of the county was assembled at Truro; and after Hopton produced his commission from the earl of Hertford, the king's general, it was agreed to execute the laws, and to expel these invaders of the county. The train-bands were accordingly levied, Launceston taken, and all Cornwall reduced to peace and to obedience under the king.

It had been usual for the royal party, on the commencement of these disorders, to claim, on all occasions, the strict execution of the laws, which they knew were favourable to them; and the parliament, rather than have recourse to the plea of necessity, and avow the transgression of any statute, had also been accustomed to warp the laws, and by forced constructions to interpret them in their own favour. But though the king was naturally the gainer by such a method of conducting war, and it was by favour of law that the train-bands were raised in Cornwall; it appeared that those maxims were now prejudicial to the royal party. These troops could not legally, without their own consent, be carried out of the county; and consequently, it was impossible to push into Devonshire the advantage which they had obtained. The Cornish royalists, therefore, bethought themselves of levying a force, which might be more serviceable. Sir Bevil Granville, sir Ralph Hopton, sir Nicholas Slanning, Arundel, and Trevannion, undertook, at their own charges, to raise an army for the king; and their great interest in Cornwall soon enabled them to effect their purpose. The parliament, alarmed at this appearance of the royalists, gave a commission to Ruthven, a Scotchman, governor of Plymouth, to march with all the forces of Dorset, Somerset, and Devon, and make an entire conquest of Cornwall. The earl of Stamford followed him at some distance, with a considerable supply. Ruthven, having entered Cornwall by bridges thrown over the Tamar, hastened to an action; lest Stamford should join him, and obtain the honour of that victory which he looked for with assurance. The royalists, in like manner, were impatient to bring the affair to a decision before Ruthven's army should receive so considerable a reinforcement. The battle was fought on Bradoc Down; and the king's forces, though inferior in number, gave a total defeat to their enemies. Ruthven, with a few broken troops, fled to Saltash; and when that town was taken, he escaped, with some difficulty, and almost alone, into Plymouth. Stamford retired, and distributed his forces into Plymouth and Exeter.

Notwithstanding these advantages, the extreme want both of money and ammunition, under which the Cornish royalists laboured, obliged them to enter into a convention of neutrality with the parliamentary party in Devonshire; and this neutrality held all the winter season. In the spring it was broken by the authority of the two houses; and war recommenced with great appearance of disadvantage to the king's party. Stamford, having assembled a strong body of near seven thousand men, well supplied with money, provisions, and ammunition, advanced upon the royalists, who were not half his number, and were oppressed by every kind of necessity. Despair, joined to the natural gallantry of these troops, commanded by the prime gentry of the county, made them resolve, by one vigorous effort, to overcome all these advantages. Stamford being encamped on the top of a high hill near Stratton, they attacked him in four divisions, at five in the morning on the 16th of May, having lain all night under arms. One division was commanded by lord Mohun and sir Ralph Hopton, another by sir Bevil Granville and sir John Berkeley, a third by Slanning and Trevannion, a fourth by Basset and Godolphin. In this manner the action began; the king's forces pressing with vigour those four ways up the hill, and their enemies obstinately defending themselves. The fight continued with doubtful success, till word was brought to the chief officers of the Cornish, that their ammunition was spent to less than four barrels of powder. This defect, which they concealed from the soldiers, they resolved to supply by their valour. They agreed to advance without firing till they should reach the top of the hill, and could be on equal ground with the enemy. The courage of the officers was so well seconded by the soldiers, that the royalists began on all sides to gain ground. Major-general Chidley, who commanded the parliamentary army (for Stamford kept at a distance,) failed not in his duty; and when he saw his men recoil, he himself advanced with a good stand of pikes, and piercing into the thickest of the enemy, was at last overpowered by numbers, and taken prisoner. His army, upon this disaster, gave ground apace; insomuch, that the four parties of the royalists, growing nearer and nearer as they ascended, at length met together upon the plain at the top; where they embraced with great joy, and signalized their victory with loud shouts and mutual congratulations.

After this success, the attention both of the king and the parliament was turned towards the west, as to a very important scene of action. The king sent thither the marquis of Hertford and prince Maurice with a reinforcement of cavalry; who, having joined the Cornish army, soon over-ran the county of Devon; and advancing into that of Somerset, began to reduce it to obedience. On the other hand, the parliament, having supplied sir William Waller, in whom they much trusted, with a complete army, dispatched him westwards, in order to check the progress of the royalists. After some skirmishes, the two armies met at Lansdown, near Bath, and fought a pitched battle, on the 5th of July, with great loss on both sides, but without any decisive event. The gallant Granville was there killed; and Hopton, by the blowing up of some powder was dangerously hurt. The royalists next attempted to march eastwards, and to join their forces to the king's at Oxford: but Waller hung on their rear, and infested their march till they reached the Devizes. Reinforced by additional troops, which flocked to him from all quarters; he so much surpassed the royalists in number, that they durst no longer continue their march, or expose themselves to the hazard of an action. It was resolved, that Hertford and prince Maurice should proceed with the cavalry; and having procured a reinforcement from the king, should hasten back to the relief of their friends. Waller was so confident of taking this body of infantry now abandoned by the horse, that he wrote to the parliament, that their work was done, and that by the next post he would inform them of the number and quality of the prisoners. But the king, even before Hertford's arrival, hearing of the great difficulties to which his western army was reduced, had prepared a considerable body of cavalry, which he immediately dispatched to their succour under the command of lord Wilmot. Waller drew up on Roundway-down, about two miles from the Devizes; and advancing with his cavalry to fight Wilmot, and prevent his conjunction with the Cornish infantry, was received with equal valour by the royalists. After a sharp action he was totally routed, and flying with a few horse, escaped to Bristol. Wilmot, seizing the enemy's cannon, and having joined his friends, whom he came to relieve, attacked Waller's infantry with redoubled courage, drove them off the field, and routed and dispersed the whole army. This action was fought on the 13th of July.

This important victory following so quick after many other successes, struck great dismay into the parliament, and and gave an alarm to their principal army commanded by Essex. Waller exclaimed loudly against that general, for allowing Wilmot to pass him, and proceed without any interruption to the succour of the distressed infantry at the Devizes. But Essex finding that his army fell continually to decay after the siege of Reading, was resolved to remain upon the defensive; and the weakness of the king, and his want of military stores, had also restrained the activity of the royal army. No action had happened in that part of England, except one skirmish, which of itself was of no great consequence, and was rendered memorable by the death alone of the famous Hampden.

Colonel Urrey, a Scotchman, who served in the parliamentary army, having received some disgust, came to Oxford, and offered his services to the king. In order to prove the sincerity of his conversion, he informed prince Rupert of the loose disposition of the enemy's quarters, and exhorted him to form some attempt upon them. The prince, who was entirely fitted for that kind of service, falling suddenly upon the dispersed bodies of Essex's army, routed two regiments of cavalry and one of infantry, and carried his ravages within two miles of the general's quarters. The alarm being given, every one mounted on horseback, in order to pursue the prince, to recover the prisoners, and to repair the disgrace which the army had sustained. Among the rest, Hampden, who had a regiment of infantry that lay at a distance, joined the horse as a volunteer; and overtaking the royalists on Chalgrave field, entered into the thickest of the battle. By the bravery and activity of Rupert, the king's troops were brought off, and a great booty, together with two hundred prisoners, was conveyed to Oxford. But what most pleased the royalists was, the expectation that some disaster had happened to Hampden, their capital and much dreaded enemy. One of the prisoners taken in the action said, that he was confident Mr. Hampden was hurt: for he saw him, contrary to his usual custom, ride off the field, before the action was finished; his head hanging down, and his hands leaning upon his horse's neck. Next day, the news arrived, that he was shot in the shoulder with a brace of bullets, and the bone broken. Some days after, he died, in exquisite pain, of his wound (z); nor could his whole party, had their army met with a total overthrow, have been thrown into greater consternation.

Essex, discouraged by this event, dismayed by the total rout of Waller, was farther informed, that the queen, who landed in Burlington Bay, had arrived at Oxford, and had brought from the north a reinforcement of three thousand foot and fifteen hundred horse. Dislodging from Thame and Aylesbury, where he had hitherto lain, he thought proper to retreat nearer to London, and he shewed to his friends his broken and disheartened forces, which a few months before he had led into the field in so flourishing a condition. The king, freed from this enemy, sent his army westward under prince Rupert; and, by their conjunction with the Cornish troops, a formidable force, for numbers as well as reputation and valour, was composed. That an enterprize, correspondent to men's expectations, might be undertaken, the prince resolved to lay siege to Bristol, the second town for riches and greatness in the kingdom. Nathaniel Fiennes, son of lord Say, he himself, as well as his father, a great parliamentary leader, was governor, and commanded a garrison of two thousand five hundred foot, and two regiments, one of horse, another of dragoons. The fortifications not being complete or regular, it was resolved by prince Rupert to storm the city; and next morning, with little other provisions suitable to such a work, besides the courage of the troops, the assault began. The Cornish, in three divisions, attacked the west side, with a resolution which nothing could control; but though the middle division had already mounted the wall, so great was the disadvantage of the ground, and so brave the defence of the garrison, that in the end the assailants were repulsed with considerable loss both of officers and soldiers. On the prince's side, the assault was conducted with equal courage, and almost with equal loss, but with better success. One party, led by lord Grandison, was indeed beaten off, and the commander himself mortally wounded: another, conducted by colonel Bellasis, met with a like fate; but Washington, with a less party, finding a place in the curtain weaker than the rest, broke in, and quickly made room for the horse to follow. By this irruption, however, nothing but the suburbs was yet gained: the entrance into the town was still more difficult; and by the loss already sustained, as well as by the prospect of farther danger, every one was extremely discouraged: when, to the great joy of the army, the city beat a parley. The garrison was allowed to march out with their arms and baggage, leaving their cannon, ammunition, and colours, on the 25th of July. For this instance of cowardice, Fiennes was afterwards tried by a court-martial, and condemned to lose his head; but the sentence was remitted by the general.

Great complaints were made of violences exercised on the garrison, contrary to the capitulation. An apology was made by the royalists, as if these were a retaliation for some violences committed on their friends at the surrender of Reading. And under pretence of like retaliations, but really from the extreme animosity of the parties, were such irregularities continued during the whole course of the war.

The loss sustained by the royalists, in the assault of Bristol, was considerable. Five hundred excellent soldiers perished. Among those of condition were Grandison, Slanning, Trevannion, and Moyle: Bellasis, Ashley, and sir John Owen, were wounded: yet was the success, upon the whole, so considerable as mightily raised the courage of the one party, and depressed that of the other. The king, to show that he was not intoxicated with good fortune, nor aspired to a total victory over the parliament, published a manifesto; in which he renewed the protestation, formerly taken, with great solemnity, at the head of his army, and expressed his firm intentton of making peace upon the re-establishment of the constitution. Having joined the camp at Bristol, and sent prince Maurice with a detachment into Devonshire, he deliberated how to employ the remaining forces in an enterprize of moment. Some proposed, and seemingly with reason, to march directly to London; where every thing was in confusion, where the army of the parliament was baffled, weakened, and dismayed, and where, it was hoped, either by an insurrection of the citizens, by victory, or by treaty, a speedy end might be put to the civil disorders. But this undertaking, by reason of the great number and force of the London militia, was thought by many to be attended with considerable difficulties. Gloucester, lying within twenty miles, presented an easier, yet a very important conquest. It was the only remaining garrison possessed by the parliament in those parts. Could that city be reduced, the king held the whole course of the Severn under his command; the rich and malcontent counties of the west, having lost all protection from their friends, might be forced to pay high contributions, as an atonement for their disaffection; an open communication could be preserved between Wales and these new conquests; and half of the kingdom, being entirely freed from the enemy, and thus united into one firm body, might be employed in re-establishing the king's authority throughout the remainder. These were the reasons for embracing that resolution; fatal, as it was ever esteemed, to the royal party.

The governor of Gloucester was one Massey, a soldier of fortune, who, before he engaged with the parliament, had offered his service to the king; and as he was free from the fumes of enthusiasm, by which most of the officers on that side were intoxicated, he would lend an ear, it was presumed, to proposals for accommodation. But Massey was resolute to preserve an entire fidelity to his masters; and though no enthusiast himself, he well knew how to employ to advantage that enthusiastic spirit so prevalent in his city and garrison. The summons to surrender, on the 10th of August, allowed two hours for an answer; but before that time expired, there appeared before the king two citizens, with lean, pale, sharp, and dismal visages: faces, so strange and uncouth, according to lord Clarendon; figures, so habited and accoutred, as at once moved the most severe countenance to mirth, and the most cheerful heart to sadness: it seemed impossible, that such messengers could bring less than a defiance. The men, without any circumstance of duty or good manners, in a pert, shrill, and undismayed accent, said, that they

(z) Many were the virtues and talents of this eminent personage; and his valour, during the war, had shone out with a lustre equal to that of the other accomplishments by which he had ever been distinguished. Affability in conversation; temper, art, and eloquence in debate; penetration and discernment in counsel; industry, vigilance, and enterprize in action; all these praises are unanimously ascribed to him by historians of the most opposite parties. His virtue too and integrity, in all the duties of private life, are allowed to have been beyond exception.

they brought an answer from the godly city of Gloucester: and extremely ready were they, according to the historian, to give insolent and seditious replies to any question; as if their business were chiefly, by provoking the king, to make him violate his own safe-conduct. The answer from the city was in these words: "We, the inhabitants, magistrates, officers and soldiers, within the garrison of Gloucester, unto his majesty's gracious message, return this humble answer: That we do keep this city, according to our oaths and allegiance, to and for the use of his majesty, and of his royal posterity: and do accordingly conceive ourselves wholly bound to obey the commands of his majesty signified by both houses of parliament: and are resolved, by God's help, to keep this city accordingly." After these preliminaries, the siege was resolutely undertaken by the army, and as resolutely sustained by the citizens and garrison.

When intelligence of the siege of Gloucester arrived in London, the consternation among the inhabitants was as great as if the enemy were already at their gates. The rapid progress of the royalists threatened the parliament with immediate subjection: the factions and discontents, among themselves, in the city, and throughout the neighbouring counties, prognosticated some dangerous division or insurrection. Those parliamentary leaders, it must be owned, who had introduced such mighty innovations into the English constitution, and who had projected so much greater, had not engaged in an enterprize which exceeded their courage and capacity. Great vigour, from the beginning, as well as wisdom, they had displayed in all their counsels; and a furious, headstrong body, broken loose from the restraint of law, had hitherto been retained in subjection under their authority, and firmly united by zeal and passion, as by the most legal and established government. A small committee, on whom the two houses devolved their power, had directed all their military operations, and had preserved a secrecy in deliberation, and a promptitude in execution, beyond what the king, notwithstanding the advantages possessed by a single leader, had ever been able to attain. As they were sensible that no jealousy was by their partizans entertained against them, so they acted with greater lenity than it was expected they would have done. Some excesses, however, were committed; but those committed by the republicans were not more atrocious than were those committed by the king's party. Whoever incurred the displeasure of the parliament, or was exposed to their suspicions, was committed to prison, and prosecuted under the notion of delinquency: after all the old jails were full, some new ones were erected; and even the ships were crowded with the royalists, both gentry and clergy: they imposed taxes by an ordinance of the two houses: they voted a commission for sequestrations; and they seized, wherever they had power, the revenues of the king's party (a): and knowing that themselves, and all their adherents, were, by resisting the prince, exposed to the penalties of laws, they resolved, as was natural, by a severe administration, to overcome these terrors, and to retain the people in obedience, by penalties of a more immediate execution. In the beginning of this summer, a combination, formed against them in London, had obliged them to exert the plenitude of their authority.

Edmund Waller, the first refiner of the English versification, was a member of the lower house; a man of considerable fortune, and not more distinguished by his poetical genius than by his parliamentary talents, and by the politeness and elegance of his manners. As full of keen satire and invective in his eloquence, as of tenderness and panegyric in his poetry, he caught the attention of his hearers, and exerted the utmost boldness in blaming those violent counsels, by which the commons were governed. Finding all opposition within doors to be fruitless, he endeavoured to form a party without, which might oblige the parliament to accept of reasonable conditions, and restore peace to the nation. The charms of his conversation, joined to his character of courage and integrity, had procured him the entire confidence of Northumberland, Conway, and every eminent person of either sex, who resided in London. They opened their breast to him without reserve, and expressed their disapprobation of the furious measures pursued by the commons, and their wishes that some expedient could be found for stopping so impetuous a career. Tomkins, Waller's brother-in-law, and Chaloner, the intimate friend of Tomkins, had entertained like sentiments: and as the connexions of these two gentlemen lay chiefly in the city, they informed Waller, that the same abhorrence of war prevailed there, among all men of reason and moderation. Upon reflection it seemed not impracticable, that a combination might be formed between the lords and citizens; and, by mutual concert, the illegal taxes be refused, which the parliament, without the royal assent, imposed on the people. While this affair was in agitation, and lists were making of such as they conceived to be well-affected to their design, a servant of Tomkins, who had overheard their discourse, immediately carried intelligence to Pym. Waller, Tomkins, and Chaloner were seized, and tried by a court-martial. They were all three condemned, and the two latter executed on gibbets erected before their own doors. A covenant, as a test, was taken on the 6th of June, by the lords and commons, and imposed on their army, and on all who lived within their quarters. Besides resolving to amend and reform their lives, the covenanters there vow, that they will never lay down their arms so long as the Papists, now in open war against the parliament, shall, by force of arms, be protected from justice; they express their abhorrence of the late conspiracy; and promise to assist to the utmost the forces raised by both houses, against the forces levied by the king.

Waller, as soon as imprisoned, sensible of the great danger into which he had fallen, was so seized with the dread of death, that all his former spirit deserted him; and he confessed whatever he knew, without sparing his most intimate friends, without regard to the confidence reposed in him, without distinguishing between the negligence of familiar conversation and the schemes of a regular conspiracy. With the most profound dissimulation, he counterfeited such remorse of conscience, that his execution was put off, out of mere christian compassion, till he might recover the use of his understanding. He invited visits from the ruling clergy of all sects; and while he expressed his own penitence, he received their devout exhortations with humility and reverence, as conveying clearer conviction and information than in his life he had ever before attained. Presents too, of which, as well as flattery, these holy men were not insensible, were distributed among them; as a small retribution for their prayers and ghostly counsel. And by all these artifices, more than from any regard to the beauty of his genius, of which small account would be made, he prevailed so far as to have his life spared, and a fine of ten thousand pounds accepted in lieu of it.

The severity exercised against the conspiracy, or rather project, of Waller, increased the authority of the parliament, and seemed to ensure them against like attempts for the future. But by the progress of the king's arms, the defeat of sir William Waller, the taking of Bristol, the siege of Gloucester, a cry for peace was renewed, and with more violence than ever. Crowds of women, with a petition for that purpose, flocked about the house, and were so clamorous and importunate, that orders were given for dispersing them; and some of the females were killed in the fray. Bedford, Holland, and Conway, had deserted the parliament, and had gone to Oxford; Clare and Lovelace had followed them. Northumberland had retired to his country-seat: Essex himself shewed extreme dissatisfaction, and exhorted the parliament to make peace. The upper house sent down terms of accommodation, more moderate than had hitherto been insisted on. It even passed by a majority among the commons, that these proposals should be transmitted to the king. The zealots took the alarm. A petition against peace was framed in the city, and presented by Pennington, the mayor. Multitudes attended him, and renewed all the former menaces against the moderate party. The pulpits thundered, and rumours were spread of twenty thousand Irish, who had landed, and were to cut the throat of every Protestant. The majority was again turned to the other side; and all thoughts of pacification being dropped, every preparation was made for resistance, and for the immediate relief of Gloucester, on which the parliament was sensible all their hopes of success in the war so much depended.

Massey, resolute to make a vigorous defence, and having under his command a city and garrison ambitious of the crown of martyrdom, had hitherto maintained the siege with courage and abilities, and had much retarded the advances of the king's army. By continual sallies, he infested them in their trenches, and gained many advantages over them: by disputing every inch of ground, he repressed the vigour and alacrity of their courage, elated by former successes. His garrison, however, was reduced to the last extremity; and he failed not, from time to time, to inform the parliament, that, unless speedily relieved, he should be necessitated, from the extreme want of provisions and ammunition, to open his gates to the enemy.

The parliament, in order to repair their broken condition, and put themselves in a posture of defence, now exerted to the utmost their power and authority. They voted, that an army should be levied under sir William Waller, whom, notwithstanding his misfortunes, they loaded with extraordinary caresses. Having associated in their cause the counties of Hertford, Essex, Cambridge, Norfolk, Suffolk, Lincoln, and Huntingdon, they gave the earl of Manchester a commission to be general of the association, and appointed an army to be levied under his command. But, above all, they were intent that Essex's army, on which their whole fortune depended, should be put in a condition of marching against the king. And they engaged to send four regiments of its militia to the relief of Gloucester. All shops, meanwhile, were ordered to be shut; and every man expected, with the utmost anxiety, the event of that important enterprize.

Essex, carrying with him a well-appointed army of fourteen thousand men, took the road of Bedford and Leicester; and, though inferior in cavalry, yet, by the mere force of conduct and discipline, he passed over those open champaign countries, and defended himself from the enemy's horse, who advanced to meet him, and who infested him during his whole march. As he approached to Gloucester, the king was obliged to raise the siege, and open the way for Essex to enter that city. The necessities of the garrison were extreme. One barrel of powder was their whole stock of ammunition remaining; and their other provisions were in the same proportion. Essex had brought with him military stores; and the neighbouring country abundantly supplied him with victuals of every kind. The inhabitants had carefully concealed all provisions from the king's army, and, pretending to be quite exhausted, had reserved their stores for that cause which they so much favoured.

The chief difficulty, however, still remained. Essex dreaded a battle with the king's army, on account of its great superiority in cavalry; and he resolved to return, if possible, without running that hazard. He lay five days at Tewkesbury, which was his first stage after leaving Gloucester; and he feigned, by some preparations, to point towards Worcester. By a forced march during the night, he reached Cirencester, and obtained the double advantage of passing unmolested an open country, and of surprising a convoy of provisions which lay in that town. Without delay, he proceeded towards London; but when he reached Newbury, he was surprized to find, that the king, by hasty marches, had arrived before him, and was already possessed of the place.

An action was now unavoidable; and Essex, on the 20th of September, prepared for it with presence of mind, and not without military conduct. On both sides, the battle was fought with desperate valour and a steady bravery. Essex's horse were several times broken by the king's, but his infantry maintained themselves in firm array; and, besides giving a continued fire, they presented an invincible rampart of pikes against the furious shocks of prince Rupert, and those gallant troops of gentry, of which the royal cavalry was chiefly composed. The militia of London especially, though utterly unacquainted with action, though drawn but a few days before from their ordinary occupations, yet having learned all military exercises, and being animated with unconquerable zeal for the cause in which they were engaged, equalled, on this occasion, what could be expected from the most veteran forces. While the armies were engaged with the utmost ardour, night put an end to the action, and left the victory undecided. Next morning, Essex proceeded on his march; and though his rear was once put in some disorder by an incursion of the king's horse, he reached London in safety, and received applause for his conduct and success in the whole enterprize. The king followed him on his march; and having taken possession of Reading, after the earl left it, he there established a garrison; and straitened, by that means, London, and the quarters of the enemy.

In the battle of Newbury, on the part of the king, besides the earls of Sunderland and Carnarvon, two noblemen of promising hopes, was unfortunately slain, Lucius Cary, viscount Falkland, secretary of state. Before assembling the present parliament, this man, devoted to the pursuits of learning, and to the society of all the polite and elegant, had enjoyed himself in very pleasure, which a fine genius, a generous disposition, and an opulent fortune could afford. Called into public life, he stood foremost in all attacks on the high prerogatives of the crown; and displayed that masculine eloquence, and undaunted love of liberty, which, from his intimate acquaintance with the sublime spirits of antiquity, he had imbibed. When civil convulsions proceeded to extremities, and it became requisite for him to chuse his side; he tempered the ardour of his zeal, and embraced the defence of those limited powers which remained to monarchy, and which he deemed necessary for the support of the English constitution. Still anxious, however, for his country, he seems to have dreaded the too prosperous success of his own party as much as of the enemy; and, among his intimate friends, often after a deep silence and frequent sighs, he would, with a sad accent, reiterate the word, Peace. In excuse for the too free exposing of his person, which seemed unsuitable in a secretary of state, he alledged, that it became him to be more active than other men in all hazardous enterprizes, lest his impatience for peace might bear the imputation of cowardice. From the commencement of the war, his natural cheerfulness and vivacity became clouded; and even his usual attention to dress, required by his birth and station, gave way to a negligence which was easily observable. On the morning of the battle in which he fell, he had shown some care of adorning his person; and gave for a reason, that the enemy should not find his body in any slovenly, indecent situation. "I am weary," subjoined he, "of the times, and foresee much misery to my country; but believe, that I shall be out of it ere night." This excellent person was but thirty-four years of age when a period was thus put to his life.

The loss sustained on both sides in the battle of Newbury, and the advanced season, obliged the armies to retire into winter-quarters.

During this summer, the great interest and popularity of the earl, now created marquis of Newcastle, had raised a considerable force for the king in the north; and great hopes of success were entertained from that quarter. There appeared, however, in opposition to him, two men, on whom the event of the war finally depended, and who began about this time to be remarked for their valour and military conduct. These were sir Thomas Fairfax, son of the lord of that name, and Oliver Cromwell. The former gained a considerable advantage at Wakefield, on the 21st of May, over a detachment of royalists, and took general Goring prisoner: the latter obtained a victory at Gainsborough, on the 31st of July, over a party commanded by the gallant Cavendish, who perished in the action. But both these defeats of the royalists were more than sufficiently compensated by the total rout of lord Fairfax at Atherton Moor, on the 30th of June, and the dispersion of his army. After this victory, Newcastle, with an army of fifteen thousand men, sat down before Hull. Hotham was no longer governor of this place. That gentleman and his son, partly from a jealousy entertained of lord Fairfax, partly repenting of their engagements against the king, had entered into a correspondence with Newcastle, and had expressed an intention of delivering Hull into his hands. But their conspiracy being detected, they were arrested and sent prisoners to London; where, without any regard to their former services, they fell, both of them, victims to the severity of the parliament.

Newcastle, having carried on the attack of Hull for some time, was beat off by a sally of the garrison, on the 12th of October, and suffered so much, that he thought proper to raise the siege. About the same time, Manchester, who advanced from the eastern associated counties, having joined Cromwell and young Fairfax, obtained a considerable victory over the royalists at Horn Castle; where the two officers last mentioned gained renown by their conduct and gallantry. And though fortune had thus balanced her favours, the king's party still remained much superior in those parts of England; and had it not been for the garrison of Hull, which kept Yorkshire in awe, a conjunction of the northern forces with the army in the south might have been made, and had probably enabled the king, instead of entering on the enterprize of Gloucester, to march directly to London, and put an end to the war.

While the military enterprizes were carried on with vigour in England, and the event became every day more doubtful, both parties cast their eye towards the neighbouring kingdoms, and sought assistance for the finishing of that undertaking, in which their own forces experienced such furious opposition. The parliament had recourse to Scotland; the king to Ireland.

When the Scottish covenanters obtained that end, for which they so earnestly contended, the establishment of Presbyterian discipline in their own country, they were not satisfied, but indulged still an ardent passion for propagating that mode of religion in the neighbouring kingdoms. Having flattered themselves, in the fervour of their zeal, that, by supernatural assistances, they should be enabled to carry their triumphant covenant to the gates of Rome itself, it behoved them first to render it prevalent in England, which already showed so great a disposition to receive it. Even in the articles of pacification, they expressed a desire of uniformity in worship with England; and the king, employing general expressions, had approved of this inclination, as pious and laudable. No sooner was there an appearance of a rupture, than the English parliament, in order to allure that nation into a close confederacy, openly declared their wishes of ecclesiastical reformation, and of imitating the example of their northern brethren. When war was actually commenced, the same artifices were used; and the Scots beheld, with the utmost impatience, a scene of action, of which they could not deem themselves indifferent spectators. Should the king, they said, be able, by force of arms, to prevail over the parliament of England, and reestablish his authority in that powerful kingdom, he will undoubtedly retract all those concessions, which, with so many circumstances of violence and indignity, the Scots had extorted from him. Besides a sense of his own interest, and a regard to royal power, which had been entirely annihilated in this country; his very passion for prelacy and for religious ceremonies, must lead him to invade a church which he has ever been taught to regard as antichristian and unlawful. Let us but consider who the persons are that compose the factions now so furiously engaged in arms. Does not the parliament consist of those very men who have ever opposed all war with Scotland, who have punished the authors of our oppressions, who have obtained us the redress of every grievance, and who, with many honourable expressions, have conferred on us an ample reward for our brotherly assistance? And is not the court full of Papists, prelates, malignants; all of them zealous enemies to our religious model, and resolute to sacrifice their lives for their idolatrous establishments? Not to mention our own necessary security; can we better express our gratitude to heaven for that pure light with which we are, above all nations, so eminently distinguished, than by conveying the same divine knowledge to our unhappy neighbours, who are wading through a sea of blood in order to attain it? These were, in Scotland, the topics of every conversation: with these doctrines the pulpits resounded; and the famous curse of Meroz, that curse so solemnly denounced and reiterated against neutrality and moderation, was echoed from all quarters (b).

The parliament of England had ever invited the Scots, from the commencement of the civil dissensions, to interpose their mediation, which, they knew, would be so little favourable to the king: and the king, for that very reason, had constantly endeavoured to decline it. Early this spring, the earl of Loudon, the chancellor, with other commissioners, and attended by Henderson, a popular preacher, was sent to the king at Oxford, and renewed the offer of mediation; but with the same success as before. The commissioners were also empowered to press the king on the article of religion, and to recommend to him the Scottish model of ecclesiastic worship and discipline. This was touching Charles in a very tender point: his honour, his conscience, as well as his interest, he believed to be intimately concerned in supporting prelacy and the liturgy. He begged the commissioners, therefore, to remain satisfied with the concessions which he had made to Scotland; and having modelled their own church according to their own principles, to leave their neighbours in the like liberty, and not to intermeddle with affairs of which they could not be supposed competent judges.

The divines of Oxford, secure, as they imagined, of a victory, by means of their authorities from church history, their quotations from the fathers, and their spiritual arguments, desired a conference with Henderson, and undertook, by dint of reasoning, to convert that great apostle of the north: but Henderson, who had ever regarded as impious, the least doubt with regard to his own principles, and who knew of a much better way to reduce opponents than by employing any theological topics, absolutely refused all disputation or controversy. The English divines went away full of admiration at the blind assurance and bigoted prejudices of the man: he, on his part, was moved with equal wonder at their obstinate attachment to such palpable errors and delusions.

By the concessions which the king had granted to Scotland, it became necessary for him to summon a parliament once in three years; and in June of the subsequent year, was fixed the period for the meeting of that assembly. Before that time elapsed, Charles flattered himself that he should be able, by some decisive advantage, to reduce the English parliament to submission, and might then expect, with security, the meeting of a Scottish parliament. Though earnestly solicited by Loudon to summon that great council of the nation, he absolutely refused to give authority to men who had already excited such dangerous commotions, and who showed still the same disposition to resist and invade his authority. The commissioners, therefore, not being able to prevail in any of their demands, desired the king's passport for London, where they purposed to confer with the English parliament; and being likewise denied this request, they returned with extreme dissatisfaction to the capital of Scotland.

The office of conservators of the peace was newly erected in Scotland, in order to maintain the confederacy between the two kingdoms; and these, instigated by the clergy, were resolved, since they could not obtain the king's consent, to summon, in his name, but by their own authority, a convention of states; and to bereave their sovereign of this article, the only one which remained of his prerogative. Under colour of providing for national peace, endangered by the neighbourhood of English armies, was a convention called; an assembly, which, though it meets with less solemnity, has the same authority as a parliament, in raising money and levying forces. Hamilton, and his brother the earl of Lanerc, who had been sent into Scotland in order to oppose these measures, yielded to the torrent. The general assembly of the church met at the same time with the convention; and, exercising an authority almost absolute over the whole civil power, made every political consideration yield to their theological zeal.

The English parliament was, at that time, fallen into great distress, by the progress of the royal arms; and they gladly sent commissioners to Edinburgh, with ample powers to treat of a nearer union and confederacy with the Scottish nation. The persons employed were the earl of Rutland, sir William Armyne, sir Henry Vane the younger, Thomas Hatcher, and Henry Darley, attended by Marshal and Nye, two clergymen of signal authority. In this negociation, the man chiefly trusted was Vane, who, in eloquence, address, and capacity, was not surpassed by any one, even during that age, so famous for active talents. By his persuasion was framed at Edinburgh, that SOLEMN LEAGUE AND COVENANT, which effaced all former protestations and vows taken in both kingdoms, and long maintained its credit and authority (c).

In the English parliament there remained some members, who, though they had been induced, either by private ambition, or by zeal for civil liberty, to concur with (b) "Curse ye Meroz, said the angel of the Lord; curse ye bitterly the inhabitants thereof: because they came not to the help of the Lord, to the help of the Lord against the mighty." Judges, chap. v. 23.

(c) In this covenant, the subscribers, besides engaging mutually to defend each other against all opponents, bound themselves to endeavour, without respect of persons, the extirpation of popery and prelacy, superstition, heresy, schism, and profaneness; to maintain the rights and privileges of parliaments, together with the king's authority; and to discover and bring to justice all incendiaries and malignants. The subscribers of the covenant vowed also to preserve the reformed religion established in the church of Scotland; but no declaration more explicit was made with regard to England and Ireland, than that these kingdoms should be reformed, according to the word of God, and the example of the purest churches. The Scottish zealots, when prelacy was abjured, deemed this expression quite free from ambiguity, and regarded their own model as the only one which corresponded, in any degree, to such a description; but that able politician, sir Henry Vane, had other views; and while he employed his great talents in over-reaching the Presbyterians, he devoted himself to the maintenance of systems which were by high churchmen supposed to be more absurd and dangerous.

the majority, still retained an attachment to the hierarchy, and to the ancient modes of worship. But, in the present danger which threatened their cause, all scruples were laid aside; and the covenant, by whose means alone they could expect to obtain so considerable a reinforcement as the accession of the Scottish nation, was received without opposition, on the 17th of September. The parliament, therefore, having first subscribed it themselves, ordered it to be received by all who lived under their authority.

Great were the rejoicings among the Scots, that they should be the happy instruments of extending their mode of religion, and dissipating that profound darkness in which the neighbouring nations were involved. The general assembly applauded this glorious imitation of the piety displayed by their ancestors, who, they said, in three different applications, during the reign of Elizabeth, had endeavoured to engage the English, by persuasion, to lay aside the use of the surplice, tippet, and corner cap. The convention ordered every one to swear to this covenant, under the penalty of confiscation; beside what farther punishment it should please the ensuing parliament to inflict on the refusers, as enemies to God, to the king, and to the kingdom. And being determined that the sword should carry conviction to all refractory minds, they prepared themselves, with great vigilance and activity, for their military enterprizes. By means of a hundred thousand pounds, which they received from England, and by their favourable disposition towards the cause, the Scots soon completed their levies. And, having added, to their other forces, the troops which they had recalled from Ireland, they were ready, about the end of the year, to enter England, under the command of their old general, the earl of Leven, with an army of above twenty thousand men.

Charles, foreseeing this tempest which was gathering upon him, endeavoured to secure himself by every expedient; and he cast his eye towards Ireland, in hopes that this kingdom, from which his cause had already received so much prejudice, might at length contribute somewhat towards his protection and security.

After the commencement of the Irish insurrection, the English parliament, though they undertook the suppression of it, had ever been too much engaged, either in military projects, or expeditions at home, to take any effectual step towards finishing that enterprize. They had entered, indeed, into a contract with the Scots, for sending over an army of ten thousand men into Ireland; and, in order to engage that nation in this undertaking, beside giving a promise of pay, they agreed to put Carickfergus into their hands, and to invest their general with an authority quite independent of the English government. These troops, so long as they were allowed to remain, were useful, by diverting the force of the Irish rebels, and protecting in the north the small remnants of the British planters. But, except this contract with the Scottish nation, all the other measures of the parliament either were hitherto absolutely insignificant, or tended rather to the prejudice of the Protestant cause in Ireland. By continuing their violent persecution, and still more violent menaces against priests and papists, they confirmed the Irish Catholics in their rebellion, and cut off all hopes of indulgence and toleration. By disposing beforehand of all the Irish forfeitures to subscribers or adventurers, they rendered all men of property desperate, and seemed to threaten a total extirpation of the natives (d). And while they thus infused zeal and animosity into the enemy, no measure was pursued which could tend to support or encourage the Protestants, now reduced to the last extremities.

So great is the ascendant which, from a long course of successes, the English has acquired over the Irish nation, that though the latter, when they receive military discipline among foreigners, are not surpassed by any troops, they had never, in their own country, been able to make any vigorous effort for the defence or recovery of their liberties. In many rencounters, the English, under lord More, sir William St. Leger, sir Frederic Hamilton, and others, had, though under great disadvantages of situation and numbers, put the Irish to rout, and returned in triumph to Dublin. The rebels raised the siege of Tredah, after an obstinate defence made by the garrison. Ormond had obtained two complete victories at Kilrush and Ross; and had brought relief to all the forts, which were besieged or blockaded in different parts of the kingdom. But notwithstanding these successes, even the most common necessaries of life were wanting to the victorious armies. The Irish, in their wild rage against the British planters, had laid waste the whole kingdom, and were themselves totally unfit, from their habitual sloth and ignorance, to raise any convenience of human life. During the course of six months no supplies had come from England, except the fourth part of one small vessel's lading. Dublin, to save itself from famine, had been obliged to send the greater part of its inhabitants to England. The army had little ammunition, scarcely exceeding forty barrels of gunpowder; not even shoes or clothes; and for want of food the soldiers had been obliged to eat their own horses. And though the distress of the Irish was not much inferior; besides that they were more hardened against such extremities, it was but a melancholy reflection, that the two nations, while they continued their furious animosities, should make desolate that fertile island, which might serve to the subsistence and happiness of both.

The justices and council of Ireland had been engaged, chiefly by the interest and authority of Ormond, to fall into an entire dependence on the king. Parsons, Temple, Loftus, and Meredith, who favoured the opposite party, had been removed; and Charles had supplied their place by others better affected to his service. A committee of the English house of commons, which had been sent over to Ireland, in order to conduct the affairs of that kingdom, had been excluded the council, in obedience to orders transmitted from the king. And these were reasons sufficient, besides the great difficulties, under which they themselves laboured, why the parliament was unwilling to send supplies to an army, which, though engaged in a cause much favoured by them, was commanded by their declared enemies. They even intercepted some small succours sent thither by the king.

The king, as he had neither money, arms, ammunition, nor provisions to spare from his own urgent wants, resolved to embrace an expedient, which might at once relieve the necessities of the Irish Protestants, and contribute to the advancement of his affairs in England. A truce with the rebels, he thought, would enable his subjects in Ireland to provide for their own support, and would procure him the assistance of the army against the English parliament. But as a treaty with a people, so odious for their barbarities, and still more for their religion, might be represented in invidious colours, and renew all those calumnies with which he had been loaded; it was necessary to proceed with caution in conducting that measure. A remonstrance from the army was made to the Irish council, representing their necessities, and craving permission to leave the kingdom: and if that were refused, "We must have recourse," they said, "to that first and primary law, with which God has endowed all men; we mean the law of nature, which teaches every creature to preserve itself." Memorials both to the king and to the parliament were transmitted by the justices and council, in which their wants and dangers are strongly set forth; and though the general expressions in these memorials might perhaps be suspected of exaggeration, yet from the particular facts mentioned, from the confession of the English parliament itself; and from the very nature of things, it is apparent that the Irish Protestants were reduced to great extremities; and it became prudent in the king, if not absolutely necessary, to embrace some expedient, which might secure them, for a time, from the ruin and misery with which they were threatened.

Accordingly, on the 7th of September, the king gave orders to Ormond and the justices to conclude, for a year, a cessation of arms with the council of Kilkenny, by whom the Irish were governed, and to leave both sides in possession of their present advantages. The parliament, whose business it was to find fault with every measure adopted by the opposite party, and who would not lose so fair an opportunity of reproaching the king with his favour to the Irish papists, exclaimed loudly against this cessation. Among other reasons, they insisted upon the divine vengeance, which England might justly dread, for tolerating antichristian idolatry, on pretence of civil contracts and political agreements.

After the cessation, there was little necessity, as well as no means, of subsisting the army in Ireland. The king ordered Ormond, who was entirely devoted to him, to send over considerable bodies of it to England. Most of them them continued in his service: but a small part having imbibed in Ireland a strong animosity against the Catholics, and hearing the king's party universally reproached with popery, soon after deserted to the parliament.

Some Irish Catholics came over with these troops, and joined the royal army, where they continued the same cruelties and disorders to which they had been accustomed. The parliament voted, that no quarter, in any action, should ever be given them: but prince Rupert, taking advantage of this parliamentary vote, committed dreadful slaughter, in several instances, upon the parliamentary forces, whenever he gained success against them, under the specious pretext of making reprisals.

During the course of the war, the king had obtained several advantages over the parliament, so that, at the beginning of 1644, he had raised himself from that low condition into which he had at first fallen, to be nearly upon an equal footing with his adversaries. Yorkshire, and all the northern counties, were reduced by the marquis of Newcastle; and, excepting Hull, the parliament was master of no garrison in these quarters. In the west, Plymouth alone, (with two small fishing towns, Poole and Lyme,) having been in vain besieged by prince Maurice, resisted the king's authority: and had it not been for the disappointment in the enterprize of Gloucester, the royal garrisons had reached, without interruption, from one end of the kingdom to the other; and had occupied a greater extent of ground than those of the parliament. Many of the royalists now flattered themselves, that the same vigorous spirit, which had raised them to their present condition, would still favour their progress, and obtain them a final victory over their enemies: but those who judged with more wisdom, observed that, besides the accession of the whole Scottish nation to the side of the parliament, the very principle on which the royal successes had been founded was every day acquired, more and more, by the republicans. The king's troops, full of gentry and nobility, had exercised a valour superior to their enemies, and had been successful in many rencounters: but, in proportion as the whole nation became warlike, by the continuance of civil discords, this advantage was more equally shared; and superior numbers, it was expected, must at length obtain the victory. The king's troops also ill paid, and destitute of every necessary, could not possibly be retained in equal discipline with the parliamentary forces, to whom all supplies were furnished from unexhausted stores and treasures. The severity of manners, so much practised by the Puritans, assisted their military institutions; and the rigid inflexibility of character by which they were distinguished, enabled the parliamentary chiefs to restrain their soldiers within stricter rules and more exact order. And while the king's officers indulged themselves even in greater licences than those to which, during times of peace, they had been accustomed, they were apt, both to neglect their military duty, and to set a pernicious example of disorder to the soldiers under their command. The dissolute manners, therefore, of the king's forces, prompted them to the commission of various excesses, which at length began to cause disgust among the people.

At the commencement of the civil war, all Englishmen, who served abroad, were invited over, and treated with extraordinary respect. Most of them were descended from good families, and did not examine into the nature of the dispute between the king and the parliament, therefore they inlisted under the royal standard. But it is observable that, though the military profession requires great genius, and long experience, in the principal commanders, all its subordinate duties may be discharged by ordinary talents, and from superficial practice. Citizens and country gentlemen soon became excellent officers; and the generals of greatest fame and capacity happened, all of them, to spring up on the side of the parliament. The courtiers and great nobility, in the other party, checked the growth of any extraordinary genius among the subordinate officers; and every man there, as in a regular established government, was confined to the station in which his birth had placed him.

The king, that he might make preparations, during winter, for the ensuing campaign, summoned to Oxford all the members of either house, who adhered to his interests; and endeavoured to avail himself of the name of parliament, so passionately cherished by the English nation. They met at Oxford, in January, 1644. The house of peers, as might have been expected, was pretty full; but the house of commons consisted of about one hundred and forty; which amounted not to above half of the house of commons which sat at Westminster.

So extremely light had government hitherto lain upon the people, that the very name of excise was unknown to them; and, among other evils arising from these domestic wars, was the introduction of that impost into England. The parliament at Westminter having voted an excise on beer, wine, and other commodities; those at Oxford imitated the example, and conferred that revenue on the king. And, in order to enable him the better to recruit his army, they granted him the sum of one hundred thousand pounds, to be levied by way of loan upon the subject. The king circulated privy seals, counter-signed by the speakers of both houses, requiring the loan of particular sums from such persons as lived within his quarters.—Neither party had as yet got above the pedantry of reproaching their antagonists with these illegal measures (e).

The king, that he might abate the universal veneration paid to the name of parliament, issued a declaration, in which he pretended to set forth all the tumults by which himself and his partizans in both houses had been driven from London; and thence inferred, that the assembly at Westminster was no longer a free parliament, and, till its liberty were restored, was entitled to no authority. As this declaration was an obstacle to all treaty, some contrivance seemed requisite, in order to elude it.

As it had been intimated to the king, that there was no probability that the two houses at Westminster would ever treat with the members which should meet at Oxford, and that he might expect great advantages from their refusal, a letter (f), signed by the prince of Wales, the duke of York, forty-three lords, and a hundred and eighteen proscribed members of the house of commons, was sent to the earl of Essex, purporting, That it was their earnest desire some persons should be appointed, on either part, to treat of such a peace as might redeem their country from the brink of ruin. The earl of Essex, by the directions of the committee of state, returned the following answer: That he could not communicate the letter he had received to the assembly of parliament, because it was neither addressed to them, nor were they acknowledged in it. To carry on the farce concerted between the king and his council, a second letter was sent to the earl of Essex, desiring a safe-conduct to Westminster for two messengers, designed to be sent by the king concerning a treaty of peace. As there was the same studied affectation to avoid mentioning the parliament in this second letter as in the first, the answer returned was, That, when a safe-conduct for the king's messengers should be demanded of the two houses, the earl of Essex would shew his willingness to farther any way which might produce a good understanding between his majesty and his faithful and only council the parliament.

This refusal produced from the king a message directed to the lords and commons sitting at Westminster: but as he took care, in his offers to treat of peace, to signify that his conduct in this particular was directed by the lords and commons assembled at Oxford, and, according to a pre-

(e) The Westminster parliament passed likewise a whimsical ordinance, enjoining all the inhabitants of London and the bills of mortality, to retrench (for three months) a meal a week; and to subscribe the value of it for the support of the public cause.

(f) Lord Clarendon tells us, that the king, on being advised to the expedient of calling the members to Oxford, was at first in some apprehension that such a conflux of persons, who would look to enjoy the privilege of parliament in their debates, might, instead of doing him service, do many things contrary to it; and exceedingly apprehended, that they would immediately enter upon some treaty of peace which would have no effect, yet, whilst it was in suspence, would hinder his preparations for the war: "And though nobody," says lord Clarendon, "more desired peace than the king, yet he had no mind that a multitude should be consulted upon the conditions of it." The same author asserts, That the following arguments obviated the king's objection; viz. that the persons who had the duty to obey his majesty's summons could be none but such as had already absented themselves from Westminster, and, having thereby incurred the resentment of those who remained there, would not bring ill and troublesome humours with them to disturb that service which could only preserve them; but, on the contrary, would unite and conspire together to make the king superior to his and their enemies: and as to the advancing any propositions to peace (which there could be no doubt but they would be inclined to, nor would it be fit for his majesty to oppose), there could be no inconvenience, since their appearing in it would but draw reproach from those at Westminster, who would never give them any answer, nor look upon them under any notion but as private persons and deserters of the parliament, without any qualification to treat or to be treated with; which would provoke those at Oxford, and by degrees stir up more animosities between them. Clar. Hist. vol. ii. p. 318.

vious assertion in his proclamation of summons, insinuated that the two houses sitting at Westminster were not a legal convention, the parliament refused all treaty upon such terms:—"They would never own, they said, the members who had deserted them. Moreover, they thought themselves bound to let his majesty know, that as their continuance as a parliament was settled by law, they were resolved with their lives and fortunes to maintain their just rights and power; and did beseech him to be assured, that his royal and hearty concurrence would be the most effectual and ready means to procure a firm and lasting peace, and of begetting a right understanding between his majesty and his people; without which his most earnest professions, and their most real intentions, concerning the same, must necessarily be frustrated: and in case, added they, your majesty's three kingdoms should by reason thereof remain in this sad and bleeding condition, tending to their ruin, your majesty cannot be the last nor the least sufferer."

The assembly at Oxford, exulting in what they termed their repeated solicitations for peace, published two long declarations: one contained the history of the beforementioned proceedings; and the other, with many acrimonious aspersions on the conduct of the parliament, tended to prove it no free convention. Both these performances are so frivolous and quibbling, so filled with contradictions, and so like those which had been already set forth on the subject, that it was easy to perceive from what particular quarter they came. The parliament also, on their side, published a manifesto, wherein they shewed, from the style of the letters written to the earl of Essex, from expressions in the king's late message, and especially from an intercepted letter of the lord Digby, that, under the specious colour of proposing peace, a snare had been laid to engage them tacitly to disavow their power and authority. On the first meeting of the Oxford assembly, they passed some angry votes against the Scots; and, on the refusal of the two houses at Westminster to treat, they likewise voted, That all those lords and commons yet remaining at Westminster, who had consented to the raising of forces under the command of the earl of Essex, or to the making and using a new great seal, (for the parliament at Westminster had some time before thought fit to cause a new great seal to be made), or had been abetting, aiding, and assisting to the invasion of the Scots, were guilty of treason.

But notwithstanding the zeal which this assembly had manifested for the king's service, the harmony and confidence which appeared between them was far from real: the king had in vain importuned them to assume to themselves solely the name of the parliament of England, or to declare the assembly at Westminster an illegal convention; and though he had again and again recommended to them an entire trust and confidence in him, as a better expedient for the peace and preservation of the kingdom than fears and jealousies, yet they discovered so much of the latter of these affections, as to petition him to reprint the protestation he had made at the head of his army at Wellington, with his declarations concerning his resolutions to maintain and defend the true reformed Protestant religion; that he would again promise to call a national synod, to establish the government and peace of the church, to whom should be recommended a care for the ease of tender consciences; that he would again promise to keep inviolable the laws of the land; that he would declare the sincerity of his royal heart concerning his intention to consult frequently with parliament; that he would promise to consent to an act to secure the subject from loans, taxes, and other impositions, which had been submitted to as exigencies of war and necessity; and that he would retain his pious endeavours to procure the peace of the kingdom, nor suffer them to be removed by any advantages, or prosperous success. It is manifest from the conduct of this assembly, that though they had exerted their utmost endeavours to support the royal cause, yet, in their own judgement, it was at the peril of the liberties of the constitution, whose security they sacrificed to private interest, passion, and prejudice. Having finished the business for which they were summoned, they were prorogued, on the 14th of April, 1644, to the ensuing month of October, after having sat near three months.

Amongst the fruitless attempts to procure a peace, which should reinstate the king in the possession of his prerogatives, the count of Harcourt was sent, with the title of ambassador extraordinary, to England. After some conferences had passed between him and the king, he signified in writing to the earl of Northumberland, that, having proposed to his majesty, from the king and queen-regent of France, the making a peace with his subjects, he found him disposed to enter into negociation; and that if both houses would let him (the count of Harcourt) know the cause which had obliged them to have recourse to arms, he would gladly interpose to pacify differences, by expedients the most conformable to the ancient laws, customs, and ordinances of this realm which could be proposed on all parts. To this impertinent interposition the parliament condescendingly answered, That the lords and commons assembled in the parliament of England would always with due respect acknowledge such good affections as from the king his master, or the queen his mistress, should be at any time expressed to the king and realm of England; that they desired nothing more than such a peace as might as well procure honour and happiness to the king, as the preservation of the true reformed religion, the privileges of parliament, and the liberty of the subject; and when the prince D'Harcourt should, from and in the name of the king his master, propose any thing to the lords and commons assembled in the parliament of England, they would do thereupon that which should be fit, and which should justify their proceedings to all the world. The count not caring to own the two houses for a parliament, no credentials were produced; and thus ended this frivolous business.

This winter the famous Pym died; a man as much hated by one party, as he was respected by the other. At London, he was considered as the victim to national liberty, who had abridged his life by incessant labours for the interests of his country: at Oxford he was believed (such is the force of prejudice) to have been struck with an uncommon disease, and to have been consumed with vermin; as a mark of divine vengeance, for his multiplied crimes and treasons. He had been so little studious of improving his private fortune in the civil wars, that the parliament thought themselves obliged, from gratitude, to pay the debts which he had contracted. Mr. Pym was interred in Westminster Abbey, to which place his body was carried by six members of the lower house, and attended by most of the lords and commons sitting at Westminster (g).

We now return to the military operations, which, during the winter, were carried on with vigour in several places, notwithstanding the severity of the season.

The forces brought from Ireland were landed at Mostyn, in North Wales; and being put under the command of lord Biron, they besieged and took the castles of Hawarden, Beeston, Acton, and Deddington House. No place in Cheshire or the neighbourhood now adhered to the parliament, except Nantwich: and to this town Biron laid siege during the depth of winter. Sir Thomas Fairfax, alarmed at so considerable a progress of the royalists, assembled an army of four thousand men in Yorkshire, and having joined sir William Brereton, was approaching to the camp of the enemy. Biron and his soldiers, elated with successes obtained in Ireland, had entertained the most profound contempt for the parliamentay forces; a disposition which, if confined to the army, may be regarded as a good presage of victory; but if it extend to the general, is the most probable forerunner of a defeat. Fairfax suddenly attacked the camp of the royalists, on the 25th of January, 1644. The swelling of the river by a thaw divided one part of the army from the other. That part exposed to Fairfax, being beaten from their post, retired into the church of Acton, and were all (to the number of fifteen hundred men, besides officers) taken prisoners: the other retreated with precipitation. And thus was dissipated, or rendered useless, that body of forces which had been drawn from Ireland; and the parliamentary party revived in the north-west counties of England.

The invasion from Scotland was attended with consequences of much greater importance. The Scots, having summoned in vain the town of Newcastle, which was fortified by the vigilance of sir Thomas Glenham, passed the Tyne, on the 22nd of February; and faced the marquis (g) The house of commons passed an order, That a monument should be prepared for him at the expence of the commonwealth; that he should be interred in Westminster Abbey, without any charge for breaking open the ground; and that the speaker, with the whole house, should accompany his body to interment. Journals of the Commons.

of Newcastle, who lay at Durham with an army of fourteen thousand men. After some military operations, in which that nobleman reduced the enemy to difficulties for forage and provisions, he received intelligence of a great disaster which had befallen his forces in Yorkshire. Colonel Bellasis, whom he had left with a considerable body of troops, was totally routed at Selby by sir Thomas Fairfax, on the 11th of April, who had returned from Cheshire with his victorious forces. Afraid of being inclosed between two armies, Newcastle retreated; and Leven having joined lord Fairfax, they sat down before York, to which the army of the loyalists had retired. But as the parliamentary and Scottish forces were not numerous enough to invest so large a town, divided by a river, they contented themselves with incommoding it by a loose blockade; and affairs remained, for some time, in suspense between these opposite armies.

During this winter and spring, other parts of the kingdom had also been infested with war. Sir Ralph Hopetoun, now made a peer, having assembled an army of fourteen thousand men, endeavoured to break into Sussex, Kent, and the southern association; but sir William Waller fell upon him at Cherington, between Farnham and Winchester, and gave him a defeat, of considerable importance, on the 29th of March. In another quarter, siege being laid to Newark, by the parliamentary forces, prince Rupert prepared himself for relieving a town of such consequence, which alone preserved the communication open between the king's southern and northern quarters. Prince Rupert, by his activity and celerity, broke through the enemy, relieved the town, and gained considerable advantage over that army of the parliament, on the 21st of March.

But though fortune seemed to have divided her favours between the parties, the king found himself, in the main, a considerable loser by this winter campaign; and he prognosticated a still worse event from the ensuing summer. The preparations of the parliament were great, and exceeded the slender resources of which he was possessed. In the eastern association, they levied fourteen thousand men, under the earl of Manchester, seconded by Oliver Cromwell. An army of ten thousand men, under Essex, another of nearly the same force under Waller, was assembled in the neighbourhood of London. The former was destined to oppose the king: the latter was appointed to march into the west, where prince Maurice, with a small army which went continually to decay, was spending his time in vain before Lyme, an inconsiderable town upon the sea coast. The utmost efforts of the king could not raise above ten thousand men at Oxford; and on their sword chiefly, during the campaign, were these to depend for subsistence.

The queen, terrified with the dangers which every way environed her, and afraid of being enclosed in Oxford, in the middle of the kingdom, fled to Exeter, where she hoped to be delivered unmolested of the child with which she was now pregnant, and whence she had the means of an easy escape into France, if pressed by the forces of the parliament. She knew the implacable hatred which that assembly, on account of her religion and her credit with the king, had all along borne her. Last summer the commons had sent up to the peers an impeachment of high treason against her; because she had assisted her husband with arms and ammunition, which she had bought in Holland.

The earl of Manchester, having taken Lincoln, had united his army to that of Leven and Fairfax; and York was now closely besieged by their combined forces. That town, though vigorously defended by Newcastle, was reduced to extremity; and the parliamentary generals, after enduring great losses and fatigues, flattered themselves that all their labours would at last be crowned by this important conquest. On a sudden, they were alarmed by the approach of prince Rupert; who having vigorously exerted himself in Lancashire and Cheshire, had collected a considerable army; and, joining sir Charles Lucas, who commanded Newcastle's horse, hastened to the relief of York, with an army of twenty thousand men. The Scottish and parliamentary generals raised the siege, and, drawing up on Marston Moor, purposed to give battle to the royalists. Prince Rupert approached the town by another quarter, and, interposing the river Ouse between him and the enemy, safely joined his forces to those of Newcastle. The marquis endeavoured to persuade the prince, that, having so successfully effected his purpose, he ought to be content with the present advantages, and leave the enemy, now much diminished by their losses, and discouraged by their ill success, to dissolve by those mutual dissensions which had begun to take place among them. The prince, whose martial disposition was not sufficiently tempered with prudence, nor softened by complaisance, pretending positive orders from the king, without deigning to consult with Newcastle, immediately issued orders, for battle, and led out an army to Marston Moor, on the 2nd of July. This action was obstinately disputed between the most numerous armies that were engaged during the course of these wars; nor were the forces on each side much different in number. Fifty thousand British troops were led to mutual slaughter; and the victory seemed long undecided between them. Prince Rupert, who commanded the right wing of the royalists, was opposed to Cromwell, who conducted the choice troops of the parliament, enured to danger under that determined leader, animated by zeal, and confirmed by the most rigid discipline. After a short combat, the cavalry of the royalists gave way; and such of the infantry as stood next them were likewise borne down, and put to flight. Newcastle's regiment alone, resolute to conquer or to perish, obstinately kept their ground, and maintained by their dead bodies, the same order in which they had at first been ranged. In the other wing, sir Thomas Fairfax and colonel Lambert, with some troops, broke through the royalists; and, transported by the ardour of pursuit, soon reached their victorious friends, engaged also in pursuit of the enemy. But after that tempest was past, Lucas, who commanded the royalists in this wing, restoring order to his broken forces, made a furious attack on the parliamentary cavalry, threw them into disorder, pushed them upon their own infantry, and put that whole wing to rout. When ready to seize on their carriages and baggage, he perceived Cromwell, who was now returned from pursuit of the other wing. Both sides were not a little surprized to find that they must again renew the combat for that victory which each of them thought they had already obtained. The front of the battle was now exactly counterchanged; and each army occupied the ground which had been possessed by the enemy at the beginning of the day. This second battle was equally furious and desperate with the first: but after the utmost efforts of courage by both parties, victory wholly turned to the side of the parliament. In this engagement four thousand royalists were slain, and fifteen hundred taken prisoners, with the whole train of artillery. The parliament lost three hundred men; many of their officers were wounded, but few of them mortally. Amongst the latter were Charles Fairfax, brother to sir Thomas, who died in three or four days of the wounds he received; and major Fairfax, a more distant relation, some time after.

This event was in itself a mighty blow to the king; but proved more fatal in its consequences; for the succeeding frantic conduct of the two generals, Rupert and Newcastle, completed the ruin of his fortunes. The marquis of Newcastle became entirely lost to the royal cause.—Equally vain and intemperate, and equally disappointed in their ambitious hopes, the very morning after the battle the following sullen messages passed between them: The prince sent the marquis word, That he was determined to march away immediately with his army towards the king; the marquis returned for answer, That he was determined to retire from his command, and, without loss of time, to leave the kingdom. These intentions were with the same precipitation executed as formed.

The marquis of Newcastle, the ornament of the court and of his order, had been engaged, contrary to the natural bent of his disposition, into these military operations, merely by a high sense of honour, and a personal regard to his master. The dangers of war were disregarded by his valour; but its fatigues were oppressive to his natural indolence. Munificent and generous in his expence; polite and elegant in his taste; courteous and humane in his behaviour; he brought a great accession of friends and of credit to the party which he embraced. But amidst all the hurry of action, his inclinations were secretly drawn to the soft arts of peace, in which he took delight; and the charms of poetry, music, and conversation, often stole him from his rougher occupations. When prince Rupert, contrary to his advice, resolved on this battle, and issued all orders, without communicating his intentions to him; he took the field, but, he said, merely as a volunteer; and, except by his personal courage, which shone out with lustre, lustre, he had no share in the action. Enraged to find that all his successful labours were rendered abortive by one act of fatal temerity, terrified with the prospect of renewing his pains and fatigue, he resolved no longer to maintain the few resources which remained to a desperate cause, and thought that the same regard to honour, which had at first called him to arms, now required him to abandon a party, where he met with such unworthy treatment. Next morning early he went to Scarborough, where himself, his brother, his two sons, King (his lieutenant-general), five other noblemen, with Bramhall, bishop of Londonderry, and two commoners, embarked in a small vessel for Hamburgh. During the ensuing years, till the restoration, he lived abroad in great necessity, and saw, with indifference, his opulent fortune sequestered by those who assumed the government of England. He disdained, by submission or composition, to show obeisance to their authority; and the least favourable censors of his merit allowed, that the fidelity and services of a whole life had sufficiently atoned for one rash action into which his passion had betrayed him.

Prince Rupert drew off the remains of his army, and retired into Lancashire. Glenham was obliged to surrender York on the 16th of July; and he marched out his garrison with all the honours of war. Lord Fairfax, remaining in the city, established his government in that whole county, and sent a thousand horse into Lancashire, to join with the parliamentary forces in that quarter, and attend the motions of prince Rupert: the Scottish army marched northwards, in order to join the earl of Calendar, who was advancing with ten thousand additional forces; and to reduce the town of Newcastle, which they took by storm; a circumstance of great importance to the city of London, whose inhabitants had been much distressed by the deprivation of fire fuel with which they had been supplied from that town (h). The earl of Manchester, with Cromwell, to whom the fame of this great victory was chiefly ascribed, and who was wounded in the action, returned to the eastern association, in order to recruit his army.

While these events passed in the north, the king's affairs in the south were conducted with more success and greater abilities. Ruthven, a Scotchman, who had been created earl of Brentford, acted, under the king, as general.

The parliament soon completed their two armies commanded by Essex and Waller. The great zeal of the city facilitated this undertaking. Many speeches were made to the citizens by the parliamentary leaders, in order to excite their ardour. Hollis, in particular, exhorted them not to spare, on this important occasion, either their purses, their persons, or their prayers; and, in general, it must be confessed, they were sufficiently liberal in all these contributions. The two generals had orders to march with their combined armies towards Oxford; and, if the king retired into that city, to lay siege to it, and by one enterprize put a period to the war. The king, leaving a numerous garrison in Oxford, passed with dexterity, on the 3rd of June, between the two armies, which had taken Abingdon, and had inclosed him on both sides. He marched towards Worcester; and Waller received orders from Essex to follow him and watch his motions; while himself marched into the west in quest of prince Maurice. Waller had approached within two miles of the royal camp, and was only separated from it by the Severn, when he received intelligence that the king was advanced to Bewdley, and had directed his course towards Shrewsbury. In order to prevent him, Waller immediately dislodged, and hastened by quick marches to that town; while the king, suddenly returning upon his own footsteps, reached Oxford; and having reinforced his army from that garrison, now in his turn marched out in quest of Waller. The two armies faced each other at Cropredy Bridge near Banbury in Oxfordshire on the 29th of June; but the Charwell ran between them. Next day the king decamped, and marched towards Daventry. Waller ordered a considerable detachment to pass the bridge, with an intention of falling on the rear of the royalists. He was repulsed, routed, and pursued with considerable loss. Disheartened with this blow, his army decayed and melted away by desertion; and the king thought he might safely leave it, and march westward against Essex. That general, having obliged prince Maurice to raise the siege of Lyme, having taken Weymouth and Taunton, advanced still in his conquests, and met with no equal opposition. The king followed him, and having reinforced his army from all quarters, appeared in the field with an army superior to that of the parliament. Essex, retreating into Cornwal, informed the parliament of his danger, and desired them to send an army, which might fall on the king's rear. General Middleton received a commission to execute that service; but came too late. Essex's army, cooped up in a narrow corner at Lestwithiel, deprived of all forage and provisions, and seeing no prospect of succour, was reduced to the last extremity. The king pressed them on one side; prince Maurice on another; sir Richard Granville on a third. Essex, Robarts, and some of the principal officers, escaped in a boat to Plymouth: Balfour with his horse passed the king's out-posts, in a thick mist, and got safely to the garrison of his own party. The foot under Skippon were obliged to surrender their arms, artillery, baggage, ammunition, on the first of September; and being conducted to the parliament's quarters, were dismissed. By this advantage, which was much boasted of, the king, besides the honour of the enterprize, obtained what he stood extremely in need of: the parliament, having preserved the men, lost what they could easily repair.

No sooner did this intelligence reach London, than the committee of the two kingdoms voted thanks to Essex for his fidelity, courage, and conduct; and this method of proceeding, no less politic than magnanimous, was preserved by the parliament throughout the whole course of the war. Equally indulgent to their friends and rigorous to their enemies, they employed, with success, these two powerful engines of reward and punishment, in confirmation of their authority.

That the king might have less reason to exult in the advantages which he had obtained in the west, the parliament opposed to him very numerous forces. Having armed afresh Essex's subdued, but not disheartened troops, they ordered Manchester and Cromwell to march with their recruited forces from the eastern association; and joining their armies to those of Waller and Middleton, as well as of Essex, offer battle to the king. Charles chose his post at Newbury, where the parliamentary armies, under the earl of Manchester, attacked him with great vigour on the 27th of October; and that town was a second time the scene of the bloody animosities of the English. Essex's soldiers, exhorting one another to repair their broken honour, and revenge the disgrace of Lestwithiel, made an impetuous assault on the royalists; and having recovered some of their cannon, lost in Cornwal, could not forbear embracing them with tears of joy. Though the king's troops defended themselves with valour, they were overpowered by numbers; and the night coming seasonably to their relief, prevented a total overthrow. Charles, leaving his baggage and cannon in Dennington Castle, near Newbury, retreated to Wallingford, and thence to Oxford. There prince Rupert and the earl of Northampton joined him, with considerable bodies of cavalry. Strengthened by this reinforcement, he ventured to advance towards the enemy, now employed before Dennington Castle. Essex, detained by sickness, had not joined the army since his misfortune in Cornwal. Manchester, who commanded, though his forces were much superior to those of the king, declined an engagement, and rejected Cromwell's advice, who earnestly pressed him not to neglect so favourable an opportunity of finishing the war. The king's army, by bringing off their cannon from Dennington Castle, in the face of the enemy, seemed to have sufficiently repaired the honour which they had lost at Newbury; and Charles, having the satisfaction to excite, between Manchester and Cromwell, equal animosities with those which formerly took place between Essex and Waller, distributed his army into winter quarters.

Those contests among the parliamentary generals, which had disturbed their military operations, were renewed in London during the winter season; and each being supported by his own faction, their mutual reproaches and accusations agitated the whole city and parliament. There had long prevailed, in that party, a secret distinction, which, though the dread of the king's power had hitherto suppressed it, yet, in proportion as the hopes of success became nearer and more immediate, began to discover itself, with high contest and animosity. The INDEPENDENTS, who had, at first, taken shelter and concealed themselves under the wings of the PRESBYTERIANS, now evidently appeared a distinct party, and betrayed very different views and pretensions. We must here endeavour to explain the genius of this party, and of its leaders, who henceforth occupy the scene of action.

During those times it was impossible to set bounds to these holy fervours, or confine what was directed towards an infinite and a supernatural object. Every man endeavoured to distinguish himself beyond his fellows, and to arrive at a higher pitch of holiness and perfection. In proportion to its degree of zeal, each sect became dangerous and destructive; and as the Independents went a note higher than the Presbyterians, they could less be restrained within any bounds of temper and moderation. From this distinction, as from a first principle, were derived, by a necessary consequence, all the other differences of these two sects.

The Independents rejected all ecclesiastical establishments, and would admit of no spiritual courts, no government among pastors, no interposition of the magistrate in religious concerns, no fixed encouragement annexed to any system of doctrines or opinions. According to their principles, each congregation, united voluntarily and by spiritual ties, composed, within itself, a separate church, and exercised a jurisdiction over its own pastor and its own members. The election alone of the congregation was sufficient to bestow the sacerdotal character; and as all essential distinction was denied between the laity and the clergy, no ceremony, no institution, no vocation, but that of a call from a particular congregation, no imposition of hands was supposed requisite to convey a right to holy orders. The Presbyterians were led to reject the authority of prelates, to throw off the restraint of liturgies, to retrench ceremonies, to limit the riches and authority of the priestly office: the Independents, exalted to a higher pitch, abolished ecclesiastical government, disdained creeds and systems, neglected every ceremony, and confounded all ranks and orders. The soldier, the merchant, the mechanic, indulging the fervours of zeal, and guided by the illapses of the Spirit, resigned himself to an inward and superior direction, and was consecrated, in a manner, by an immediate intercourse and communication with Heaven.

The Catholics, pretending to an infallible guide, had justified, upon that principle, their doctrine and practice of persecution: the presbyterians, imagining that such clear and certain tenets, as they themselves adopted, could be rejected only from a criminal and pertinacious obstinacy, had hitherto gratified, to the full, their zeal, in a like doctrine and practice: the independents, from the extremity of the same zeal, were led into the milder principles of toleration. Their mind, set afloat in the wide sea of inspiration, could confine itself within no certain limits; and the same variations, in which an enthusiast indulged himself, he was apt, by a natural train of thinking, to permit in others. Of all christian sects this was the first, which, during its prosperity, as well as its adversity, always adopted the principle of toleration.

Popery and prelacy alone, whose genius seemed to tend towards superstition, were treated by the Independents with rigour. The doctrine of predestination was deemed by them essential to all religion. In these opinions, the whole sectaries, amidst all other differences, unanimously concurred.

The political system of the Independents kept pace with their religious. Not content with confining to very narrow limits, the power of the crown, and reducing the king to the rank of first magistrate, which was the project of the Presbyterians; this sect, more ardent in the pursuit of liberty, aspired to a total abolition of the monarchy, and even of the aristocracy; and projected an entire equality of rank and order, in a republic, quite free and independent. In consequence of this scheme, they were declared enemies to all proposals for peace, except on such terms as, they knew, it was impossible to obtain; and they adhered to that maxim, which is, in the main, prudent and political, that whoever draws the sword against his sovereign, should throw away the scabbard. By terrifying others with the fear of vengeance from the offended prince, they had engaged great numbers into the opposition against peace, than had adopted their other principles with regard to government and religion. And the great success, which had already attended the arms of the parliament, and the greater, which was soon expected, confirmed them still further in ther views.

Sir Harry Vane, Oliver Cromwell, Nathanael Fiennes, and Oliver St. John, the solicitor-general, were regarded as the leaders of the Independents. The earl of Essex, disgusted with a war, of which he began to foresee the pernicious consequences, adhered to the Presbyterians, and promoted every reasonable plan of accommodation. The earl of Northumberland, fond of his rank and dignity, regarded with horror a scheme, which, if it took place, would confound himself and his family with the lowest in the kingdom. The earls of Warwick, and Denbigh, sir Philip Stapleton, sir William Waller, Hollis, Massay, Whitlocke, Mainard, Glyn, had embraced the same sentiments. In the parliament, a considerable majority, and a much greater in the nation, were attached to the Presbyterian party; and it was only by cunning and deceit at first, and afterwards by military violence, that the Independents could entertain any hopes of success.

The earl of Manchester, provoked at the impeachment which the king had lodged against him, had long forwarded the war with alacrity; but, being a man of humanity and good principles, the view of public calamities, and the prospect of a total subversion of government, began to moderate his ardour, and inclined him to promote peace on any safe or honourable terms. He was even suspected, in the field, not to have pushed to the utmost against the king, the advantages obtained by the arms of the parliament; and Cromwell, in the public debates, revived the accusation, that this nobleman had wilfully neglected at Dennington Castle a favourable opportunity of finishing the war by a total defeat of the royalists. "I showed him evidently," said Cromwell, "how this success might be obtained; and only desired leave, with my own brigade of horse, to charge the king's army in their retreat; leaving it in the earl's choice, if he thought proper, to remain neuter with the rest of his forces: but, notwithstanding my importunity, he positively refused his consent; and gave no other reason but that, if we met with a defeat, there was an end of our pretensions: we should all be rebels and traitors, and be executed and forfeited by law."

Manchester, by way of recrimination, informed the parliament, that, at another time, Cromwell having proposed some scheme, to which it seemed improbable the parliament would agree, he insisted and said, "My lord, if you will stick firm to honest men, you shall find yourself at the head of an army, which shall give law both to king and parliament. This discourse," continued Manchester, "made the greater impression on me, because I knew the lieutenant-general to be a man of very deep designs; and he has even ventured to tell me, that it never would be well with England till I were Mr. Montague, and there were ne'er a lord or peer in the kingdom." So full was Cromwell of these republican projects, that, notwithstanding his habits of profound dissimulation, he could not so carefully guard his expressions, but that sometimes his favourite notions would escape him.

These violent dissensions brought matters to extremity, and pushed the Independents to the execution of their designs. The present generals, they thought, were more desirous of protracting than finishing the war; and having entertained a scheme for preserving still some balance in the constitution, they were afraid of entirely subduing the king, and reducing him to a condition where he should not be entitled to ask any concessions. A new model alone of the army could bring complete victory to the parliament, and free the nation from those calamities under which it laboured. But how to effect this project was the difficulty. The authority, as well as merits, of Essex was very great with the parliament. Not only he had served them all along with the most exact and scrupulous honour: it was, in some measure, owing to his popularity, that they had ever been enabled to levy an army, or make head against the royal cause. Manchester, Warwick, and the other commanders, had likewise great credit with the public; nor were there any hopes of prevailing over them, but by laying the plan of an oblique and artificial attack, which would conceal the real purpose of their antagonists. The Scots and Scottish commissioners, jealous of the progress of the Independents, were a new obstacle; which, without the utmost art and subtlety, it would be difficult to surmount. The methods by which this intrigue was conducted are so singular, and show so fully the genius of the age, that we shall extract a detail of them from lord Clarendon.

A fast, on the last Wednesday of every month, had been ordered by the parliament at the beginning of these commotions; and their preachers, on that day, were careful to keep alive the popular prejudices entertained against the king, against prelacy, and against popery. The king, that he might combat the parliament with their own weapons, appointed likewise a monthly fast, when the people should be instructed in the duties of loyalty and of submission to the higher powers; and he chose the second Friday of every month for the devotion of the royalists. It was now proposed and carried in parliament, by the Independents, that a new and more solemn fast should be voted; when they should implore the divine assistance for extricating them from those perplexities in which they were at present involved. On that day, the preachers, after many political prayers, took care to treat of the reigning divisions in the parliament, and ascribed them entirely to the selfish ends pursued by the members. In the hands of those members, they said, are lodged all the considerable commands of the army, all the lucrative offices in the civil administration; and while the nation is falling every day into poverty, and groans under an insupportable load of taxes, these men multiply possession on possession, and will, in a little time, be masters of all the wealth of the kingdom. That such persons, who fatten on the calamities of their country, will ever embrace any effectual measure for bringing them to a period, or ensuring final success to the war, cannot reasonably be expected. Lingering expedients alone will be pursued; and operations in the field concurring, in the same pernicious end, with deliberations in the cabinet, civil commotions will for ever be perpetuated in the nation. After exaggerating these disorders, the ministers returned to their prayers; and besought the Lord, that he would take his own work into his own hand; and if the instruments, whom he had hitherto employed, were not worthy to bring to a conclusion so glorious a design, that he would inspire others more fit, who might perfect what was begun, and by establishing true religion, put a speedy period to the public miseries.

On the day subsequent to these devout animadversions, when the parliament met, a new spirit appeared in the looks of many. Sir Henry Vane told the commons, that if ever God appeared to them, it was in the ordinances of yesterday: that, as he was credibly informed by many, who had been present in different congregations, the same lamentations and discourses, which the godly preachers had made before them, had been heard in other churches: that so remarkable a concurrence could proceed only from the immediate operation of the Holy Spirit: that he therefore intreated them, in vindication of their own honour, in consideration of their duty to God and their country, to lay aside all private ends, and renounce every office attended with profit or advantage: that the absence of so many members, occupied in different employments, had rendered the house extremely thin, and diminished the authority of their determinations: and that he could not forbear, for his own part, accusing himself as one who enjoyed a gainful office, that of treasurer of the navy; and though he was possessed of it before the civil commotions, and owed it not to the favour of the parliament, yet was he ready to resign it, and to sacrifice, to the welfare of his country, every consideration of private interest and advantage.

Cromwell next commended the preachers for having dealt with them plainly and impartially, and told them of their errors, of which they were so unwilling to be informed. Though they dwelt on many things, he said, on which he had never before reflected; yet, upon revolving them, he could not but confess, that, till there were a perfect reformation in these particulars, nothing which they undertook could possibly prosper. The parliament, no doubt, continued he, had done wisely on the commencement of the war, in engaging several of its members in the most dangerous parts of it, and thereby satisfying the nation, that they intended to share all hazards with the meanest of the people. But affairs are now changed. During the progress of military operations, there have arisen, in the parliamentary armies, many excellent officers, who are qualified for higher commands than they are now possessed of. And though it becomes not men, engaged in such a cause, to put trust in the arm of flesh, yet he could assure them, that their troops contained generals fit to command in any enterprize in Christendom. The army indeed, he was sorry to say it, did not correspond, by its discipline, to the merit of the officers; nor were there any hopes, till the present vices and disorders, which prevail among the soldiers, were repressed by a new model, that their forces would ever be attended with signal success in any undertaking.

In opposition to this reasoning of the Independents, many of the Presbyterians shewed the inconvenience and danger of the projected alteration. Whitlocke, in particular, a man of honour, who loved his country, though in every change of government he always adhered to the ruling power, said, that besides the ingratitude of discarding, and that by fraud and artifice, so many noble persons, to whom the parliament had hitherto owed its chief support; they would find it extremely difficult to supply the place of men, now formed by experience to command and authority: that the rank alone, possessed by such as were members of either house, prevented envy, retained the army in obedience, and gave weight to military orders: that greater confidence might safely be reposed in men of family and fortune, than in mere adventurers, who would be apt to entertain separate views from those which were embraced by the persons who employed them: that no maxim of policy was more undisputed, than the necessity of preserving an inseparable connexion between the civil and military powers, and of retaining the latter in strict subordination to the former: that the Greeks and Romans, the wisest and most passionate lovers of liberty, had ever entrusted to their senators the command of armies, and had maintained an unconquerable jealousy of all mercenary forces: and that such men alone, whose interests were involved in those of the public, and who possessed a vote in the civil deliberations, would sufficiently respect the authority of parliament, and never could be tempted to turn the sword against those by whom it was committed to them.

Notwithstanding these reasonings, a committee was chosen to frame what was called the "Self-denying ordinance," by which the members of both houses were excluded from all civil and military employments, except a few offices which were specified. This ordinance was the subject of great debate, and, for a long time, rent the parliament and city into factions. But, at last, by the prevalence of envy with some; with others of false modesty; with a great many, of the republican and independent views; it passed the house of commons, and was sent to the upper house. The peers, though the scheme was, in part, levelled against their order, yet possessed so little authority, that they durst not persevere in opposing the resolution of the commons; and they thought it better policy, by an unlimited compliance, to ward off that ruin which they saw approaching. The ordinance, therefore, having passed both houses, Essex, Warwick, Manchester, Denbigh, Waller, Brereton, and many others, resigned their commands, and received the thanks of parliament for their good services. A pension of ten thousand pounds a year was settled on Essex.

It was agreed, in the beginning of 1645, to recruit the army to twenty-two thousand men; and sir Thomas Fairfax was appointed general. It is remarkable that his commission did not run, like that of Essex, in the name of the king and parliament, but in that of the parliament alone: and the article concerning the safety of the king's person was omitted. So much had animosities encreased between the parties. Cromwell, being a member of the lower house, should have been discarded with the others; but this impartiality would have disappointed all the views of those who had introduced the self-denying ordinance. He was saved by a subtilty, and by that political craft, in which he was so eminent. At the time when the other officers resigned their commissions, care was taken that he should be sent with a body of horse, to relieve Taunton, besieged by the royalists. His absence being remarked, orders were dispatched for his immediate attendance in parliament; and the new general was directed to employ some other officer in that service. A ready compliance was feigned; and the very day was named, on which, it was averred, he would take his place in the house. But Fairfax, having appointed a rendezvous of the army, wrote to the parliament, and desired leave to retain, for some days, lieutenant-general Cromwell, whose advice, he said, would be useful, in supplying the place of those officers who had resigned. Shortly after, he begged, with much earnestness, that they would allow Cromwell to serve that campaign. And thus the Independents, though the minority, prevailed over the Presbyterians, and bestowed the whole military authority, in appearance, upon Fairfax; in reality, upon Cromwell.

Fairfax was a person equally eminent for courage and for humanity; and though strongly infected with prejudices, or principles derived from religious and party zeal, he seems never, in the course of his public conduct, to have been diverted, by private interest or ambition, from adhering strictly to these principles. Sincere in his professions; fessions; disinterested in his views; open in his conduct; he had formed one of the most shining characters of the age; had not the extreme narrowness of his genius, in every thing but in war, and his embarrassed and confused elocution on every occasion but when he gave orders, diminished the lustre of his merit, and rendered the part which he acted, even when vested with the supreme command, but secondary and subordinate.

Cromwell, by whose sagacity and insinuation Fairfax was entirely governed, is one of the most eminent and most singular personages that occurs in history: the strokes of his character are as open and strongly marked, as the schemes of his conduct were, during the time, dark and impenetrable. His extensive capacity enabled him to form the most enlarged projects: his enterprising genius was not dismayed with the boldest and most dangerous. Carried, by his natural temper, to magnanimity, to grandeur, and to an imperious and domineering policy; he yet knew, when necessary, to employ the most profound dissimulation, the most oblique and refined artifice, the semblance of the greatest moderation and simplicity. A friend to justice, though his public conduct was one continued violation of it; devoted to religion, though he perpetually employed it as the instrument of his ambition; he was engaged in crimes from the prospect of sovereign power, a temptation which is, in general, irresistible to human nature. And by using well that authority which he had attained, he has lessened, if not overpowered, our detestation of his enormities, by our admiration of his success and of his genius.

During this important transaction of the self-denying ordinance, the negociations for peace were likewise carried on, though with small hopes of success. The king having sent two messages, one from Evesham, on the 4th of July, 1644, another from Tavistock, on the 8th of September following, desiring a treaty, the parliament dispatched commissioners to Oxford, with proposals as high as if they had obtained a complete victory. The advantages gained during the campaign, and the great distresses of the royalists, had much elevated their hopes; and they were resolved to repose no trust in men inflamed with the highest animosity against them, and who, were they possessed of power, were fully authorized by law to punish all their opponents as rebels and traitors.

The king, when he considered the proposals and the disposition of the parliament, could not expect any accommodation, and had no prospect but of war, or of total submission and subjection: yet, in order to satisfy his own party, who were impatient for peace, he agreed to send the duke of Richmond and earl of Southampton, with an answer to the proposals of the parliament, and at the same time to desire a treaty upon their mutual demands and pretensions. It now became necessary for him to retract his former declaration, that the two houses at Westminster were not a free parliament; and accordingly he was induced, though with great reluctance, to give them, in his answer, the appellation of the parliament of England. But it appeared afterwards, by a letter which he wrote to the queen, and of which a copy was taken at Naseby, that he secretly entered an explanatory protest in his council-book; and he pretended that, though he had called them the parliament, he had not thereby acknowledged them for such (i). This subtlety sufficiently marks the character of Charles, and justly loads him with the imputation of insincerity.

The time of place and treaty being settled, sixteen commissioners from the king met at Uxbridge, with twelve authorised by the parliament, attended by the Scottish commissioners. It was agreed, that the Scottish and parliamentary commissioners should give in their demands, with regard to three important articles, religion, the militia, and Ireland; and that these should be successively discussed in conference with the king's commissioners. It was soon found impracticable to come to any agreement with regard to any of these articles.

In the summer 1643, while the negociations were carried on with Scotland, the parliament had summoned an assembly at Westminster, consisting of one hundred and twenty-one divines and thirty laymen, celebrated in their party for piety and learning. By their advice, alterations were made in the thirty-nine articles, or in the metaphysical doctrines of the church; and, what was of greater importance, the liturgy was entirely abolished, and, in its stead, a new directory for worship was established; by which, suitably to the spirit of the Puritans, the utmost liberty, both in praying and preaching, was indulged to the public teachers. By the solemn league and covenant, episcopacy was abjured, as destructive of all true piety; and a national engagement, attended with every circumstance that could render a promise sacred and obligatory, was entered into with the Scots, never to suffer its re-admission. All these measures shewed little spirit of accommodation in the parliament; and the king's commissioners were not surprised to find the establishment of presbytery and the directory positively demanded, together with the subscription of the covenant, both by the king and kingdom.

Had Charles been of a disposition to neglect all theological controversy, he yet had been obliged, in good policy, to adhere to episcopal jurisdiction, not only because it was favourable to monarchy, but because all his adherents were devoted to it; and to abandon them, in what they regarded as so important an article, was for ever to relinquish their friendship and assistance. But Charles had never attained such enlarged principles. He deemed bishops essential to the very being of a christian church; and he thought himself bound, by more sacred ties than those of policy, or even of honour, to the support of that order. His concessions, therefore, on this head, he judged sufficient, when he agreed that an indulgence should be given to tender consciences with regard to ceremonies; that the bishops should exercise no act of jurisdiction or ordination, without the consent and counsel of such presbyters as should be chosen by the clergy of each diocese; that they should reside constantly in their diocese, and be bound to preach every Sunday; that pluralities be abolished; that abuses in ecclesiastical courts be redressed; and that a hundred thousand pounds be levied on the bishops' estates and the chapter lands, for payment of debts contracted by the parliament. These concessions, though considerable, gave no satisfaction to the parliamentary commissioners; and, without abating any thing of their rigour on this head, they proceeded to their demands with regard to the militia.

The king's partizans had hitherto maintained, that the fears and jealousies of the parliament, after the securities given to public liberty, were either feigned or groundless; and that no human institution could be better poised and adjusted, than was now the government of England. By the abolition of the star-chamber and court of high commission, the prerogative, they said, has lost all that coërcive power by which it had formerly suppressed or endangered liberty: by the establishment of trennial parliaments, it can have no leisure to acquire new powers, or guard itself, for any considerable length of time, from the inspection of that vigilant assembly: by the slender revenue of the crown, no king can ever attain such influence as to procure a repeal of these salutary statutes: and while the prince commands no military force, he will in vain, by violence, attempt an infringement of laws, so clearly defined, and so passionately cherished.

This kind of reasoning was, however, more plausible than just, and it was replied by the opposite party, If the power of the militia be entrusted to the king, it would not now be difficult for him to abuse that authority. By the rage of intestine discord, his partizans are inflamed into an extreme hatred against their antagonists; and have contracted, no doubt, some prejudices against popular privileges, which, in their apprehension, have been the source of so much disorder. Were the arms of state, therefore, put entirely into such hands, what public security, it may be demanded, can be given to liberty, or what private security to those who, in opposition to the letter of the law, have so generously ventured their lives in its defence? In compliance with this apprehension, Charles offered, that the arms of the state should be entrusted, during three years, to twenty commissioners, who should be named, either by common agreement between him and the parliament, or one half by him, the other by the parliament. And after the expiration of that term, he insisted that his constitutional authority over the militia should again return to him.

The parliamentary commissioners at first demanded, that the power of the sword should for ever be entrusted to such persons

(i) His words are: "As for my calling those at London a parliament, I shall refer thee to Digby for particular satisfaction; this in general: if there had been but two besides myself, of my opinion, I had not done it; and the argument that prevailed with me was, that the calling did no ways acknowledge them to be a parliament; upon which condition and construction I did it, and no otherwise, and accordingly it is registered in the council books, with the council's unanimous approbation." The King's Cabinet opened. Rushworth, vol. iv. p. 943.

persons as the parliament alone should appoint: but, afterwards, they relaxed so far as to require that authority only for seven years; after which it was not to return to the king, but to be settled by bill, or by common agreement between him and his parliament. The king's commissioners asked, Whether jealousies and fears were all on one side, and whether the prince had not as great reason to entertain apprehensions for his authority, as they for their liberty? The truth is, after the commencement of war, it was very difficult, if not impossible, to find security for both parties. Amidst such violent animosities, power alone could ensure safety; and the power of one side was necessarily attended with danger to the other.

With regard to Ireland, there were no greater hopes of agreement between the parties. The parliament demanded, that the truce with the rebels should be declared null; that the management of the war should be given over entirely to the parliament, and that, after the conquest of Ireland, the nomination of the lord lieutenant and of the judges, should likewise remain in their hands.

What rendered an accommodation more desperate was, that the demands on these three heads were acknowledged, by the parliamentary commissioners, to be nothing but preliminaries. After all these were granted, it would be necessary to proceed to the discussion of those other demands which had been transmitted to the king at Oxford. The king was required to attaint and except from a general pardon, forty of the most considerable of his English subjects, and nineteen of his Scottish, together with all popish recusants in both kingdoms who had borne arms for him. It was insisted, that forty-eight more, with all the members who had sitten in either house at Oxford, all lawyers and divines who had embraced the king's party, should be rendered incapable of any office, be forbidden the exercise of their profession, be prohibited from coming within the verge of the court, and forfeit the third of their estates to the parliament. It was required, that whoever had borne arms for the king, should forfeit the tenth of their estates, or if that did not suffice, the sixth, for the payment of public debts. As if royal authority were not sufficiently annihilated by such terms, it was demanded, that the court of wards should be abolished; that all the considerable officers of the crown, and all the judges, should be appointed by parliament; and that the right of peace and war should not be exercised without the consent of that assembly. The Presbyterians, it must be confessed, after insisting on such conditions, differed only in words from the Independents, who required the establishment of a pure republic. When the debates had been carried on to no purpose during twenty days among the commissioners, they separated, and returned; those of the king, to Oxford, those of the parliament, to London.

A little before the commencement of this fruitless negociation, called the Treaty of Uxbridge, a deed was executed by the parliament, which proved their determined resolution to yield nothing, but to proceed in the same manner with which they had at first entered on their enterprizes. Archbishop Laud, the most favourite minister of the king, was brought to the scaffold.

From the time that Laud had been committed, the house of commons, engaged in business of greater moment, had found no leisure to finish his impeachment; and he had patiently endured an imprisonment of more than three years without being brought to trial; yet had he so far continued his non-compliance with the parliament as obstinately to refuse, at first their recommendation, and then their peremptory orders, to collate one Mr. Corbet to the living of Chartham in Kent: this stubborn conduct brought upon him the severe ordinance, for the suspension of his archiepiscopal jurisdiction, and the seizing his temporalities into the hands of the parliament (k). Notwithstanding the repeated cry of the populace to bring this great offender to justice, his trial had been of necessity thus long retarded, from the scantiness of the evidence to prove the charge which had been brought against him: proceedings on this business had met with some interruption from the death of Mr. Pym; but were afterwards prosecuted with great vigour, animosity, and bitterness by Prynne, a member in this parliament, and the same lawyer who had been persecuted with such tyranny and cruelty by Laud, in the triumphant days when that prelate governed the church. He now experienced, from this exasperated sufferer, the same rigour which he had in such full measure meted out to others, the same barbarous insults from the tools of power, and the same unjust seizing of papers, not only to prove those facts with which he already stood accused, but to frame others, and to deprive him of the necessary materials for his defence (l). Ten additional articles, by means of the fore-mentioned evidence, were sent up by the commons to the lords, on the 24th of October, 1643. The charge, when reduced, consisted of three general heads; viz. a traitorous endeavour to subvert the fundamental laws of the realm, and to introduce arbitrary and tyrannical government; a traitorous endeavour to subvert God's true religion by law established, and instead thereof to set up popish superstition and idolatry; an endeavour to subvert the rights of parliament, and the ancient course of parliamentary proceedings. This, according to the precedent which this parliament had made in the year 1640, was urged as a charge of accumulated treason; but the crimes of Laud and those which had been proved against the earl of Strafford differed widely: Strafford had in his own person, in many instances, infringed the constitutional liberty of the subject; it had been proved that he had pressed the king to enlarge his commissions, both as president of the court of York and deputy of Ireland, beyond their legal bounds: the acts of tyranny which had been perpetrated by Laud were the iniquitous decrees of courts, in which he only had a single voice; courts which the power of parliament had abolished, without passing any censure on the individuals who had composed them. "How can that be treason in me, urged this unhappy prelate, which is not made so much as a misdemeanour in any of my fellow commissioners (m)?" The earl of Strafford, to humour a vicious ambition, had acted contrary to his better judgement and declared notions: Laud, a superstitious churchman, who had studied little else than canon law, and the doating opinions of the fathers, was entirely ignorant of the utility, equity, and beauty of civil and religious liberty; was himself imposed on before he endeavoured to impose on others; and became a zealous instrument of tyranny even for conscience sake. The earl of Strafford had enriched both himself and his master with plunder extorted from the subject: no act of rapacity was alledged against Laud; it was notorious that he had spent his whole income in what he ignorantly thought was the service of the public. In the bill of attainder which had passed against the earl of Strafford, there is expressly declared a treason within the statute of the 25th of Edward III. But no such article was pretended to lie against the archbishop. To those measures which had been inductive to the Scotch commotions, and to the breach of the pacification made with that nation, he had pleaded the act of oblivion; and that plea had been generously granted him by the two houses. To that part of his charge which relates to an endeavour to subvert God's true religion by law established, and instead thereof to set up popish superstition and idolatry, he was particularly strong in his defence, and the allegations to support the charge were particularly vague and trifling. The truth is, those superstitious ceremonies which he with so much blind zeal had attempted to revive, and which were so justly ridiculed and abhorred by the more enlightened Protestants, were the discipline of the first reformers in this country, and had the sanction both of the civil and ecclesiastical power: reformation had begun in England at the wrong end; it was first adopted and modelled by government, instead of being forced upon government by the general sense of the people; and thus, to farther the ambitious views of the monarch, and to gratify the pride of the prelacy, a great part of the mystery of popery was retained in the doctrine, and a great part of the puppet-

(k) The king was so careless and improvident of the archbishop's safety, as to prompt and urge him to this impolitic and dangerous stubbornness, by sending him, first, an order to give Chartham to one Mr. Reading, or, if otherwise commanded by the parliament, then to let it lapse to the crown; and afterwards sent him a general order, requiring, that as often as any benefice, or other spiritual promotion, in his gift, should fall void, that he should dispose of it to only such as his majesty should name to him; or, if any command lay otherwise upon him from either or both the houses of parliament, he should then let them fall into lapse. These unfriendly injunctions were obeyed by Laud, till the ordinance mentioned in the text passed. The History of the Troubles and Trial of Laud, p. 200, 203.

(l) Laud tells us, That of twenty-one bundles of writing which he had prepared for his defence, and which Mr. Prynne took from him, he could never get above three back again. Laud's Trial, p. 205, 211.

(m) The commons urged, That the most iniquitous of these sentences were procured by the archbishop's undue influence: but this fact, if true, could never be proved; and, could it have been proved, it equally aggravated the crimes of the other individuals who composed these courts.

shews of the papists in the discipline, of the church of England (n). Though the genius of reformation had so far prevailed, that, before the promotion of Laud to the archiepiscopal see of Canterbury, many superstitious ceremonies observed by the first reformers, and others directed by law, had in practice been laid aside, yet they had not been abolished by any act of legislation; nor in all the long list of supposed innovations charged against him was there one to be found which was not warranted by precedent, or by the instructions set forth by the politic Elizabeth and her obsequious parliament. To as little purpose did the commons endeavour to prove the delinquent guilty of setting up a power in the church independent of the regal (o): the king, who regarded the success of Laud's projects as necessary to the success of his own schemes for despotism, had freely lent him all his power, which in ecclesiastical matters was great; and Laud had cautiously taken no step towards the settlement of the discipline of the church, unwarranted by royal authority (p).

On serjeant Wild, Brown, Maynard, Nicholas, and Hill, all members of the house of commons, and lawyers, was imposed the invidious task of managing the charge against him; whilst his especial enemy, Prynne, was employed to provide and prompt the evidence (q). Like true lawyers, they played their parts in baiting the unhappy prisoner with the most acrimonious and insulting language; like true lawyers, they took all the unfair advantages which their offices and other opportunities procured them; and like true lawyers, they put a forced and unwarrantable construction on all the facts which they cited against him. The behaviour of the prisoner through the whole of his tedious trial, for it lasted twenty days (r), did great honour to his temper; and his answer, which was both rhetorical and argumentative, proclaimed his abilities. On the 2nd of November he was called before the commons, to hear read a summary of his charge; on the 11th he spoke several hours in his defence at the bar of that house; and on the same day the commons passed an ordinance which decreed him to suffer death, as in cases of treason, with but one dissenting voice (s): on the 16th it was sent up to the lords, where the business slept till the 17th of December, when the lords, having been quickened by a message from the commons, and the importunity of some of their own members, with a kind of threat that the multitude would force them to do justice (t), proceeded to the consideration of every particular of the charge; and, on the 24th of the same month, acquainted the commons, That they had found the archbishop guilty as to matters of fact, but that they desired farther satisfaction in point of law, whether the said matters were treason. This produced a conference between the two houses, in which were urged, by the commons, similar arguments to those which had been used in the earl of Strafford's case; and, in two days after the fore-mentioned conference, the lords passed the desired ordinance (u). Laud produced a pardon from the king under the great seal; but this being held insufficient, for two reasons (first, because it had passed before the conviction of the delinquent, and, secondly, because no bar could be valid against the judgement of both houses), he was sentenced, by an order of parliament, to suffer death, on the 10th of January, 1644-5, without other favour than to have one of his chaplains attend him, in the company of two divines of the commons' appointing, and to have his sentence altered from hanging and quartering into beheading.

From the time the news reached him of the lords having passed the bill of attainder, he prepared himself to die with exemplary piety and courage, and maintained the same magnanimity of conduct through all the horrors of his fate. The whole tendency of a long speech, or rather sermon, which he made on the scaffold, was to vindicate the king and himself from the intention of introducing popery into the established religion, and to persuade the people to resubject themselves to the ancient discipline of the church. In this very performance, which was executed with great art of composition, and likewise in his remarks on the charge which the Scots brought against him, he plainly shews that his adversity had not altered his opinions, nor corrected any one of his most mischievous prejudices; and that, had accident re-established him in his former plenitude of power, he would have run, to the end of his days, the same persecuting course for which he now suffered (v). Laud was a native of Berkshire, the offspring of parents who were clothiers by trade; was born at the town of Reading in 1573, and received his first education at a free-school of that place. At the age of seventeen he entered scholar of St. John's College, Oxford; and, in due process of time, took the degrees of bachelor, master of arts, bachelor of divinity, and doctor of divinity, and was elected president of St. John's College. His zeal, which appeared very early in life, occasioned him to be very offensive to a considerable party in the university: he maintained the necessity of baptism; that there could be no true church without diocesan bishops; and was questioned by the vice-chancellor, Dr. Airay, for having preached a sermon which contained sundry scandalous and popish passages. This conduct, which rendered him noxious to the zealous Protestants, brought him into equal favour with the high church party: Richard Neile, bishop of Rochester, took him under his especial protection, made him his chaplain, bestowed on him the rectory of Cuckstone in Kent, and introduced him to the court. He was some time prevented from rising by the indefatigable pains of Abbot, the then archbishop of Canterbury, who was well acquainted with the turbulency of his character, and disapproved his divinity: but, when the influence of this good prelate was on the decline; when James grew intoxicated with the prospect of a Spanish alliance; when he repented him of the doctrine he had so warmly maintained against Vorstius; when he began to take the Arminians and Papists into his bosom, and discard his old fellow sectarists the Calvinists; when innovations were intended to be introduced into the Scotch worship; Laud, who had by this time wormed himself into great favour with the duke of Buckingham, was promoted, as an useful instrument to help the carrying on of the new (n) It is observable, that the most noxious of those ceremonies which Laud so childishly insisted on, were established at the restoration, and have been ever since regularly practised in the church; and that many of his most offensive measures have been adopted by the revolution ministers, such as the nominating clergymen to be justices of the peace, with restraints laid on marriage.

(o) The strongest evidence produced against Laud was relative to the third head of his charge; viz. an endeavour to subvert the rights of parliament, and the ancient course of parliamentary proceedings. These were, an answer to the remonstrance of the commons, made the 17th of June, 1628; with a paper concerning a declaration of the king, set forth on the 28th of January, 1628, found in his study in his handwriting, and endorsed by him. The delinquent, by the following observation, in a manner acknowledges the force of this evidence: "In this diligent and curious search, for Mr. Prynne's malice made it, they found some papers concerning parliaments; no other, I praise God for it, than such as with indifferent construction might I hope well pass, especially considering what occasion led me, and what command was upon me; and as I have been told by able and experienced men, they would have been nothing had they been found in any but this troublesome and distracted time about the rights of parliament, as it is said: howsoever, I was most unfortunate they should be now found; and I had not left them a being, but that I verily thought I had destroyed them long since."

It appears in this trial, and by the printed votes of this parliament, that the oath given to king James differed in two very material passages from those which had been taken by his predecessors: one was an addition, namely, "agreeable to the king's prerogative;" the other an omission, namely, "laws which the people shall choose." Laud's Trial, p. 319, 355.

(p) Well as Charles loved, and highly as he venerated, the church, he idolized yet more his own power; and it is plain, by his instructions to his secretary Nicholas on the Uxbridge treaty, and many other circumstances of his life, that his great attachment to the prelacy, and his schemes for enlarging their property and dominion, had principally their rise from the adulation they paid him, and the persuasion that this body of men would use their influence over the consciences of his subjects, and all the power he gave them, to infuse and support the doctrine of passive obedience to the crown.

(q) If we may believe Laud's account of his trial, Mr. Prynne kept a school of instruction for the witnesses, who were an hundred and fifty in number, and tampered with them in a very shameful manner. Laud's Trial, p. 219.

(r) The trial began on the 12th of March, 1643, and was not finished till the 29th of June, 1644. Laud complains, that he was often summoned to appear before the lords, and then sent back again unheard, to the needlessly exposing him to the scorns and revilings of the people, and to an expence which he could ill bear, for he never appeared but it cost him six or seven pounds a day. The archbishop's estate and goods had been sequestered; and it was not till towards the end of his trial, and after repeated solicitations, that the commons allowed him two hundred pounds to support his necessary expences.

(s) Notwithstanding this unanimity, Laud tells us, That when he came to the house, the day the bill passed, many members complimented him on the answer he had given, in a high strain of commendation.—Laud's Trial, p. 441.

(t) A petition against delinquents, and particularly against Laud and the bishop of Ely, was carried up to the lords.

(u) There were but fourteen lords in the house when Laud was voted guilty as to matter of fact, and but seven signed the bill of attainder.

(v) Something of the following nature dropped from Laud in the defence he made in the lords' house; viz. That the true religion had suffered rather from the relaxation of the church discipline than from severity.

measures of the court. As chaplain to James, he attended him in his last journey to Scotland; was soon after promoted to the bishopric of St. David; and, from the first period of Charles's administration to the assembling of the second parliament of 1640, had the entire direction of the ecclesiastical government of the country; and, after the death of Buckingham, was one of the king's prime advisers in all matters of state. The provoking arrogance of his conduct, and the tyranny with which he exerted this plenitude of power, has been already set forth: it is sufficient to say, that the principles of religion on which he uniformly acted were as noxious to the peace of society as were the principles of the papists; the same want of charity, the same exercise of cruelty, the same arrogance of dominion, were common to both. Utterly unacquainted with the simplicity, charity, and meekness of the Gospel, his character was void of humility and forgiveness; nor had he other rule to judge of men's deservings, but as they were more or less attached to the power of the church (w). His Diary, which was exposed by his enemies to the public censure (x), shews him to have been a supple fawning courtier, and that his superstitions were as contemptible as those which belong to the weakest of women. Upon the whole, his character serves as an eminent example to shew, that extensive learning and abilities are not incompatible with a narrow judgement; and that, in all the catalogue of human frailties, there are none which more corrupt the heart, or deprave the understanding, than the follies of religion.

The rank he held in the church and state, during the government of Charles, had occasioned his prejudices to be exceedingly offensive to the public, and his misdemeanours were gross and many; but still they were more the errors of his judgement than of his will; and for this reason, as the justice of the country had been something satisfied by the death of the criminal Strafford, it would have done honour to the parliament to have left this aged prelate (y) the example of their mercy, rather than to have made him the monument of their vengeance. Perpetual imprisonment, with no more than a decent maintenance, and the deprivation of his archiepiscopal function (which of course followed the abolishment of that kind of church-government) would have taken away his abilities of doing farther mischief; and the present prosperous state of the parliament's affairs rendered his death a circumstance of no importance to the public welfare (z). It is plain that he fell a sacrifice to the intolerant principles of the Presbyterians (a), a sect who breathed as fiery a spirit of persecution as himself (b). It is farther to be observed of this prelate, that he is the only individual of that high office in the church of England who ever suffered death by the hands of an executioner; though the turbulent ambition of his order have frequently disturbed the peace of society.

On the same day that the lords concurred with the commons in the attainder of the archbishop, they passed an ordinance that the Common-Prayer should be lain aside, and for the establishing a directory of worship which had been framed by the assembly of divines, and confirmed by the votes of both houses (c).

On the execution of one Howard, a captain, whom the parliament had hanged for deserting with nineteen troopers to the king, prince Maurice, in revenge, inflicted the same punishment on a sea officer of the name of Turpin, who was a common prisoner of war (d). This, and such kind of violences committed by the royalists, produced a parliamentary ordinance, appointing a special commission for the execution of martial law, with severe instructions in matters relative to desertion (e). No other revenge was taken for the murder of fourteen innocent clothiers, hanged at Woodhouse in Wiltshire, by the direction of prince Rupert, than the execution of eight Irish prisoners, in conformity to an ordinance forbidding quarter to be given to these troops, and which had been occasioned by the cruelties and disorders they had every where committed.

The king had by this time repented him of the ill policy of withdrawing his own party from the two houses at Westminster, and a great number of these deserters from time to time returned to the capital; which being observed by the leaders of the party in opposition, the parliament were petitioned by the common-council not to receive any of their members who had deserted them, without their giving satisfaction for their fidelity in time to come; and an ordinance, according to a former vote on this business, declared, That such peers as had deserted, or should desert the parliament, should not be admitted without the consent of both houses; and that whatsoever member of the house of commons who had so offended, or should so offend hereafter, and adhere to those who were levying war against the parliament, were and should be absolutely disabled from sitting in the house of commons.

Among the number of those, who, in this triumphant state of the parliament's affairs, either were, or affected to be, partizans to the cause of liberty, was the prince Elector-Palatine, who at this time very unexpectedly arrived in England. He was at first regarded as a spy for his uncle, and treated with great coolness by the parliament, who intimated to him, that his residence in England would neither be advantageous to his own nor the public affairs. The prince received this reprimand with humility;

(w) In the Cambridge edition of the Bible, 1629, a period when Laud was in full power, the explanatory title to the hundred and forty-ninth psalm is altered from, "To praise the Lord for his victory and conquests that he giveth his saints against all men's power," to "The praise given to God for that power he has given to the church to rule the consciences of men." This innovation is pursued in all the editions from 1629 to 1743.

(x) This Diary was found by Mr. Prynne in his search into the archbishop's papers, and published by him during his trial. The archbishop makes the following observation on this incident: "According to the order of the lords, says he, I made the recapitulation of my whole cause in matters of greatest moment; but so soon as I came to the bar of their house, I saw every member present with a new thin book, in folio, in a blue coat: I heard that morning, that Mr. Prynne had printed my Diary, and published it to the world to disgrace me. Some notes of his own are made upon it: the first and the last are two desperate untruths; besides some others. This was the book then in the lords' hands; and, I assure myself, that time picked for it, that the sight of it might damp me, and disenable me to speak. I confess I was a little troubled at it; but, after I had gathered up myself, and looked up to God, I went on to the business of the day." In the epistle dedicatory, to the right honourable lords and commons, prefixed to this work, the author has the vanity to say, That a former publication of his had given a deadly blow to the prelatical party. Laud's Trial, p. 411, & seq. A Breviate of the Life of Laud, published by Prynne.

(y) Laud was in his seventy-second year when he suffered death.—His literary works were, several Speeches; several Sermons; Conference between him and John Fisher; Answer to the Exceptions of A. C. printed with the Conference; Memorables of King James; Answer to the Remonstrance made by the House of Commons in June, 1628; Various Letters; Marginal Notes on Rome's Master-Piece, published by Prynne; Diary of his Life; a Manual of Private Devotions; a Summary of Devotions; Variæ Epistolæ ad Clariss. Ger. Jo. Vossium, printed in a book entitled, Gerardi Johan. Vossii & Clarorum Virorum ad eum Epistolæ, Lond. 1690; History of his Troubles and Trial; Annual Accounts of his Province, presented to the king in the beginning of every year; a Speech, or Funeral Sermon, spoken by him on the scaffold on Tower-Hill immediately before his execution. Wood's Athenæ Oxonienses, vol. ii. p. 63, & seq.

(z) "In this instance (says a writer of great note, speaking of Laud's sentence and execution) the public might see, that popular assemblies, as by their very number they are in a great measure exempt from the restraint of shame, so, when they also overleap the bounds of law, they naturally break out into acts of the most atrocious tyranny and injustice." If this observation is to be taken as particular to popular assemblies, as indeed it can be no otherwise construed, is it not a partial representation? Are not the annals of our own, and those of every other society, stained with innumerable instances of the most atrocious of these kind of murders, committed even on deserving men, when regal sovereigns had power to overleap the bounds, or strain the letter of the law? Was the life and property of the subjects of this country ever secure, till the system of government established at the Revolution had made many necessary limitations to regal power? The unjust and cruel judgements which have passed upon individuals in those societies, where the supreme power has been established in popular assemblies, are not to be mentioned in comparison with those which have passed in all monarchical states, where the regal power was not restrained by very considerable limitations. Hume's History of Charles I. Quarto Edition, p. 393.

(a) Ludlow is of opinion, that Laud's sentence was passed to encourage and please the Scots, who at this time began to be very troublesome to the party who had called in their assistance.

(b) This intolerant spirit is fully shewn in their denying delinquents the comforts of their religious persuasion, under the agonies of a sentence of death: of three clergymen whom Laud petitioned might assist him in his preparations for his exit, there was but one allowed him, and this under the restraint of the inspection of two ministers appointed by parliament. No individual in these melancholy circumstances obtained more favour from the two houses, and some of them not so much.

(d) Prince Maurice was of the same imperious disposition as his brother prince Rupert; and was sent with the chief command into the West, in the department of the marquis of Hertford, because, as lord Clarendon says, the king thought he should sooner reduce his people by the power of his army than by the persuasions of his counsel, and therefore preferred the roughness of the one's nature to the lenity and condescension of the other. The recompence the marquis of Hertford was promised for the deprivation of his command was, to be made a gentleman of the king's bed chamber, and groom of his stole. Clar. Hist. vol. ii. p. 240.

and

and gave such satisfactory reasons for his conduct (f), that he procured from the parliament a pension of eight thousand pounds a year, to be raised out of the estates of delinquents, and was lodged in an apartment at Whitehall, fitted up on purpose for his reception. He was severely reprimanded by the king for coming into the country without acquainting him with his motives; but yet continued his submissive behaviour to the parliament, and by their permission sat in the assembly of divines (g).

The earls of Holland, Bedford, Conway, and Clare, though they had endeavoured to atone for past offences by attending on the king, and serving in his army at the siege of Gloucester, met from the court with a treatment so supercilious, cold, and reserved, that they were provoked to fling themselves upon the mercy of the parliament, and returned again to the capital. After a slight confinement, and being debarred admission to this assembly, they were restored to their former privileges. The earl of Northumberland, who had retired to his house at Petworth, with an intention, as it was thought, to make peace with the king, was deterred from the execution of this project by the reception his friends had met with. The earl of Holland, with a view to recover his former favour with the party, on his examination declared, and afterwards published in a manifesto, many things to the disadvantage of the king's reputation; viz. That the cessation made with the Irish rebels, the great favour papists were in with the king, and the evil measures projected and carried on at Oxford (h), had obliged him, in point of conscience, to withdraw a second time from the court. Among the number of penitents who implored the forgiveness and protection of parliament, was sir Edward Deering, a man of a warm intemperate disposition, and greatly conceited of his abilities, which were by no means insignificant: he was a great zealot for episcopacy; but disliking popery more than presbytery, or not meeting with so much countenance from royalty as he expected, he was one of the first who took the advantage of the declaration of both kingdoms for receiving penitents into favour, and alledged the following reasons for his abandoning the court; viz. The fear of being compelled to attend the anti-parliament at Oxford; that the language of clergymen and others of the royal party was, that the king would be forced to make his way to his capital by conquest; that he could never reconcile the cessation in Ireland to the vows made in England; and a conviction of the danger which hung over this country from the prevalence of a popish faction (i). The disgusts taken at the conduct of the court, and the growing prosperity of the parliament's affairs, occasioned them a daily accession of proselytes: among these were the earl of Kingston, the young earl of Caernarvon (k), whose father had lost his life in the royal cause (l), and many more noblemen and others of distinction.

While the king's affairs declined in England, some events happened in Scotland, which seemed to promise him a more prosperous issue. Before the commencement of these civil disorders, the earl of Montrose, a young nobleman, returning from his travels, had been introduced to the king, and had made an offer of his services; but by the insinuations of the marquis, afterwards duke of Hamilton, who possessed much of Charles's confidence, he had not been received with that distinction to which he thought himself entitled. Disgusted with this treatment, he had forwarded all the measures of the covenanters; and, agreeably to the natural ardour of his genius, had employed himself, during the first Scottish insurrection, with great zeal, as well as success, in levying and conducting their armies. Being commissioned by the Tables to wait upon the king, while the royal army lay at Berwick, he was so gained by the civilities and caresses of that monarch, that he thenceforth devoted himself entirely, though secretly, to his service, and entered into a close correspondence with him. In the second insurrection, a great military command was entrusted to him by the covenanters; and he was the first that passed the Tweed, at the head of their troops, in the invasion of England. He found means, however, soon after to convey a letter to the king: and by the infidelity of some about that prince, (Hamilton, as was suspected,) a copy of this letter was sent to Leven, the Scottish general. Being accused of treachery, and a correspondence with the enemy, Montrose openly avowed the letter, and asked the generals, if they dared to call their sovereign an enemy: and by this behaviour, he escaped the danger of an immediate prosecution. As he was now fully known to be of the royal party, he no longer concealed his principles, and endeavoured to draw those who had entertained like sentiments, into a bond of association for the king's service. Though thrown into prison for this enterprize (m), and detained some time, he was not discouraged; but still continued to infuse spirit into the distressed royalists. Among other persons of distinction, who united themselves to him, was lord Napier of Merchiston, son of the famous inventor of the logarithms, the person to whom the title of GREAT MAN is more justly due, than to any other whom his country ever produced.

There was in Scotland another party, who, professing equal attachment to the king's service, pretended only to differ with Montrose about the means of attaining the same end; and of that party, duke Hamilton was the leader. This nobleman had cause to be extremely devoted to his majesty, not only by reason of the connexion of blood, which united him to the royal family, but on account of the great confidence and favour with which he had ever been honoured by his master. Being accused by lord Rae, not without some appearance of probability, of a conspiracy against the king, Charles was so far from harbouring suspicion against him, that, the very first time Hamilton came to court, he received him into his bed-chamber, and passed alone the night with him. But such was the duke's unhappy fate or conduct, that he escaped not the imputation of treachery to his friend and sovereign; and though he at last sacrificed his life in the king's service, his integrity and sincerity have not been thought by historians entirely free from blemish. Perhaps (and this is the more probable opinion) the subtilties of his conduct and his temporising maxims, though accompanied with good intentions, have been the chief cause of a suspicion, which has never yet been either fully proved or wholly refuted. As much as the bold spirit of Montrose prompted him to enterprizing measures, as much was the cautious temper of Hamilton inclined to such as were moderate and dilatory. While the former foretold that the Scottish covenanters were secretly forming an union with the English parliament, and inculcated the necessity of preventing them by some vigorous undertaking; the latter still insisted, that every such attempt would precipitate them into measures, to which, otherwise, they were not, perhaps, inclined. After the Scottish convention was summoned without the king's authority, the former exclaimed, that their intentions were now visible, and that, if some unexpected blow were not struck, to dissipate them, they would arm the whole nation against the king; the latter maintained the possibility of outvoting the disaffected party, and securing, by peaceful means, the allegiance of the kingdom. Unhappily for the royal cause, Hamilton's representations met with more credit from the king and queen, than those of Montrose; and the covenanters were allowed, without interruption, to proceed in all their hostile measures. Montrose then hastened to Oxford; where his invectives against Hamilton's treachery, concurring with the general prepossession, and supported by the unfortunate event of his counsels, were entertained with universal approbation. Influenced by the clamour of his party, Charles, as soon as Hamilton appeared, sent him prisoner to Pendennis Castle in Cornwal. His brother, Lanerk, who was also put under confinement, made his escape, and flew into Scotland.

The king's ears were now open to Montrose's counsels, who proposed none but the boldest and most daring, agreeably to the desperate state of the royal cause in Scotland. Though the whole nation was subjected by the covenanters, though great armies were kept on foot by them, and every place guarded by a vigilant administration; he undertook, by his own credit, and that of a few friends who remained to the king, to raise such commotions, as would soon oblige the malcontents to recal those forces, who had so sensibly thrown the balance in favour of the parliament. Not discouraged with the defeat at Marston Moor, which rendered it impossible for him to draw any succour from England; he was content to stipulate with the earl of Antrim, a nobleman of Ireland, for some supply of men from that country. And changing his disguises, and passing through many dangers, he arrived in Scotland; where he lay concealed in the borders of the Highlands, and secretly prepared the minds of his partizans for attempting some great undertaking.

(f) The following were the motives and reasons which he gave the parliament for his arrival: That his professions and behaviour might erase those jealousies which the conduct of his brothers had drawn upon him; and that the enmity he had incurred for his affections to the parliament, and their cause, would render his abode in foreign parts unpleasing and unhappy to him. Parl. Hist. vol. xiii. p. 279, & seq.

No sooner were the Irish landed, though not exceeding eleven hundred foot, very ill armed, than Montrose declared himself, and entered upon that scene of action which has rendered his name so celebrated. About eight hundred of the men of Athol flocked to his standard. Five hundred men more, who had been levied by the covenanters, were persuaded to embrace the royal cause; and with this combined force, he hastened to attack lord Elcho, who lay at Perth with an army of six thousand men, assembled upon the first news of the Irish invasion. Montrose, inferior in number, unprovided with horse, ill supplied with arms and ammunition, had nothing to depend on, but the courage, which, by his own example, and the rapidity of his enterprizes, he should inspire into his raw soldiers. Having received the fire of the enemy, which was answered chiefly by a volley of stones, he rushed amidst them with his sword drawn, threw them into confusion, pushed his advantage, and obtained a complete victory, with the slaughter of two thousand of the covenanters, on the first of September, 1644.

This victory, though it augmented the renown of Montrose, increased not his power or numbers. The far greater part of the kingdom was extremely attached to the covenant; and such as bore an affection to the royal cause, were terrified by the established authority of the opposite party. Dreading the superior power of Argyle, who, having joined his vassals to a force levied by the public, was approaching with a considerable army, Montrose hastened northwards, in order to rouse again the marquis of Huntley and the Gordons, who, having before hastily taken arms, had been instantly suppressed by the covenanters. He was joined on his march by the earl of Airly, with his two younger sons, sir Thomas and sir David Ogilvy: the eldest was, at that time, a prisoner with the enemy. He attacked at Aberdeen lord Burley, who commanded a force of two thousand five hundred men. After a sharp combat, he put the enemy to flight, and in the pursuit did great execution upon them, on the eleventh of the same month.

But by this second advantage he obtained not the end which he expected. The envious nature of Huntley, jealous of Montrose's glory, rendered him averse to join an army, where he himself must be so much eclipsed by the superior merit of the general. Argyle, reinforced by the earl of Lothian, was behind him with a great army: the militia of the northern counties, Murray, Ross, Caithness, to the number of five thousand men, opposed him in front, and guarded the banks of the Spey, a deep and rapid river. In order to elude these numerous armies, he turned aside into the hills, and saved his weak, but active troops, in Badenoch. After some marches and countermarches, Argyle came up with him at Faivy Castle, and after some skirmishes, in which he was worsted, he allowed Montrose to escape him. By quick marches, through these rugged mountains, that general freed himself from the superior forces of the covenanters.

Such was the situation of Montrose, that very good or very ill fortune was equally destructive to him, and diminished his army. After every victory, his soldiers, greedy of spoil, but deeming the smallest acquisition to be unexhausted riches, deserted in great numbers, and went home to secure the treasures which they had acquired. Tired too, and spent with hasty and long marches, in the depth of winter, through snowy mountains unprovided with every necessary, they fell off, and left their general almost alone with the Irish, who having no place to which they could retire, still adhered to him in every fortune. With these, and some reinforcements of the Atholmen, and Macdonalds whom he had recalled, Montrose fell suddenly upon Argyle's country, and let loose upon it all the rage of war; carrying off the cattle, burning the houses, and putting the inhabitants to the sword. This severity, by which Montrose sullied his victories, was the result of a private animosity against the chieftain, more than of zeal for the public cause. Argyle, collecting three thousand men, marched in quest of the enemy, who had retired with their plunder; and he lay at Innerlochy, supposing himself still at a considerable distance from them. The earl of Seaforth, at the head of the garrison of Inverness, who were veteran soldiers, joined to five thousand new-levied troops of the northern counties, pressed the royalists on the other side, and threatened them with inevitable destruction. By a quick and unexpected march, Montrose hastened to Innerlochy, and presented himself in order of battle before the surprized, but not affrighted, covenanters. Argyle alone, seized with a panic, deserted his army, who still maintained their ground, and gave battle to the royalists. After a vigorous resistance, they were defeated, and pursued with great slaughter, on the 2nd of February, 1645. And the power of the Campbells (that is Argyle's name) being thus broken; the Highlanders, who were in general well affected to the royal cause, began to join Montrose's camp in great numbers. Seaforth's army dispersed of itself, at the very terror of his name. And lord Gordon, eldest son of Huntley, having escaped from his uncle Argyle, who had hitherto detained him, now joined Montrose with no contemptible number of his followers, attended by his brother the earl of Aboine.

The council at Edinburgh, greatly alarmed at Montrose's progress, began to think of a more regular plan of defence, against an enemy, whose repeated victories had rendered him formidable. They sent for Baillie, an officer of reputation from England; and joining him in command with Urrey, who had again enlisted himself among the king's enemies, they sent him to the field, with a considerable army, against the royalists. Montrose, with a detachment of eight hundred men, had attacked Dundee, a town extremely zealous for the covenant; and having carried it by assault, had delivered it up to be plundered by his soldiers, when Baillie and Urrey, with their whole force, were unexpectedly upon him. His conduct and presence of mind, in this emergency, appeared conspicuous. Instantly he called off his soldiers from plunder, put them in order, secured his retreat by the most skilful measures; and having marched sixty miles in the face of an enemy much superior, without stopping, or allowing his soldiers the least sleep or refreshment, he at last secured himself in the mountains.

Baillie and Urrey then divided their troops, in order the better to conduct the war against an enemy, who surprized them, as much by the rapidity of his marches, as by the boldness of his enterprizes. Urrey, at the head of four thousand men, met him at Alderne, near Inverness; and, encouraged by the superiority of numbers, attacked him in the post which he had chosen. Montrose, having placed his right wing in strong ground, drew the best of his forces to the other, and left no main body between them; a defect which he artfully concealed, by showing a few men through the trees and bushes, with which that ground was covered. That Urrey might have no leisure to perceive the stratagem, he instantly led his left wing to the charge; and, making a furious impression upon the covenanters, drove them off the field, and gained a complete victory. In this battle, the valour of young Napier shone with signal lustre.

Baillie now advanced, in order to revenge Urrey's discomfiture; but, at Alford, he met with a like fate, on the 2nd of July. Montrose, weak in cavalry, here lined his troops of horse with infantry; and after putting the enemy's horse to rout, fell with united force upon their foot, who were entirely cut in pieces, though with the loss of the gallant lord Gordon on the part of the royalists. Having thus prevailed in so many battles, he summoned together all his friends and partizans, and prepared himself for marching into the southern provinces, in order to put a final period to the power of the covenanters, and dissipate the parliament, which, with great pomp and solemnity, they had summoned to meet at St. Johnstone's.

While the fire was thus kindled in the north, it blazed out with no less fury in the south: the parliamentary and royal armies, as soon as the season would permit, prepared to take the field, in hopes of bringing their important quarrel to a quick decision. The passing of the self-denying ordinance had been protracted by so many debates and intrigues, that the spring was far advanced before it received the sanction of both houses; and it was thought dangerous by many to introduce, so near the time of action, such great innovations into the army. Had not the punctilious principles of Essex engaged him, amidst all the disgusts which he received, to pay implicit obedience to the parliament; this alteration had not been effected without some fatal accident: since, notwithstanding his prompt resignation of the command, a mutiny was generally apprehended. Fairfax, or more properly speaking, Cromwell, under his name, introduced, at last, the new model into the army, and threw the troops into a different shape. From the same men, new regiments and new companies were formed, different officers appointed, and the whole military force put into such hands, as the Independents could rely on. Besides members of parliament who were excluded, many officers, unwilling to serve under the new generals, threw up their commissions; and unwarily facilitated the project of putting the army entirely into the hands of that party.

Though the discipline of the former parliamentary army was not contemptible, a more exact plan was introduced, and rigorously executed, by these new commanders. Valour indeed was very generally diffused over the one party as well as the other: discipline also was attained by the forces of the parliament; but the perfection of the military art, in concerting the general plans of action, and the operations of the field, seems still, on both sides, to have been, in a great measure, wanting.

Never surely was a more singular army assembled than that which was now set on foot by the parliament. To the greater number of the regiments, chaplains were not appointed: the officers assumed the spiritual duty, and united it with their military functions. During the intervals of action, they occupied themselves in sermons, prayers, exhortations; and the same emulation, there, attended them, which, in the field, is so necessary to support the honour of that profession. Wherever they were quartered, they excluded the minister from his pulpit; and, usurping his place, conveyed their sentiments to the audience, with all the authority, which followed their power, their valour, and their military exploits, united to their appearing zeal and fervour. The private soldiers, possessing the same spirit, employed their vacant hours in prayer, in perusing the Holy Scriptures, in ghostly conferences, where they compared the progress of their souls in grace, and mutually stimulated each other to farther advances in the great work of their salvation. When they were marched to battle, the whole field resounded, as well with psalms and spiritual songs adapted to the occasion, as with instruments of military music; and every man endeavoured to drown the sense of present danger, in the prospect of that crown of glory which was set before him. In so holy a cause, wounds were esteemed meritorious; death, martyrdom, and the hurry and dangers of action, instead of banishing their pious visions, rather served to impress their minds more strongly with them.

The royalists were desirous of throwing a ridicule on these pious exercises of the parliamentary armies, without being sensible how much reason they had to apprehend its dangerous consequences. The forces assembled by the king at Oxford, in the west, and in other places, were equal, if not superior, in number, to their adversaries; but actuated by a very different spirit. The licence, which had been introduced by want of pay, had risen to a great height among them, and rendered them more formidable to their friends than to their enemies. Prince Rupert, negligent of the people, fond of the soldiery, had indulged the troops in unwarrantable liberties: Wilmot, a man of dissolute manners, had promoted the same spirit of disorder; and the licentious Goring, Gerrard, sir Richard Granville, now carried it to a great pitch of enormity. In the west especially, where Goring commanded, universal spoil and havoc were committed, and the whole country was laid waste by the rapine of the army. All distinction of parties being in a manner dropped, the most devoted friends of the church and monarchy wished there for such success to the parliamentary forces, as might put an end to these oppressions. The country people, despoiled of their substance, flocked together in several places, armed with clubs and staves; and though they professed an enmity to the soldiers of both parties, their hatred was in most places levelled chiefly against the royalists, from whom they had met with the worst treatment. Many thousands of these umultuary peasants were assembled in different parts of England; who destroyed all such straggling soldiers as they met with, and much infested the armies.

The disposition of the forces on both sides was as follows: part of the Scottish army was employed in taking Pomfret, and other towns in Yorkshire; part of it besieged Carlisle, valiantly defended by sir Thomas Glenham. Chester, where Biron commanded, had long been blockaded by sir William Brereton; and was reduced to great difficulties. The king, being joined by the princes Rupert and Maurice, lay at Oxford, with a considerable army, about fifteen thousand men. Fairfax and Cromwell were posted at Windsor, with the new-modelled army, about twenty-two thousand men. Taunton, in the county of Somerset, defended by Blake, suffered a long siege from sir Richard Granville, who commanded an army of about eight thousand men; and though the defence had been obstinate, the garrison was now reduced to the last extremity. Goring commanded, in the west, an army of nearly the same number.

On opening the campaign, the king formed the project of relieving Chester; Fairfax, that of relieving Taunton. The king was first in motion. When he advanced to Draiton in Shropshire, Biron met him, and brought intelligence, that his approach had raised the siege, and that the parliamentary army had withdrawn. Fairfax, having reached Salisbury in his road westward, received orders from the committee of both kingdoms, appointed for the management of the war, to return and lay siege to Oxford, now exposed by the king's absence. He obeyed, after sending colonel Weldon to the west, with a detachment of four thousand men. On Weldon's approach, Granville, who imagined that Fairfax with his whole army was upon him, raised the siege, and allowed this pertinacious town, now half taken and half burned, to receive relief: but the royalists, being reinforced with three thousand horse under Goring, again advanced to Taunton, and shut up Weldon, with his small army, in that ruinous place.

The king, having effected his purpose with regard to Chester, returned southwards; and, in his way, sat down before Leicester, a garrison of the parliament's. Having made a breach in the wall, he stormed the town on all sides; and, after a furious assault, the soldiers entered sword in hand, and committed all those disorders to which their natural violence, especially when inflamed by resistance, is so much addicted. A great booty was taken and distributed among them: fifteen hundred prisoners fell into the king's hands. This success, which struck a great terror into the parliamentary party, determined Fairfax to leave Oxford, which he was beginning to approach; and he marched towards the king, with an intention of offering him battle. The king was advancing towards Oxford, in order to raise the siege, which, he apprehended, was now begun; and both armies, ere they were aware, had advanced within six miles of each other. A council of war was called by the king, in order to deliberate concerning the measures which he should now pursue. On the one hand, it seemed more prudent to delay the combat; because Gerrard, who lay in Wales with three thousand men, might be enabled, in a little time, to join the army; and Goring, it was hoped, would soon be master of Taunton; and having put the west in full security, would then unite his forces to those of the king, and give him an incontestible superiority over the parliamentarians. On the other hand, prince Rupert, whose ardour still pushed him on to battle, excited the impatient humour of the nobility and gentry, of which the army was full; and urged the many difficulties under which the royalists laboured, and from which nothing but a victory could relieve them: the resolution was taken to give battle to Fairfax; and the royal army immediately advanced against that general.

At Naseby was fought, with forces nearly equal, this decisive and well-disputed action, between the king and parliament. The main body of the royalists was commanded by the king himself: the right wing by prince Rupert; the left by sir Marmaduke Langdale. Fairfax, seconded by Skippon, placed himself in the main body of the opposite army: Cromwell in the right wing: Ireton, Cromwell's son-in-law, in the left. The charge was begun, with his usual celerity and usual success, by prince Rupert. Though Ireton made stout resistance, and even after he was run through the thigh with a pike, still maintained the combat, till he was taken prisoner; yet was that whole wing broken, and pursued with precipitate fury by Rupert: he was even so inconsiderate as to lose time in summoning and attacking the artillery of the enemy, which had been left with a good guard of infantry. The king led on his main main body, and displayed, in this action, all the conduct of a prudent general, and all the valour of an experienced soldier. Fairfax and Skippon encountered him, and well supported that reputation which they had acquired. Skippon, being dangerously wounded, was desired by Fairfax to leave the field; but declared that he would remain there as long as one man maintained his ground. The infantry of the parliament was broken, and pressed upon by the king; till Fairfax, with great presence of mind, brought up the reserve, and renewed the combat. Meanwhile Cromwell, having led on his troops to the attack of Langdale, overbore the force of the royalists, and by his prudence improved the advantage he had gained. Having pursued the enemy about a quarter of a mile, and detached some troops to prevent their rallying; he turned back upon the king's infantry, and threw them into the utmost confusion. One regiment alone preserved its order unbroken, though twice desperately assailed by Fairfax: and that general, excited by so steady a resistance, ordered Doyley, the captain of his life-guard, to give them a third charge in front, while he himself attacked them in rear. The regiment was broken. Fairfax, with his own hands, killed an ensign, and, having seized the colours, gave them to a soldier to keep for him. The soldier afterwards boasting that he had won this trophy, was reproved by Doyley, who had seen the action; "Let him retain that honour, said Fairfax, I have to-day acquired enough beside."

Prince Rupert, sensible too late of his error, left the fruitless attack on the enemy's artillery, and joined the king, whose infantry was now totally discomfited. Charles exhorted this body of cavalry not to despair, and cried aloud to them, "one charge more, and we recover the day." But the disadvantages under which they laboured, were too evident; and they could by no means be induced to renew the conflict. Charles was obliged to quit the field, and leave the victory to the enemy. The slain, on the side of the parliament, exceeded those on the side of the king: they lost a thousand men; he not above eight hundred. But Fairfax made five hundred officers prisoners, and four thousand private men; took all the king's artillery and ammunition; and totally dissipated his infantry: so that scarcely any victory could be more complete than that which he obtained (n).

After the battle, the king retreated with that body of horse which remained entire, first to Hereford, then to Abergavenny; and remained some time in Wales, with the hope of raising a body of infantry in those harassed and exhausted quarters. Fairfax, having first retaken Leicester, on the 17th of June, which was surrendered upon articles, began to deliberate concerning his future enterprizes. A letter was brought him written by Goring to the king, and unfortunately entrusted to a spy of Fairfax's. Goring there informed the king, that in three weeks he hoped to be master of Taunton; after which he would join his majesty with all the forces in the west; and entreated him, in the mean while, to avoid coming to any general action. This letter, which, had it been safely delivered, might have prevented the battle of Naseby, served now to direct the operations of Fairfax. After leaving a body of three thousand men to Pointz and Rossiter, with orders to attend the king's motions, he marched immediately to the west, with a view of saving Taunton, and suppressing the only considerable force which now remained to the royalists.

In the beginning of the campaign, Charles, apprehensive of the event, had sent the prince of Wales, then fifteen years of age, to the west, with the title of general, and had given orders, if he were pressed by the enemy, that he should make his escape into a foreign country, and save one part of the royal family from the violence of the parliament. Prince Rupert had thrown himself into Bristol, with an intention of defending that city. Goring commanded the army before Taunton.

On Fairfax's approach, the siege of Taunton was raised, on the 20th of July; and the royalists retired to Lamport, an open town in the county of Somerset. Fairfax attacked them in that post, beat them from it, killed about three hundred men, and took one thousand four hundred prisoners. After this advantage, he sat down before Bridgewater, a town esteemed strong and of great consequence in that county. When he had entered the outer town by storm, Windham the governor, who had retired into the inner, immediately capitulated, and delivered up the place to Fairfax. The garrison, to the number of two thousand six hundred men, were made prisoners of war, on the 23rd of the same month.

Fairfax, having next taken Bath and Sherborne, resolved to lay siege to Bristol, and made great preparations for an enterprize, which, from the strength of the garrison, and the reputation of prince Rupert, the governor, was deemed of the last importance. No sooner had the parliamentary forces entered the lines by storm, than the prince capitulated, on the 11th of September, and surrendered the city to Fairfax (o). Charles, who was forming schemes, and collecting forces, for the relief of Bristol, was astonished at so unexpected an event. Full of indignation, he instantly recalled all prince Rupert's commissions, and sent him a pass to go beyond sea.

The king's affairs now went fast to ruin in all quarters. The Scots, having made themselves masters of Carlisle, on the 28th of June, after an obstinate siege, marched southwards, and laid siege to Hereford; but were obliged to raise it on the king's approach: and this was the last glimpse of success which attended his arms. Having marched to the relief of Chester, which was again besieged by the parliamentary forces under colonel Jones, Pointz attacked his rear, and forced him to give battle, on the 24th of September. While the fight was continued with great obstinacy, and victory seemed to incline to the royalists, Jones fell upon them on the other side, and put them to rout, with the loss of six hundred slain, and one thousand prisoners. The king, with the remains of his broken army, fled to Newark, and thence escaped to Oxford, where he shut himself up the remainder of the winter.

The news which the king now received from every quarter were no less fatal than those events which passed where himself was present. Fairfax and Cromwell, after the surrender of Bristol, having divided their forces, the former marched westwards, in order to complete the conquest of Devonshire and Cornwall; the latter attacked the king's garrisons which lay to the east of Bristol. The Devizes were surrendered to Cromwell; Berkeley Castle was taken by storm; Winchester capitulated; Basing-house was entered sword in hand: and all these middle counties of England were, in a little time, reduced to obedience under the parliament.

The same rapid and uninterrupted success attended Fairfax. The parliamentary forces, elated by their victories, met with no equal opposition from troops, dismayed by repeated defeats, and corrupted by licentious manners. After beating up the quarters of the royalists at Bovey-Tracy, Fairfax sat down before Dartmouth, on the 18th of January, 1646, and in a few days entered it by storm. Poudram Castle being taken by him, and Exeter blockaded on all sides; Hopton, a man of merit, who now commanded the royalists, having advanced to the relief of that town with an army of eight thousand men, met with the parliamentary army at Torrington; where he was defeated on the 19th of February, all his foot dispersed, and himself, with his horse, obliged to retire into Cornwall. Fairfax followed him; and having inclosed the royalists at Truro, he forced the whole army, consisting of five thousand men, chiefly cavalry, to surrender upon terms (p). Thus Fairfax, after taking Exeter, which completed the conquest of the west, marched, with his victorious army, to the centre of the kingdom, and fixed his camp at Newbury. The prince of Wales, in pursuance of the king's orders, retired to Scilly, thence to Jersey; whence he went to Paris; where he joined the queen, who had fled thither from Exeter, at the time the earl of Essex conducted the parliamentary army to the west.

In the other parts of England, Hereford was taken by surprize: Chester surrendered: lord Digby, who had attempted, with one thousand two hundred horse, to break into Scotland and join Montrose, was defeated at Sherburn, in Yorkshire, by colonel Doyley; his whole force was dispersed; and himself was obliged to fly, first to the Isle of Man, thence to Ireland. News also arrived that Montrose himself,

(n) Among other spoils was seized the king's cabinet, with the copies of his letters to the queen, which the parliament afterwards ordered to be published.

(o) A few days before, he had written a letter to the king, in which he undertook to defend the castle for four months, if no mutiny obliged him to surrender it.

(p) The soldiers, delivering up their horses and arms, were allowed to disband, and received twenty shillings a-piece, to carry them to their respective abodes. Such of the officers as desired it, had passes to retire beyond sea: the others, having promised never more to bear arms, paid compositions to the parliament, and procured their pardon.

himself, ter some more successes, was at last routed; and this oly remaining hope of the royal party finally extinguishd.

WhenMontrose descended into the southern counties, the covenanters, assembling their whole force, met him with a numerous army, and gave him battle, but without success,at Kilsyth, on the 15th of August, 1645. This was the most complete victory that Montrose ever obtained. Th royalists put to the sword six thousand of their enemie, and left the covenanters no remains of any army in Scotlan. The whole kingdom was shaken with these repeatedsuccesses of Montrose; and many noblemen, who secretl favoured the royal cause, now declared openly for it, wha they saw a force able to support them. The marquis o Douglas, the earls of Annandale and Hartfield, the lois Fleming, Seton, Maderty, Carnegy, with many others flocked to the royal standard. Edinburgh opened its gats, and gave liberty to all the prisoners there detained by the covenanters. Among the rest was lord Ogilvy son of Airly, whose family had greatly contributed to thevictory gained at Kilsyth.

Davd Lesly was detached from the army in England, and marched to the relief of his distressed party in Scotland. Montrose advanced still farther to the south, in hopesof rousing to arms the earls of Hume, Traquaire, and Roxborough, who had promised to join him; and of obtaiing from England some supply of cavalry, in which he ws deficient. By the negligence of his scouts, Lesly, at Philip-haugh in the Forest, surprized his army, much diminished in numbers, from the desertion of the Highlanders, who had retired to the hills, according to custom, in order to secure their plunder. After a sharp conflict, where Montrose exerted great valour, his forces were routed by Lesly's cavalry, on the 13th of September, 1645; and himself was obliged to fly with his broken forces into the mountains; where he again prepared himself for new battles and new enterprizes (q).

After all these repeated disasters, which every where befel the royal party, there remained only one body of troops, on which fortune could exercise her rigour. Lord Astley, with a small army of three thousand men, chiefly cavalry, marching to Oxford, in order to join the king, was met at Stowe by colonel Morgan, and entirely defeated on the 22nd of March, 1646; himself being taken prisoner. "You have done your work," said Astley to the parliamentary officers; "and may now go to play, unless you chuse to fall out among yourselves."

The condition of the king, during this whole winter, was to the last degree disastrous and melancholy. Perhaps in no period of his life was he more justly the object of compassion. His vigour of mind, which, though it sometimes failed him in acting, never deserted him in his sufferings, was what alone supported him; and he was determined, as he wrote to lord Digby, if he could not live as a king, to die like a gentleman; nor should any of his friends, he said, ever have reason to blush for the prince whom they had so unfortunately served. The murmurs of discontented officers, on the one hand, harrassed their unhappy sovereign; while they over-rated those services and sufferings which, they now saw, must for ever go unrewarded. The affectionate duty, on the other hand, of his more generous friends, wrung his heart with a new sorrow; when he reflected that such disinterested attachment would so soon be exposed to the rigour of his implacable enemies. Repeated attempts, which he made for a peaceable and equitable accommodation with the parliament, served to no purpose but to convince them, that the victory was entirely in their hands. They replied not to several of his messages, in which he desired a passport for commissioners. At last, after reproaching him with the blood spilt during the war, they told him, that they were preparing bills for him; and his passing them would be the best pledge of his inclination towards peace: in other words, he must yield at discretion. He desired a personal treaty, and offered to come to London, upon receiving a safe-conduct for himself and his attendants: they absolutely refused him admittance, and issued orders for the guarding of his person, in case he should attempt to visit them. A new incident, which happened in Ireland, served to inflame the peoples' minds, and to increase those calumnies with which his enemies had so much loaded him, and which he ever regarded as the most grievous part of his misfortunes.

After the cessation with the Irish rebels, the king was desirous of concluding a final peace with them, and obtaining their assistance in England: and he gave authority to Ormond, lord lieutenant, to promise them an abrogation of all the penal laws enacted against Catholics; together with the suspension of Poyning's statute, with regard to some particular bills, which should be agreed on. Lord Herbert, created earl of Glamorgan, having occasion for his private affairs to go to Ireland, the king considered, that this nobleman, being a Catholic, and allied to the best Irish families, might be of service: he also foresaw, that farther concessions with regard to religion might probably be demanded by the Irish; and that, as these concessions, however necessary, would give great scandal to the Protestant zealots in his three kingdoms, it would be requisite both to conceal them during some time, and to preserve Ormond's character, by giving private orders to Glamorgan to conclude and sign these articles. But as he had a better opinion of Glamorgan's zeal and affection for his service, than of his capacity, he enjoined him to communicate all his measures to Ormond; and though the final conclusion of the treaty must be executed only in Glamorgan's own name, he was required to be directed, in the steps towards it, by the opinion of the lord lieutenant. Glamorgan, bigoted to his religion, and passionate for the king's service, but guided in these pursuits by no manner of judgement or discretion, secretly, without any communication with Ormond, concluded a peace with the council of Kilkenny, and agreed, in the king's name, that the Irish should enjoy all the churches of which they had ever been in possession since the commencement of their insurrection; on condition that they should assist the king in England with a body of ten thousand men. This transaction was discovered by accident. The titular archbishop of Tuam being killed by a sally of the garrison of Sligo, the articles of the treaty were found among his baggage, and were immediately published, and copies of them sent over to the English parliament. The lord lieutenant and lord Digby, foreseeing the clamour which would be raised against the king, committed Glamorgan to prison, charged him with treason for his temerity, and maintained, that he had acted altogether without authority from his master. The English parliament neglected not so favourable an opportunity of reviving the old clamour with regard to the king's favour of popery, and accused him of delivering over, in a manner, the whole kingdom of Ireland to that detested sect. The king told them, "That the earl of Glamorgan having made an offer to raise forces in the kingdom of Ireland, and to conduct them into England for his majesty's service, had a commission to that purpose, and to that purpose only, and that he had no commission at all to treat of any thing else, without the privity and direction of the lord lieutenant, much less to capitulate any thing concerning religion, or any property belonging either to church or laity." This declaration gave no satisfaction to the parliament.

Having lost all hope of prevailing over the parliament, either by arms or by treaty, the only resource which remained to the king was derived from the intestine dissensions, which ran high among his enemies. Presbyterians and Independents, even before their victory was fully completed, fell into contests about the division of the spoil; and their religious as well as civil disputes agitated the whole kingdom.

Though the parliament had early abolished episcopal authority, it had not, during so long a time, substituted any other spiritual government in its place; and their committees of religion had hitherto assumed the whole ecclesiastical jurisdiction: but they now established, by an ordinance, the Presbyterian model in all its forms of congregational, classical, provincial, and national assemblies. All the inhabitants of each parish were ordered to meet and chuse elders, on whom, together with the minister, was bestowed the direction of spiritual concerns within the congregation. A number of neighbouring parishes, commonly between twelve and twenty, formed a classis; and the court, which governed this division, was composed of all the ministers, together with two, three, or four elders chosen from each parish. The provincial assembly retained an inspection over several neighbouring classes, and was composed entirely of clergymen: the national assembly was constituted in the same manner; and its authority extended over the whole kingdom.

(q) The covenanters used the victory with rigour. Their prisoners, sir Robert Spotiswood, secretary of state, and son to the late primate, sir Philip Nisbet, sir William Rollo, colonel Nathaniel Gordon, Andrew Guthry, son of the bishop of Murray, William Murray, son of the earl of Tullibardine, were condemned and executed. The crime imputed to the secretary was his delivering to Montrose the king's commission to be captain general of Scotland. Lord Ogilvy, who was again taken prisoner, would have undergone the same fate, had not his sister found means to procure his escape, by changing clothes with him. For this instance of courage and dexterity, she met with harsh usage. The clergy solicited the parliament, that more royalists might be executed; but could not obtain their request.

But though the Presbyterians, by the establishment of parity among the ecclesiastics, were so far gratified, they were denied satisfaction in several other points, on which they were extremely intent. The assembly of divines had voted presbytery to be of divine right: the parliament refused their assent to that decision. Selden, Whitlocke, and other political reasoners, assisted by the Independents, had prevailed in this important deliberation. They thought, that, had these religionists been able to get their charter recognised, the presbyters would soon become more dangerous to the magistrate than had ever been the prelatical clergy. These latter, while they claimed to themselves a divine right, admitted of a like origin to civil authority: the former, challenging to their own order a celestial pedigree, derived the legislative power from a source no more dignified than the voluntary association of the people.

Under colour of keeping the sacraments from profanation, the clergy of all Christian sects had assumed, what they call the power of the keys, or the right of fulminating excommunication. The example of Scotland was a sufficient lesson for the parliament to use precaution in guarding against so severe a tyranny. They determined, by a general ordinance, all the cases in which excommunication could be used. They allowed of appeals to parliament from all ecclesiastical courts; and appointed commissioners in every province to judge of such cases as fell not within their general ordinance. So much civil authority, intermixed with the ecclesiastical, gave disgust to the zealous religionists.

But nothing was attended with more universal scandal than the propensity of many in the parliament towards a toleration of the Protestant sectaries. The Presbyterians exclaimed, that this indulgence made the church of Christ resemble Noah's ark, and rendered it a receptacle for all unclean beasts. They insisted, that the least of Christ's truths was superior to all political considerations. They maintained the eternal obligation imposed by the covenant to extirpate heresy and schism; and menaced all their opponents with the same rigid persecution, under which themselves had groaned, when held in subjection by the episcopal church. So great prudence and reserve, in such material points, does great honour to the parliament; and proves that, notwithstanding the prevalency of religious bigotry, there were many members who had more enlarged views, and paid regard to the civil interests of society.

While these disputes were canvassed by theologians, who engaged in their spiritual contests every order of the state, the king, though he entertained hopes of reaping advantage from those divisions, was much at a loss which side it would be most for his interest to comply with. The Presbyterians were, by their principles, the least averse to regal authority; but were rigidly bent on the extirpation of prelacy: the Independents were resolute to lay the foundation of a republican government; but as they pretended not to erect themselves into a national church, it might be hoped, that, if gratified with a toleration, they would admit the re-establishment of the hierarchy. So great attachment had the king to episcopal jurisdiction, that he was ever inclined to put it in balance even with his own power and office as a king.

But whatever advantage he might hope to reap from the divisions in the parliamentary party, he was apprehensive, lest it should come too late to save him from the destruction with which he was instantly threatened. Fairfax was approaching with a powerful and victorious army, and was taking the proper measures for laying siege to Oxford, which must infallibly fall into his hands. To be taken captive, and led in triumph by his insolent enemies, was what Charles abhorred; and every insult, if not violence, was to be dreaded, from that soldiery, who hated his person and despised his dignity. In this extremity, he embraced a measure which, in any other situation, might lie under the imputation of imprudence and indiscretion.

Montreville, the French minister, interested for the king more by the natural sentiments of humanity, than any instructions from his court, which seemed rather to favour the parliament, had solicited the Scottish generals and commissioners, to give protection to their distressed sovereign; and having received many general profesions and promises, he had always transmitted these, perhaps with some exaggeration, to the king. From his sugestions, Charles began to entertain thoughts of leaving Oxford, and flying to the Scottish army, which at that time lay before Newark. He considered, that the Scottis nation had been fully gratified in all their demands; and having already, in their own country, annihilated both episcopacy and regal authority, had no farther concessions to exact from him. In all disputes which had passed about settling the terms of peace, the Scots, he heard, had still adhered to the milder side, and had endeavoured to soften the rigour of the English parliament. Great disgusts also, on other accounts, had taken place between the nation; and the Scots found that, in proportion as their assistance became less necessary, less value was put upon them. The progress of the Independents gave them great alarm; and they were scandalized to hear their beloved covenant spoken of, every day, with less regard and reverence. The refusal of a divine right to presbytery, and the infriging of ecclesiastical discipline from political considerations, were, to them, the subject of much offence; and the king hoped, that, in their present disposition, the sight of their native prince, flying to them in his distress, would rouse every spark of generosity in their bosom, and procure him their favour and protection.

That he might the better conceal his intentions, orders were given at every gate in Oxford, for allowing three persons to pass; and in the night the king, accompanied by none but Dr. Hudson and Mr. Ashburnham, went out at that gate which leads to London. He rode before a portmanteau, and called himself Ashburnham's servant. He passed through Henley, St. Albans, and came so near to London as Harrow on the Hill. He once entertained thoughts of entering into that city, and of throwing himself on the mercy of the parliament. But at last, after passing through many cross roads, he arrived at the Scottish camp before Newark. The parliament, hearing of his escape from Oxford, issued rigorous orders, and threatened with instant death whoever should harbour or conceal him.

The Scottish generals and commissioners affected great surprize on the appearance of the king: and though they paid him all the exterior respect due to his dignity, they instantly set a guard upon him, under colour of protection, and made him in reality a prisoner. They informed the English parliament of this unexpected incident, and assured them that they had entered into no private treaty with the king. They applied to him for orders to Bellasis, governor of Newark, to surrender that town, now reduced to extremity; and the orders were instantly obeyed.—Hearing that the parliament laid claim to the entire disposal of the king's person, and that the English army was making some motions towards them, they thought proper to retire northwards, and to fix their camp at Newcastle.

This measure was very grateful to the king; and he began to entertain hopes of protection from the Scots. He was extremely attentive to the behaviour of their preachers, on whom all depended. It was the mode of that age to make the pulpit the scene of news; and on every great event, the whole scripture was ransacked by the clergy for passages applicable to the present occasion. The first minister who preached before the king, chose these words for his text: "And behold all the men of Israel came to the king, and said unto him, Why have our brethren, the men of Judah, stolen thee away, and have brought the king and his household, and all David's men with him, over Jordan? And all the men of Judah answered the men of Israel, Because the king is near of kin to us; wherefore then be ye angry for this matter? Have we eaten at all of the king's cost? or hath he given us any gift? And the men of Israel answered the men of Judah, and said, We have ten parts in the king, and we have also more right in David than ye: Why then did ye despise us, that our advice should not be first had in bringing back our king? And the words of the men of Judah were fiercer than the words of the men of Israel (r)." But the king soon found, that the happiness chiefly of the allusion had tempted the preacher to select this text, and that the covenanting zealots were nowise pacified towards him. Another preacher, after reproaching him to his face with his misgovernment, ordered this psalm to be sung;

"Why dost thou, tyrant, boast thyself Thy wicked deeds to praise?"

The

(r) 2 Sam. xix. 41, 42, 43.

The king stood up, and called for that psalm which begins with these words,

"Have mercy, Lord, on me, I pray;
For men would me devour:"

The good-natured audience, in pity to fallen majesty, showed, for once, greater deference to the king than to the minister, and sung the psalm which the former had called for.

Charles had very little reason to be pleased with his situation. He not only found himself a prisoner, very strictly guarded: all his friends were kept at a distance; and no intercourse, either by letters or conversation, was allowed him with any one on whom he could depend, or who was suspected of any attachment towards him. The Scottish generals would enter into no confidence with him; and still treated him with distant ceremony and feigned respect. And every proposal, which they made him, tended farther to his abasement.

They required him to issue orders to Oxford, and all his other garrisons, commanding their surrender to the parliament; and the king, sensible that their resistance was to very little purpose, willingly complied. The terms given to most of them were honourable; and Fairfax, as far as it lay in his power, was very exact in observing them. Far from allowing violence, he would not even permit insults or triumph over the unfortunate royalists; and by his generous humanity, so cruel a civil war was ended, in appearance very calmly, between the parties.

Ormond having received like orders, delivered Dublin, and other forts, into the hands of the parliamentary officers. Montrose, also, after having experienced still more variety of good and bad fortune, threw down his arms, and retired out of the kingdom.

The marquis of Worcester, a man past eighty-four, was the last in England that submitted to the authority of the parliament. He defended Raglan Castle to extremity; and opened not its gates till the middle of August. Four years, a few days excepted, were now elapsed, since the king first erected his standard at Nottingham. So long had the British nations, by civil and religious quarrels, been occupied in shedding their own blood, and laying waste their native country.

The parliament and the Scots laid their proposals before the king. They were such as a captive entirely at mercy, could expect from the most inexorable victor: yet were they little worse than what were insisted on before the battle of Naseby. The power of the sword, instead of ten, which the king now offered, was demanded for twenty years, together with a right to levy whatever money the parliament should think proper for the support of their armies. The other conditions were, in the main, the same with those which had formerly been offered to the king.

Charles said, that proposals, which introduced such important innovations in the constitution, demanded time for deliberation: the commissioners replied, that he must give his answer in ten days. He desired to reason about the meaning and import of some terms: they informed him that they had no power of debate; and peremptorily required his consent or refusal. He requested a personal treaty with the parliament: they threatened, that, if he delayed compliance, the parliament would, by their own authority, settle the nation.

What the parliament was most intent upon, was not their treaty with the king, to whom they paid little regard; but that with the Scots. Two important points remained to be settled with that nation; their delivery of the king, and the estimation of their arrears.

The Scots might pretend, that, as Charles was king of Scotland as well as of England, they were entitled to an equal vote in the disposal of his person; and that, in such a case, where the titles are equal, and the subject indivisible, the preference was due to the present possessor. The English maintained, that the king, being in England, was comprehended within the jurisdiction of that kingdom, and could not be disposed of by any foreign nation.

As the Scots concurred with the English, in imposing such severe conditions on the king, that, notwithstanding his unfortunate situation, he still refused to accept of them, it is certain that they did not desire his freedom; nor could they ever intend to join lenity and rigour together in so inconsistent a manner. Before the settlement of terms, the administration must be possessed entirely by the parliaments of both kingdoms; and how incompatible that scheme with the liberty of the king, is easily imagined. The Scottish commissioners, therefore, resolved to prolong the dispute, and to keep the king as a pledge for those arrears which they claimed from England, and which they were not likely, in the present disposition of that nation, to obtain by any other expedient. The sum, by their account, amounted to near two millions: for they had received little regular pay since they had entered England. And though the contributions which they had levied, as well as the price of their living at free quarters, must be deducted; yet still the sum which they insisted on was very considerable. After many discussions, it was, at last, agreed, that, in lieu of all demands, they should accept of four hundred thousand pounds, one half to be paid instantly, another in two subsequent payments.

Great pains were taken by the Scots (and the English complied with their pretended delicacy) to make this estimation and payment of arrears appear a quite different transaction from that for the delivery of the king's person: but common sense requires, that they should be regarded as one and the same. Thus the Scottish nation underwent the reproach of selling their king, and betraying their prince for money. But they maintained, that this money was, on account of former services, undoubtedly their due; that in their present situation, no other measure, without the utmost indiscretion, or even their apparent ruin, could be embraced; and that, though they delivered their king into the hands of his open enemies, they were themselves as much his open enemies as those to whom they surrendered him, and their common hatred against him had long united the two parties in strict alliance with each other.

The infamy of this bargain had such an influence on the Scottish parliament, that they once voted, that the king should be protected, and his liberty insisted on. But the general assembly interposed, and pronounced, that, as he had refused to take the covenant, which was pressed on him, it became not the godly to concern themselves about his fortunes. After this declaration it behoved the parliament to retract their vote.

Intelligence concerning the final resolution of the Scottish nation to surrender him, was brought to the king; and he happened at that very time, to be playing at chess. Such command of temper did he possess, that he continued his game without interruption; and none of the by-standers could perceive, that the letter which he perused, had brought him news of any consequence. The English commissioners, who, some days after, came to take him under their custody, were admitted to kiss his hands; and he received them with the same grace and cheerfulness, as if they had travelled on no other errand than to pay court to him. The old earl of Pembroke in particular, who was one of them, he congratulated on his strength and vigour, that he was still able, during such a season, to perform so long a journey in company with so many young people.

The king, being delivered over by the Scots to the English commissioners, on the 30th of January, 1647, was conducted, under a guard to Holdenby (s), in Northamptonshire. On his journey, the whole country flocked to behold him, moved partly by curiosity, partly by compassion and affection. If any still retained rancour against him, in his present condition, they passed in silence; while his well-wishers, more generous than prudent, accompanied his march with tears, with acclamations, and with prayers for his safety. That ancient superstition likewise, of desiring the king's touch in scrophulous distempers, seemed to acquire fresh credit among the people, from the general tenderness which began to prevail for this unhappy monarch.

At the latter end of the summer 1646, whilst the king remained in the Scotch army at Newcastle, died the parliament's discarded general, Robert Devereux, earl of Essex. By the republicans, to whose views and intentions he was a determined enemy, his death was regarded as an auspicious omen: by the royalists, whose cause, when in the meridian of his power and popularity, he never heartily hated, and whose cause, on the disgusts he had received from the prevalent faction, he began to love (t), his death was regretted as a particular and important loss (u): whilst by the Presbyterians, the nobility, and the greater part of the gentry, it was lamented as a decisive stroke of adverse fortune. To possess the spoils of an enemy, to seat themselves on the throne of tyranny, without any design to reform the oppressive principles of the constitution, was the only end for which this faction had entered into hostilities with the king; an end which might have been completely obtained, had the war been brought to a conclusion within the first three years of its period: but this event, which would have put all things in the power of the faction, was postponed by the crafty yet mistaken policy of those whom they had entrusted with the military command. In the foremost rank of these was the earl of Essex, who, to avoid an entire conquest over the king, had well nigh ruined the cause of liberty and the commonwealth, had made a trade of war, and sported with the blood of his countrymen, till the lingering contention gave power and numbers to a party, whose views of reformation were as opposite to the interests and designs of the Presbyterians, as was the established power of the monarchy and the prelacy.

(s) After the king had put himself in possession of the Scots, he sent a message to the parliament, proposing to repair to London; in order, he said, to the clearing up of his doubts. On this message, after some altercation between the lords and commons, whether the place of his majesty's residence should be Newmarket in Cambridgeshire, or Holdenby in Northamptonshire, it was resolved, according to the sense of the commons, in favour of the latter.

The opportunities with which Essex was favoured, had his dull ambition been quickened by spirit and tempered with judgement, had raised him to the highest pinnacle of his most aspiring wishes: in his person had concentered the reputation of Fairfax and the influence of Cromwell; in his power it would have been to have preserved at least the forms of monarchy with the privileges of the nobility, and to have established Presbytery. These were the purposes of the faction, and to these ends both the senate and the army would have concurred, had the king been reduced low enough to accept the conditions; but the mean jealousy which Essex had entertained of the popular interest, a too anxious care of preserving his importance and the importance of his order, occasioned the loss of both; and the parliament, at the end of a four years continued war, after having thrown away repeated opportunities of conquest, after having more than once found themselves on the brink of destruction, after having in vain lavished away the almost exhausted treasure of their partizans, were rather in a situation to receive than to impose conditions. The king was in possession of the greater part of the garrisons of the kingdom, and, according to his own opinion, stood a fair chance for complete victory. It was now no longer the season for dallying: the principle of safety was superior to other considerations; the passion of fear for some time got the better of bigotry and the love of power; and the new modelling the army was a measure of necessity, to which all parties readily submitted. The superiority the republicans gained by the alteration is already apparent; whilst the earl of Essex, instead of reaping the glory of putting an end to the war to the satisfaction of that party by whom he was entrusted with the supreme command, was totally discarded from the service of the public, and constrained to give place to the rising fortunes of a more active rival.

It is observed by his contemporary the earl of Clarendon, that Essex was rather driven into opposition by the repeated ill usage he had received from the court (v), than by any particular affection for the freedom of the constitution; and this opinion appears to be well grounded by the activity the earl shewed against the Scots in their first invasion. It is obvious, that had the other chief officers employed in this expedition acted with the same sincerity and zeal, the Scots would have been reduced to the tamest submission, and the king's tyranny fully established over both nations: nor was it any backwardness in Essex, but the most preposterous folly in the court, that he who had the character of being the most experienced soldier of the age, that he who had executed with the utmost punctuality his former trust, was not put at the head of the second expedition against the Scots, and thus rendered the instrument of destruction of the liberties of both countries (w). It is more than probable, that the after-patriotism of his character was determined by this mortifying neglect, with the being haughtily refused a favour he had solicited (x). We find him among the list of those who petitioned the king to call a parliament to settle the disputes in question; and as the popular party left no pains nor flattery unpractised to gain him entirely to their interest, he became of consequence enough to be among those whom the king, in his state of humiliation, endeavoured to corrupt by the lucre of office. The earl of Essex, with other popular lords, was sworn of the king's privy-council in the year 1640; and in 1641 the chamberlain's staff was taken from the earl of Pembroke, with whom the king was highly displeased, and conferred on the earl of Essex. In this capacity, Clarendon says, he would have forsaken his party and attended the king to Hampton Court, had he not been assured by the earl of Holland that there was a design laid to assassinate him. The angry measure which by the queen's influence was executed of depriving him of his office, with the insults which on his domestic misfortunes were flung on him by the court (y), rivetted his resentment; and this, with an ambition which he had early imbibed, of shining in a military capacity, induced him to accept of the parliament the honour of heading the army they had raised against popish and prelatical influence. Essex had now passed the Rubicon, and was declared a traitor in form (z); and though he appears to have had a sufficient knowledge of the implacability of the faction he opposed, and the ruin which would ensue to himself and his party if overcome by the king, yet, from the motives already specified, notwithstanding all the encouragement the parliament gave him, he could never be brought to act otherwise than upon (t) After the vote for new modelling the army had passed both houses, we find the name of Essex in all protests against popular resolutions.—Parl. Hist.

(u) "The Presbyterian party, says Clarendon, finding themselves superior in the two houses, would without doubt have attempted to new model the army, if it had not pleased God to have taken away the earl of Essex, who died in a time when he might have been able to have undone much of the mischief he had formerly wrought, to which he had great inclinations; and had indignation enough for the indignities himself had received from the ungrateful parliament, and wonderful apprehension and detestation of the ruin he saw likely to befal both king and kingdom; and it is very probable, considering the present temper of the city at that time, and of the two houses, he might, if he had lived, have given some check to the fury which prevailed. But, continues this superstitious writer, God would not suffer a man, who, out of the pride and vanity of his nature, rather than the wickedness of his heart, had been made an instrument of so much mischief, to have any share in so glorious a work." Clar. Hist. vol. iii. p. 32, & seq.

(v) James had shewn himself a warm partizan against Essex, in a domestic concern of the most tender and delicate nature; and on finding his name among the list of petitioners against Irish peerages, expressed against him a particular and petulant resentment. "Into the royal presence (says Wilson, his domestic servant,) the earl of Essex came but seldom, perceiving that he was not very agreeable to the king; which was attributed to the roughness of his deportment, and his affecting the manner and garb of a soldier." By all accounts, Essex met with the same discouraging treatment from the son as he had received from the father: sir Philip Warwick says, That he was a man much disobliged at court; that the court was not artificial enough to make that right use of him which his interest amongst the soldiers, and his plain blunt English nature, might have been formed into by a seeming consequence. Clarendon says, He had no ambition of title, of office, or preferment, but only to be kindly looked upon and kindly spoken to, and quietly to enjoy his own fortune. Wilson's History of Great Britain, p. 736. Warwick's Memoirs of Charles the First, p. 130. Clarendon's History of the Rebellion.

(w) Essex, with a part of the army, had orders to advance to Berwick; and in his march thither he met with several Scotch noblemen, who pretending to be well affected to the king, informed him of the great strength of their countrymen, of their march towards England, and of the hazard he must run in attacking them with so inconsiderable a force. The earl heard them, quickened his march, took possession of Berwick, found the Scots had in reality hardly any forces, and if the king had sent him proper orders, says one of his biographers, he would have marched on to Edinburgh, and reduced that people to their duty. "The Scots, upon the approach of the king's army, says the same writer, addressed themselves to the king's generals, and especially to the earl of Essex, with great humility: the other two received their applications kindly enough; but Essex behaved with becoming dignity, sent their letters to the king, and when his majesty was prevailed upon to listen to an accommodation, refused to have any concern in it, or so much as to receive the visits of the Scotch commissioners, till the pacification was signed. When there was no farther occasion for his service, he was dismissed rather with coldness than civility, and in the second expedition against the Scots was not offered any command." Biographia Britannica.

(x) On the wardenship of Needwood Forest, which was close to the earl of Essex's house at Chartley, becoming void by the death of the lord Aston, the earl solicited the post, "and was refused it, says Clarendon, in such a manner, that he could not avoid taking it as an affront."

(y) Anthony Wood hints this in vol. ii. p. 94, of his History of Oxford Writers; and, in p. 93, exclaims, "Happy had it been, in all probability not less for king Charles than this earl, had either his ladies found fewer or he more friends at court!" Clarendon says, That the wavering politics of Essex became fixed on its being repeated to him what the king and queen had formerly said of him, and by fresh intelligence procured from York of what the king then thought of him. Clar. Hist. vol. i. p. 372.

(z) The king not only declared Essex a traitor, but refused to receive the parliament's first application for peace, because delivered by his hand.

the defensive; and, by playing often into the hands of the enemy, had very nearly lost the whole. In the absurd and mischievous conduct of Essex is discoverable the venom which lies in political distinctions; that an individual thus invidiously adorned is more or less, according to the strength of his selfish affections, detached from the true interests of society; and that virtues of humanity never rise high enough to combat the temptations of aristocratic privilege.

According to the vulgar sense of honour, the earl of Essex is by all parties in that article allowed to be very punctilious. He had a serious turn of mind; and the little encouragement he received from the court, with the taste he had imbibed for martial exercises, occasioned him to avoid that circle of dissipated folly, and to devote his time to military employment, and studious retirement.—He served one campaign in the Palatine, and four in the Dutch service; attended lord Wimbledon in the character of vice-admiral, in the unsuccessful expedition to Cadiz, in 1625; and was appointed to the same command in the fleet which Charles fitted out against the Dutch, in 1635. On the return from these expeditions, he immediately repaired to his seat of Chartley Castle, in Staffordshire, or to the country retirements of one or other of his nearest friends and relations; where, in the rural recreations of hunting and hawking, the exhibition of masks and plays, with the more philosophical exercises of reading and learned conversation, he divided his time till the meeting of parliament, in 1640, called him to an active scene of public business.

The earl of Essex was born in 1592; received his education at the school of Eton and the university of Oxford; at the age of fourteen he was sent to travel for his farther improvement; and returned, at the end of four years, with the reputation of being one of the most accomplished noblemen of his time. In his early youth he was contracted to the lady Frances Howard; but this match being dissolved by divorce, he afterwards wedded Mrs. Elizabeth Paulet, daughter to sir William Paulet, a natural son of the marquis of Winchester: equally unhappy in this as in his first marriage, he had again recourse to the expedient of divorce (a), to get rid of the second yoke he had unadvisedly submitted to; and from this period laid aside all thoughts of a matrimonial state. He left no surviving issue; and died of a sudden and violent illness, which he had contracted from having over heated himself in a stag chace, on the 14th of September, 1646 (b). The Presbyterian faction, whose interest in the two houses was yet powerful and prevalent, paid on this occasion the highest honours to their leader: the lords and commons, with a great number of military officers and gentlemen of distinction, accompanied him to the grave; and his funeral was, at the charge of the public, celebrated with the highest magnificence and expence.

The dominion of the parliament was of short duration. No sooner had they subdued their sovereign, than their own servants rose against them, and tumbled them from their slippery throne. The sacred boundaries of the laws being once violated, nothing remained to confine the wild projects of zeal and ambition. And every successive revolution became a precedent for that which followed it. In proportion as the terror of the king's power diminished, the division between the Independents and Presbyterians became every day more apparent; and the neuters found it at last requisite to seek shelter in one or the other faction. Many new writs were issued for elections, in the room of members who had died, or were disqualified by adhering to the king; yet still the Presbyterians retained the superiority among the commons; and all the peers, except lord Say, were esteemed of that party. The Independents, to whom the inferior sectaries adhered, predominated in the army; and the troops of the new model were universally infected with the same spirit. To their assistance did the Independent party among the commons chiefly trust, in their projects for acquiring the ascendant over their antagonists.

Shortly after the retreat of the Scots, the Presbyterians, seeing every thing reduced to obedience, began to talk of diminishing the army; and, on pretence of easing the public burdens, they levelled a deadly blow at the opposite faction. They purposed to embark a strong detachment, under Skippon and Massey, for the service of Ireland: they openly declared their intention of making a great reduction of the remainder (c). It was even apprehended, that another new model of the army was projected, in order to regain to the Presbyterians that superiority which they had so imprudently lost by the former.

The army had little inclination to the service of Ireland; a country barbarous, uncultivated, and laid waste by massacres and civil commotions: they had less inclination to disband, and to renounce that pay, which, having earned it through fatigues and dangers, they now purposed to enjoy in ease and tranquillity. These motives of interest acquired additional influence, and became more dangerous to the parliament, from the religious spirit by which the army was universally actuated. Among the generality of men, educated in regular, civilized societies, the sentiments of shame, duty, honour, have considerable authority, and serve to counterbalance and direct the motives derived from private advantage: but, by the predominancy of enthusiasm among the parliamentary forces, these salutary principles lost their credit, and were regarded as mere human inventions, yea moral institutions, fitter for heathens than for christians. The saint, resigned over to superior guidance, was at full liberty to gratify all his appetites, under the appearance of pious zeal. And, besides the strange corruptions engendered by this spirit, it eluded and loosened all the ties of morality, and gave entire scope, and even sanction, to the selfishness and ambition which naturally adhere to the human mind.

The military confessors were farther encouraged in disobedience to superiors, by that spiritual pride to which a mistaken piety is so subject. They were not, they said, mere janizaries; mercenary troops inlisted for hire, and to be disposed of at the will of their paymasters. Religion and liberty were the motives which had excited them to arms; and they had a superior right to see those blessings, which they had purchased with their blood, ensured to future generations. By the same title that the Presbyterians, in contradistinction to the royalists, had appropriated to themselves the epithet of godly, or the well-affected, the Independents did now, in contradistinction to the Presbyterians, assume this magnificent appellation, and arrogate all the ascendant which naturally belongs to it.

Hearing of parties in the house of commons, and being informed that the minority were friends to the army, the majority enemies; the troops interested themselves in that dangerous distinction, and were eager to give the superiority to their partizans. Whatever hardships they underwent, though perhaps derived from inevitable necessity, were ascribed to a settled design of oppressing them, and resented as an effect of the animosity and malice of their adversaries.

Notwithstanding the great revenue, which accrued from taxes, assessments, sequestrations, and compositions, considerable arrears were due to the army; and many of the private men, as well as officers, had near a twelvemonth's pay still owing to them. The army suspected, that this deficiency was purposely contrived in order to oblige them to live at free quarters; and by rendering them odious to the country, serve as a pretence for disbanding them. When they saw such members as were employed in committees and civil offices, accumulate fortunes, they accused them of rapine and plunder. And, as no plan was pointed out by the commons for the payment of arrears, the soldiers dreaded, that, after they should be disbanded or embarked for Ireland, their enemies, who predominated in the two houses, would entirely defraud them of their right, and oppress them with impunity.

On this pretence did the first commotions begin in the army. A petition, addressed to Fairfax the general, was handed about; craving an indemnity, and that ratified by the king, for any illegal actions, of which, during the course of the war, the soldiers might have been guilty; together with satisfaction in arrears, freedom from pressing, relief of widows and maimed soldiers, and pay till disbanded. The commons, aware of what combustible materials the army was composed, were alarmed at this intelligence. Such a combination, they knew, if not checked in its first appearance, must be attended with dangerous consequences, and soon exalt the military above the civil authority. Besides summoning some officers to answer for this attempt, they voted, on the 30th of March, that the petition tended to introduce mutiny, to put conditions upon the parliament, and to obstruct the relief of Ireland; and they threatened to proceed against the promoters of it, as enemies to the state, and disturbers of the public peace. This declaration produced fatal effects. The soldiers lamented, that they were deprived of the privileges of Englishmen; that they were not allowed so much as to represent their grievances; that, while petitions from Essex and other places were openly encouraged against the army, their mouths were stopped; and that they, who were the authors of liberty to the nation, were reduced, by a faction in parliament, to the most grievous servitude.

In this disposition was the army found by Warwick, Dacres, Massey, and other commissioners, who were sent to make them proposals for entering into the service of Ireland. Instead of inlisting, the generality objected to the terms; demanded an indemnity; were clamorous for their arrears: and, though they expressed no dissatisfaction against Skippon, who was appointed commander, they discovered much stronger inclination to serve under Fairfax and Cromwell. Some officers, who were of the presbyterian party, having entered into engagements for this service, could prevail on very few of the soldiers to inlist under them. And, as these officers lay all under the grievous reproach of deserting the army, and betraying the interests of their companions, the rest were more fully confirmed in that confederacy.

To petition and remonstrate being the most cautious method of conducting a confederacy, an application to parliament was signed by near two hundred officers; in which they made their apology with a very imperious air, asserted their right of petitioning, and complained of that imputation thrown upon them by the former declaration of the lower house. The private men likewise of some regiments sent a letter to Skippon; in which, together with insisting on the same topics, they lament, that designs were formed against them and many of the godly party in the kingdom; and declare, that they could not engage for Ireland, till they were satisfied in their expectations, and had their just desires granted. The army, in a word, felt their power, and resolved to be masters.

The parliament too resolved, if possible, to preserve their dominion; but being destitute of power, and not retaining much authority, it was not easy for them to employ any expedient which could contribute to their purpose. The expedient which they now made use of, was the worst imaginable. They sent Skippon, Cromwell, Ireton, and Fleetwood, to the head-quarters at Saffron Waldon in Essex; and empowered them, on the 7th of May, to make offers to the army, and inquire into the cause of its distempers. These very generals, at least the three last, were secretly the authors of all the discontents; and failed not to foment those disorders, which they pretended to appease. By their suggestion, a measure was embraced, which, at once, brought matters to extremity, and rendered the mutiny incurable.

In opposition to the parliament at Westminster, a military parliament was formed. Together with a council of the principal officers, which was appointed after the model of the house of peers; a more free representative of the army was composed, by the election of two private men or inferior officers, under the title of agitators, from each troop or company. By this means, both the general humour of that time was gratified, and an easy method contrived for conducting and propagating the sedition of the army.

This court, when assembled, having first declared that they found no distempers in the army, but many grievances, under which it laboured, immediately voted the offers of the parliament unsatisfactory. Eight weeks' pay alone, they said, was promised; a small part of fifty-six weeks, which they claimed as their due: no visible security was given for the remainder; and having been declared public enemies by the commons, they might hereafter be prosecuted as such, unless the declaration were recalled. Before matters came to this height, Cromwell hastened to London, on pretence of laying before the parliament the rising discontents of the forces.

The parliament made one vigorous effort more, to try the force of their authority: they voted that all the troops, which did not engage for Ireland, should instantly be disbanded in their quarters. At the same time, the council of the army ordered a general rendezvous of all the regiments, in order to provide for their common interests. And while they thus prepared themselves for opposition to the parliament, they struck a blow, which at once decided the victory in their favour.

A party of fifty horse appeared at Holdenby, on the 3rd of June, conducted by Joyce, a cornet in colonel Whaley's regiment. The attending officers asked his name and business. He told his name, and said his business was to speak with the king. "From whom?" said the officers. "From myself," replied Joyce. Hereupon the officers smiled, but he told them it was no laughing matter; and on their advising him to withdraw his men, and in the morning he should speak with the commissioners, he told them, "That he did not come there to be advised by them, nor had he any business with the commissioners; that his errand was to the king, and speak with him he must and would presently." The commanding officers of the king's guard directed their men, who were three times the number of Joyce's party, to stand to their arms, and be ready to fire when ordered; but instead of preparing for resistance, they opened the gates to their fellow soldiers, shook them by the hands, and bid them welcome. Joyce then went into the king's presence, armed with pistols, and told him, that he must immediately go along with him. "Whither?" said the king. "To the army;" replied Joyce. "By what warrant?" asked the king. Joyce pointed to the soldiers, whom he brought along with him. "Your warrant," said Charles smiling, "is writ in fair characters, legible without spelling." The parliamentary commissioners came into the room: they asked Joyce, whether he had any orders from the parliament? he said, "No:" from the general? "No:" by what authority he came? he made the same reply as to the king: "They would write," they said, "to the parliament to know their pleasure." "You may do so," replied Joyce; "but in the mean time the king must immediately go with me." Resistance was vain. The king, after protracting the time as long as he could, went into his coach; and was safely conducted to the army, who were hastening to their rendezvous at Triplo-Heath, near Cambridge. The parliament, informed of this event by their commissioners, were thrown into the utmost consternation.

Fairfax himself was no less surprized at the king's arrival. That bold measure, executed by Joyce, had never been communicated to the general. The orders were entirely verbal; and nobody avowed them. And while every one affected astonishment at the enterprize, Cromwell, by whose council it had been directed, arrived from London, and put an end to their deliberations.

Cromwell had conducted himself in the parliament with such profound dissimulation, that he had long deceived the members. At every intelligence of disorders in the army, he was moved to the highest pitch of grief and of anger. He wept bitterly: he lamented the misfortunes of his country: he advised every violent measure for suppressing the mutiny; and by these precipitate counsels, at once seemed to evince his own sincerity, and inflamed those discontents, of which he intended to make advantage. He obtested heaven and earth, that his devoted attachment to the parliament had rendered him so odious in the army, that his life, while among them, was in the utmost danger; and he had very narrowly escaped a conspiracy formed to assassinate him. But information being brought, that the most active officers and agitators were entirely his creatures, the parliamentary leaders secretly resolved, that, next day, when he should come to the house, an accusation should be entered against him, and he should be sent to the Tower. Cromwell, who in the conduct of his desperate enterprizes frequently approached to the very brink of destruction, knew how to make the requisite turn with proper dexterity and boldness. Being informed of this design, he hastened to the camp; where he was rceeived with acclamations, and was instantly invested with the supreme command, both of general and army.

Fairfax, having neither talents himself for cabal, nor penetration to discover the cabals of others, had given his entire confidence to Cromwell; who, by the best coloured pretences, and by the appearance of an open sincerity and a scrupulous conscience, imposed on the easy nature of this brave and virtuous man. The council of officers and the agitators were moved altogether by Cromwell's direction, and conveyed his will to the whole army. By his artful conduct, he had now attained a situation, where he could cover his enterprizes from public view; and seeming either to obey the commands of his superior officer, or yield to the movements of the soldiers, could secretly pave the way for his future greatness. While the disorders of the army were yet in their infancy, he kept at a distance; lest his counterfeit aversion might throw a damp upon them, or his secret encouragement beget suspicion in the parliament. As soon as they came to maturity, he openly joined the troops; and in the critical moment, struck that important blow of seizing the king's person, and depriving the parliament of any resource of an accommodation with him. Though one vizor fell off, another still remained, to cover his natural countenance. Where delay was requisite, he could employ the most indefatigable patience: where celerity was necessary, he flew to a decision. And by thus uniting in his person the most opposite talents, he was enabled to combine the most contrary interests in a subserviency to the purposes he secretly intended.

The parliament, though at present defenceless, was possessed of many resources; and time might enable them to resist that violence with which they were threatened. Without farther deliberation, therefore, Cromwell advanced the army upon them, and arrived in a few days at St. Albans, within twenty miles of the capital.

Nothing could be more popular than this hostility which the army commenced against the parliament. As much as that assembly was once the idol of the nation, as much was it now become the object of general hatred and aversion. The self-denying ordinance had no longer been put in execution, than till Essex, Manchester, Waller, and the other officers of that party, had resigned their commission: immediately after, it was laid aside by tacit consent; and the members, sharing all offices of profit and power among them, proceeded with impunity in exercising acts of oppression on the helpless nation. Though the necessity of their situation might serve as an apology for many of their measures, the people, not accustomed to such a species of government, were not disposed to make the requisite allowances.

The severities exercised against the episcopal clergy, naturally affected the royalists in a sensible manner. By the most moderate computation (d), it appears, that above one half of the established clergy had been turned out of their livings, for adhering to the civil and religious principles in which they had been educated; and for their attachment to those laws under whose countenance they had at first embraced that profession. To renounce episcopacy and the liturgy, and to subscribe the covenant, were the only terms which could save them from so rigorous a fate; and if the least mark of affection to the king had ever escaped their lips, even this hard choice was not permitted. But what excited the most general complaint was, the unlimited rule of the country-committees. During the war, the discretionary power of these courts was excused, from the plea of necessity: but the nation was reduced to despair, when it saw neither end put to their duration, nor bounds to their authority. These could sequester, fine, imprison, and corporally punish, without law or remedy. They interposed in questions of private property. Under colour of malignancy, they exercised vengeance against their private enemies.

The parliament, conscious of their decay in popularity, seeing a formidable armed force advance upon them, were reduced to despair, and found all their resources much inferior to the present necessity. London still retained a strong attachment to Presbyterianism; and its militia, which was numerous, and had acquired reputation in wars, had by a late ordinance been put into hands in whom the parliament could entirely confide. This militia was now called out, and ordered to guard the lines, which had been drawn round the city, in order to secure it against the king. A body of horse was ordered to be instantly levied. Many officers, who had been cashiered by the new model of the army, offered their service to the parliament. An army of five thousand men lay in the north under the command of general Pointz, who was of the Presbyterian faction; but these were too distant to be employed in so urgent a necessity. The forces destined for Ireland were quartered in the west; and, though deemed faithful to the parliament, they also lay at a distance. Many inland garrisons were commanded by officers of the same party; but their troops, being so much dispersed, could at present be of no manner of service. The Scots were faithful friends, and zealous for presbytery and the covenant; but a long time was required, ere they could collect their forces, and march to the assistance of the parliament.

In this situation, it was thought more prudent to submit, and by compliance to stop the fury of the enraged army. The declaration, by which the military petitioners had been voted public enemies, was recalled and erased from the journal-book. This was the first symptom which the parliament gave of submission; and the army, hoping, by terror, to effect their purposes, stopped at St. Albans, and entered into negociation with their masters.

Here commenced the encroachments of the military upon the civil authority. The army, in their usurpations on the parliament, copied exactly the model which the parliament itself had set them, in their recent usurpations on the crown. Every day they rose in their demands. If one claim was granted, they had another ready, still more exorbitant; and seemed determined never to be satisfied. At first they pretended only to petition for what concerned themselves as soldiers: next, they must have a vindication of their character; then it was necessary, that their enemies be punished: at last they claimed a right of modelling the whole government, and settling the nation. They preserved, in words, all deference and respect to the parliament; but, in reality, insulted them and tyraanized over them. That assembly they pretended not to accuse: it was only evil counsellors who had seduced and betrayed it. They proceeded so far, on the 16th of June, as to name eleven members, whom, in general terms, they charged with high treason, as enemies to the army and evil counsellors to the parliament. Their names were, Denzil Hollis, sir Philip Stapleton, sir William Lewis, sir John Clotworthy, sir William Waller, sir John Maynard, major-general Massey, Glyn the recorder, colonel Walter Long, colonel Edward Harley, and Anthony Nicholas, Esq. These were the very leaders of the Presbyterian party. They insisted that these members should be sequestered from parliament, and thrown into prison. The commons replied, that they could not, upon a general charge, proceed so far. The army observed to them, that the cases of Strafford and Laud were direct precedents for that purpose. At last, the eleven members themselves, not to give occasion for discord, begged leave to retire from the house; and the army, for the present, seemed satisfied with this mark of submission. Pretending that the parliament intended to levy war upon them, and to involve the nation again in blood and confusion, they required, that all new levies should be stopped. The parliament complied with this demand.

There being no signs of resistance, the army removed, at the desire of the parliament, to a greater distance from London, and fixed their head-quarters at Reading. They carried the king along with them in all their marches. That prince now found himself in a better situation than at Holdenby, and had attained some greater degree of freedom, as well as of consideration, with both parties. All his friends had access to his presence: his correspondence with the queen was not interrupted: his chaplains were restored to him, and he was allowed the use of the liturgy: his children were once allowed to visit him, and they passed a few days at Caversham, where he then resided. He had not seen the duke of Gloucester, his youngest son, and the princess Elizabeth, since he left London, at the commencement of the civil disorders; nor the duke of York, since he went to the Scottish army before Newark. Such an instance of indulgence in the army was extremely grateful to him. Cromwell, who was witness to the meeting of the royal family, confessed, that he never had been present at so tender a scene; and he extremely applauded the benignity which displayed itself in the whole disposition and behaviour of Charles.

That artful politician, as well as the leaders of all parties, paid court to the king; and fortune seemed again to smile upon him. The parliament, afraid of his forming some accommodation with the army, addressed him in a more respectful style than formerly; and invited him to reside at Richmond, and contribute his assistance to the settlement of the nation. The chief officers treated him with regard, and spake on all occasions of restoring him to his just powers and prerogatives. In the public declarations of the army, the settlement of his revenue and authority was insisted on. The royalists, every where, entertained hopes of the restoration of monarchy; and the favour which they universally bore to the army, contributed to discourage the parliament, and to forward their submission.

(d) See John Walker's Attempt towards recovering an Account of the Numbers and Sufferings of the Clergy. The parliament pretended to leave the sequestered clergy a fifth of their revenue; but this author makes it sufficiently appear, that this provision, small as it is, was never regularly paid to the ejected clergy.

The king began to feel of what consequence he was. The more the national confusions increased, the more was he confident that all parties would, at length, have recourse to his lawful authority as the only remedy for the public disorders. "You cannot be without me," said he, "on several occasions: You cannot settle the nation but by my assistance." From the present scene of confusion, all men, he hoped, would be brought to reflect on that ancient government, under which they and their ancestors had so long enjoyed what he called happiness and tranquillity.

Charles, however, in his expectations to hold the balance between the opposite parties, entertained more hopes of accommodation with the army than with the parliament. The parliament pretended to annihilate his authority: they had confined his person. In both these particulars the army showed more indulgence. He had a free intercourse with his friends. And in the proposals, which the council of officers sent for the settlement of the nation, they insisted neither on the abolition of episcopacy, nor of the punishment of the royalists; the two points to which the king had the most extreme reluctance: and they demanded, that a period should be put to the present parliament; the event for which he most ardently panted. His conjunction too seemed more natural with the generals, than with the parliament, who had so long assumed the sovereignty of the state, and declared their resolution still to continue masters. By gratifying a few persons with titles and preferments, he thought to draw over the whole military power, and reinstate himself in his civil authority. To Ireton he offered the lieutenancy of Ireland: to Cromwell, the garter, the title of earl of Essex, and the command of the army. Negociations to this purpose were secretly conducted. Cromwell pretended to hearken to them; and was pleased to keep the door open for an accommodation, if the course of events should, at any time, render it necessary. And the king indulged hopes that he would embrace a measure which, by all the motives of duty, interest, and safety, seemed to be recommended to him.

While Cromwell allured the king by these expectations, he continued his scheme of reducing the parliament to subjection, and depriving them of the means of resistance. To gratify the army, the parliament invested Fairfax with the title of general in chief of all the forces in England and Ireland; and entrusted the whole military authority to a person who, though well inclined to their service, was no longer at his own disposal. They voted that the troops which, in obedience to them, had inlisted for Ireland, and deserted the rebellious army, should be disbanded, or, in other words, be punished for their fidelity. The forces in the north, under Pointz, had already mutinied against their general, and had entered into an association with that body of the army which was so successfully employed in exalting the military above the civil authority.

That no resource might remain to the parliament, it was demanded, that the militia of London should be changed, the Presbyterian commissioners displaced, and the command restored to those who, during the course of the war, had constantly exercised it. The parliament even complied with so violent a demand, and passed a vote in obedience to the army. Thus they purposed to temporize under their present difficulties, and hoped to find a more favourable opportunity for recovering their authority and influence: but the impatience of the city lost them all the advantage of their cautious measures. A petition against the alteration of the militia was carried to Westminster, on the 20th of July, attended by the apprentices and seditious multitude, who besieged the door of the house of commons; and by their clamour, noise, and violence, obliged them to reverse that vote, which had passed so lately. When gratified in this pretension, they immediately dispersed, and left the parliament at liberty.

No sooner was intelligence of this tumult conveyed to Reading, than the army was put in motion. The two houses being under restraint, they were resolved, they said, to vindicate, against the seditious citizens, the invaded privileges of parliament, and restore that assembly to its just freedom of debate and counsel. In their way to London, they were drawn up on Hounslow Heath; a formidable body of twenty thousand men, and determined, without regard to laws or liberty, to pursue whatever measures their generals should dictate. Here the most favourable event happened, to quicken and encourage their advance. The speakers of the two houses, Manchester and Lenthal, attended by nineteen peers (e), and about one hundred commoners, having secretly retired from the city, presented themselves with their maces, and all the ensigns of their dignity; and complaining of the violence put upon them, applied to the army for defence and protection. They were received with shouts and acclamations: respect was paid to them as to the parliament of England; and the army being provided with so plausible a pretence, which, in all public transactions, is of great consequence, advanced to chastize the rebellious city, and to reinstate the violated parliament. Neither Lenthal nor Manchester were esteemed Independents; and such a step in them was unexpected. But they probably foresaw, that the army must, in the end, prevail; and were willing to pay court in time to that authority, which began to predominate in the nation.

The parliament, forced from their temporising measures, and obliged to resign, at once, or combat for their liberty and power, prepared themselves with vigour for defence, and determined to resist the violence of the army. The two houses immediately chose new speakers, lord Hunsdon, and Henry Pelham: they renewed their former orders for enlisting troops: they appointed Massey to be commander: they ordered the trained bands to man the lines: and the whole city was in a ferment, and resounded with military preparations.

When any intelligence arrived, that the army stopped or retreated, the shout of "One and all," ran with alacrity, from street to street, among the citizens: when news came of their advancing, the cry of "Treat and capitulate," was no less loud and vehement. The terror of an universal pillage, and even massacre, had seized the citizens.

As the army approached, Rainsborough, being sent by the general over the river, presented himself before Southwark, and was gladly received by some soldiers, who were quartered there for its defence, and who were resolved not to separate their interests from those of the army. It behoved then the parliament to submit. The army marched in triumph through the city; but preserved the greatest order, decency, and appearance of humility. They conducted to Westminster the two speakers, who took their seats as if nothing had happened. The eleven impeached members, being accused as authors of the tumult, were expelled; and most of them retired beyond sea: seven peers (f) were impeached: sir John Gayre (the lord mayor), Thomas Cullam (alderman), one of the sheriffs, with James Bunce, John Langham, and Thomas Adams, (aldermen,) were committed to the Tower on accusation of high treason: several citizens and officers of the militia committed to prison: every deed of the parliament annulled, from the day of the tumult till the return of the speakers: the lines about the city levelled: the militia restored to the Independents: regiments quartered in Whitehall and the Meuse: and the parliament being reduced to a regular formed servitude, a day was appointed of solemn thanksgiving for the restoration of its liberty.

The situation of the king, during this contest between the civil and the military powers, had been very flattering to his hopes: from the first seizure of his person by the army he had been treated with great civility and respect; he was indulged with the company of his children, friends, and attendants; and allowed the celebration of divine service after the manner of the church of England (g). The army, in all their addresses to the parliament, had recommended moderation in their dealings to the cavalier faction; and, when the liberties and privileges of the subject were firmly established, a due regard to the king's pretensions. The consequence of this conduct, whether sin-

These peers, on the commons not prosecuting their impeachment with any particular charge, were soon after their commitment released. They were again impeached by the commons, but permitted by the upper house to give security for their appearance. The upper house, on the discharge of these lords from their confinement, passed a declaration, That no peer should hereafter be under restraint upon a general charge.

(g) It may be observed, that the parliament had denied the king's repeated requests for the liberty of these indulgences.

cere or artificial, was fortunate: it prevented the dreaded coalition between the Scotch and English Presbyterians with the royalists, whom these favourable appearances had so elevated, that sir John Berkeley, with Mr. John Ashburnham, was dispatched from the queen to promote a firm union between the king and the army. These agents, on their arrival, found both the general officers and agitators to appearance well disposed to an agreement with the king, on terms of safety to the commonwealth; proposals were actually drawn up by commissary-general Ireton, to be propounded to the parliament, in which the interests of the Presbyterian, Independent, and even the royal party, were in some measure comprised (h).

This favourable return of unexpected fortune was again lost to the king, by that duplicity of conduct from which he never varied, and those deep-laid schemes of which he was himself the only dupe. The Scotch commissioners (who had sent up several remonstrances in the name of their countrymen to the parliament, for a speedy agreement with the king, on the grounds of the national league and covenant, in which they had expressed great fears for the safety of the king's person, and used many severe expressions against the army) were permitted among others to pay their respects to the royal prisoner. In these interviews there were some advances made for a junction between the Scotch Presbyterians and the English cavaliers; and the grounds of a treaty were actually commenced for another Scotch invasion. The parliament of England had, during their contest with the army, sent a very civil message to the king; wherein they had pressed him so far to countenance their cause as to acknowledge himself under a disagreeable restraint with the army. Thus courted from every quarter, Charles, in his captive state, regarded himself as the umpire of all differences; and, endeavouring to keep on terms with all, he, doubtless, intended to fall in with those who would sacrifice the most to the interest of his prerogatives. To the army he declared a willingness both to abide with them, and a satisfaction that he was delivered from the restraints the parliament had lain on him: to the parliament he sent word, That he had been carried from Holdenby against his will, and that they were not to give any credit to what he should write whilst under confinement: and to the Scotch commissioners he promised almost every thing they could ask, provided they would commence a new war in his favour.

Full of such airy projects, and elevated with weak-grounded hopes, the king, when proposals were sent to him by the army, and his concurrence, says Berkeley, most humbly and earnestly desired, talked to the committee who brought them not only haughtily, but with asperity: "He would have nobody suffer for his sake; he had repented him of nothing so much as the signing the bill against the lord Strafford; he would have the church established according to law:" and when it was replied by the committee, that it was enough for them to have waved the point, and they hoped for his majesty, since he had waved the government itself in Scotland, he answered, "He hoped God had forgiven him that sin." To a discourse and manner thus unpleasant and ill-timed, the king would often repeat, "You cannot be without me, you will fall to ruin if I sustain you not (i)." The whole company, with wonder on each countenance, stared on one another, on hearing the king talk after this manner. Sir John Berkeley having in vain attempted to attract his notice, stepped up to him, and whispered him in the ear, That he spoke as if he had some secret strength and power; "which, added sir John, if your majesty hath concealed from me, I wish you had concealed it from these men too." This admonition occasioned the king to recollect himself so far as to endeavour, when too late, to soften his former discourse; for colonel Rainsborough, who rather disliked the proposed agreement with the king, slipped away before the conference was over, and acquainted his fellow-associates with the harsh treatment their committee had received. Sir John Berkeley afterwards obtained a meeting with the superior officers; but on his pressing them to declare what the king had to trust to, should he grant the proposals, they gave him no farther satisfaction than "They would offer them to the parliament;" and on his question, "If the parliament refused them, what would they do then?" they bluntly replied, "They would not tell." The plot which was at this time carrying on in the city, to bring the king in with freedom, safety, and honour, and the promises of the Scots, was that imaginary strength on which the king had assumed those airs of superiority in his treaty with the army's committee; and the reason on which he had absolutely insisted, contrary to the earnest desire of his present keepers, on the removing to Richmond, according to the invitation of both houses (k).

When the metropolis was in a manner in the power of the army, through the success they had met with in Southwark, the king received advice, from some of the officers who were in his interest, to write a letter to the general, signifying his reliance on the counsels of the army, and his disapprobation of the tumultuous behaviour of the citizens: but the matter being under four different debates before the king would come to a resolution, the commissioners from London, with the full submission of the city, reached Sion House, the seat of the general's quarters, before the arrival of the king's letter; which coming out of time, and with an ill grace, did not help to reinstate him in the good opinion or affection of the army. The Presbyterians, who still maintained a majority in the lower house, and the lords, who were almost all of the Presbyterian interest, encouraged by the Scotch commissioners, who continually urged the necessity of a speedy coalition with the king, sent him, with an addition for an act to be passed for abolishing archbishops and bishops, the sale of their lands, and some few alterations in the matter of fines and compositions of delinquents, the same propositions formerly sent to Newcastle; but the king, highly dissatisfied that there was no abatement in their demands, refused the articles, and desired a personal treaty with the parliament, on the proposals of the army, which had been now presented in form to both houses (l). Ireton, Cromwell, and their partizans in the house, pressed with earnestness the (h) Sir John Berkeley tells us, "That he was not only permitted to view these proposals, but even to alter two of the articles in the most material points; and that when he would have altered a third, the matter of which was the excluding only seven persons, who were not named, from pardon, and not admitting the cavalier faction to sit in the next parliament, he was only gently rebuked by Ireton, who answered, There must be preserved some difference between the state of the conqueror and the conquered, and that he should be afraid of a parliament wherein the king's party should have a major voice."

(i) Sir John Berkeley, in his Memoirs, says, That on the king's manifesting to him (Berkeley) a great dislike of the army's propositions, he told him, that he should suspect their integrity if they had demanded less favourable terms: it was not likely that men who had through great difficulties and dangers acquired such advantages, should ever sit down with less than was contained in their proposals; and that there never was a crown so near lost so cheaply recovered. This, and other rational discourse of the same kind, had no effect on the king, who insisted, that the army could not subsist without him, and that he did not doubt he should see them very shortly glad to condescend farther. Berkeley's Memoirs, p. 30.

(k) The king was so peremptorily resolved on accepting the parliament's invitation, that he repeatedly asserted, he would endeavour to make it the last action of that man's life, who should go about to hinder him; but when he had prepared all things for his journey, the parliament yielded up the point to the army, and sent him a message requesting him to remain in the quarters of the camp.

(l) The proposals of the army:

First, That there should be biennial parliaments, each of which to sit fourteen days, afterwards to be adjournable and dissolvable by the king: the king, upon advice of the council of state, between the intervals of biennial parliaments, upon extraordinary occasions to call an extraordinary parliament, provided its sitting disturb not the course of biennial elections: biennial parliaments to appoint committees during their intervals, for such purposes as are by the proposals referred to such committees: That a better rule of proportion may be observed in elections, all counties to be represented in the number of their members competent to their charges: That effectual provision be made for freedom of elections: That there be a liberty of entering dissents in the house of commons; with provision that no member be censurable for aught said or voted in that house, further than to exclusion from that trust: That the judicial power or final judgement of lords and commons be cleared and determined; and that no person so adjudged be pardonable by the king without their consent: That the right and liberty of the commons of England, as to a due exemption from any proceedings against them by the house of peers without the concurrence of the commons, be cleared and vindicated: That grand jurymen be chosen in an equal way by the divisions of counties, and not remain at the discretion of an under-sheriff: That the militia, and the power of raising money for the maintenance of what force is deemed sufficient by the two houses, be in the power of the two houses for the space of ten years: None who have been in hostilities against the parliament to be, without the consent of parliament, capable of bearing office in the kingdom, or of a seat in parliament, for the space of five years: The commanders both of the land and sea forces to be now appointed: That a council of state be now appointed, the individuals of which to hold their offices si bene se gesserint, for a term of time to be now settled, not exceeding seven years; this council of state to superintend and direct the powers of the land and sea militia, to consult on all foreign negociations, provided the making of peace and war with foreign states be not without the advice and consent of parliament: That there be a sufficient establishment now provided, to last till two months after the meeting of the first biennial parliament, for the salary of forces both in England and Ireland: That for the

the king's desire for a personal treaty; but without effect. The republicans, who had hitherto regarded them in their interest, began to suspect they had made a private bargain with the king; and joining with the Presbyterians, carried the question clearly against them. The majority of the army, who were greatly exasperated at the manner in which the king had treated their proposals, were equally dissatisfied with the carriage of their leaders: they murmured in private against them as betrayers of the cause, and in council the agitators complained of the king's being suffered to hold continual cabals with malignants, who flocked about him; asserted, "That on his having rejected their proposals, they were no farther engaged to him; that having now the power devolved to them by the decision of the sword, to which all parties had appealed, it behoved them to consult their own safety and the public good; and being convinced, from the experience of all times, that monarchy was inconsistent with the prosperity of the nation, they would use their endeavours to reduce the government of England to the form of a commonwealth."

These high proceedings of the army alarmed Fairfax; Ireton also disliked their pushing forward to the goal of Freedom by other than his direction; and Cromwell (the most corrupt and selfish being that ever disgraced an human form, who had actually made very shameful and dangerous advances to the king (m), and who expected to make a good bargain for himself of the implicit faith the army had had of his integrity and inclinations to theirs and the public weal) was like a madman, when he found himself thus on the brink of being disappointed of his interested views. A general rendezvous, where it was hoped the majority of the army would yet adhere to the proposals which had been made to the king, was determined on in a council of war. On the day appointed for this meeting, those who were simply honest to the principles of equal and general freedom, who called themselves Commonwealth's men, but who were in derision stiled Levellers (n), appeared with distinguishing marks in their hats (o). Cromwell, who had had good intelligence of the cabal, attended by several officers whom he had preferred, and who on this account were become his creatures (p), rode up to one of the regiments thus signalized, and in a peremptory manner required them to throw aside these symbols. On being refused obedience, he caused several of the ringleaders to be seized by the soldiers with whom he was accompanied, held in the field a council of war, by the authority of which one of these mutineers was immediately shot dead, and the rest committed to close confinement. This act of resolution was so unexpected, that it appalled the discontented troops, who were totally unprepared for the event; they yielded a ready obedience to his commands; and the army being thus dispersed in their quarters, without coming to any resolution contradictory to the judgement of their chiefs, Cromwell went to give an account of his exploits to the parliament, from whom he received the highest encomiums.

The discontent of the army in general had arisen to such a height against the king, and against those whom they fancied were in compact with him, that it had obliged Cromwell and others to forbear their former intimacies with his two counsellors and confidants, sir John Berkeley and Mr. Ashburnham. The studied manner in which they endeavoured to avoid their conversation, with frequent intimations from all quarters, even from Cromwell himself, that the army had ill designs, and that it was not in his (Cromwell's) power to undertake for the king's security whilst among them, and in particular that he was now abridged of the liberty he had been suffered to enjoy (q), occasioned this unfortunate prince to conclude that his life was in danger, and to meditate the means for an immediate escape. The place of refuge at first thought on was London, and that the king should make an unexpected appearance in the house of lords; but to this it was objected, that the army, being masters of the city and parliament, would undoubtedly seize him there, and, should any blood be shed in his defence, he would be accused of being the author of a new war. To the safe counsel of securing his person by leaving the kingdom, the king himself objected. After these and several other proposals had been made and objected to, it was at length determined between the king and Mr. Ashburnham, in whose judgement he chiefly confided, that lieutenant-colonel Hammond, an officer of repute in the army and a great friend of Cromwell, should be the man on whose generosity he should fling himself for protection. Having secured a relay of horses, Charles, in consequence of this resolution, in the company of Berkeley, Ashburnham, and Leg, stole away from the camp in the evening of the 11th of November; and after meeting with many difficulties in passing through Windsor Forest, in a dark stormy night, he arrived the next day at Tichfield, a house of the earl of Southampton. From this place Berkeley and Ashburnham were dispatched to the Isle of Wight, to notify to Hammond (the governor) the king's intention. The unexpected intelligence had such an effect upon Hammond, that he turned pale, and fell into a fit of trembling, which the space of ten years the great officers of state be nominated by the two houses, or their committees; after that time, they to nominate three, out of which number the king to appoint one: No peers made since the 21st day of May, 1642, or to be hereafter made, to sit or vote in parliament without the consent of both houses: A confirmation of the ordinances for indemnity, and all declarations and other proceedings against the parliament, or those who have acted by their authority, to be recalled and cancelled: An act for invalidating grants, &c. under the old great seal from the time of its conveyance from the parliament, and validating the grants, &c. by the new one: The treaties between England and Scotland to be confirmed: The ordinance for taking away the Court of Wards and Liveries to be confirmed: The cessation with Ireland to be declared void, and the prosecution of the war to be in the lords and commons: The coercive power, authority, and jurisdiction of bishops and ecclesiastical courts to be taken away: The repeal of all acts or clauses of acts, enjoining the use of the Common-Prayer, imposing penalties on the neglect of it, the neglect of attending divine service in churches, or for meeting elsewhere for prayer, and other religious duties: The covenant not to be enforced on any: That these things proposed being established, his majesty's person, his queen, and royal issue, be restored to a condition of safety, honour, and freedom, without diminution to their personal rights, or farther limitation to the exercise of the regal power, than according to the particulars foregoing.

The next article in these propositions fixes the number of excepted persons for the English to five, and determines the rate of compositions; the next is for a general pardon; the next, that the liberty of the subject to petition be cleared and vindicated; the others are for the abolishing those arbitrary powers produced by the war, the taking off the excise on the necessaries of life, the abolishing monopolies, the oppressions and encroachments of forest-law, to rectify the inequality of rates, that the stipend of ministers should be settled other than by tithes, for reforming the course of law in matters of right, concerning prisoners for debt, the exacting evidence from near relations in criminal cases, the imposing oaths, the righting and satisfying the kingdom in point of account, provision for payment of arrears to the soldiery, and the public debts and damages of the kingdom.

(m) The garter, with the title of earl of Essex, and his son to be of the prince of Wales's bed-chamber, were to be the reward of Cromwell's services. Ireton, Cromwell's son-in-law, was at the same time offered the lieutenancy of Ireland.

(n) This is an hackneyed term of reproach, flung out on all occasions by the adversary against the partizans of liberty; both with a view to throw ridicule on their systems, as visionary and impracticable, and to engage the selfish affections of men in the cause of arbitrary and unequal dominion. The levelling plan, according to the insinuations of these scoffers, never was, nor never can be adopted by men who have accurate notions of a state of nature, or who are well informed in the science of government and the laws of society; for though the justice and wisdom of God has given equal and impartial privileges to the species in general, yet the difference which exists in the judgement, understanding, sagacity, genius, and industry of individuals, creates superiority and inferiority of character, and produces a state of dependence from man to man. To preserve that natural subordination established by God himself, and to keep that accumulation of property and influence which the different qualities of men occasion, from producing tyranny, and infringing the general rights of the species, lies the whole art of true and just policy. All political distinctions which are personal, however wisely and impartially distributed, are mischievous in their nature, because they give weight instead of ballance to the preponderating scale: but hereditary privileges are the mere establishments of selfishness, and attended with the most destructive consequences; since, necessarily counteracting the laws of Providence, the vicious and the foolish bear rule over the wise and the virtuous, the system of nature is not regulated but overturned, and those are preposterously placed at the head of society, whose qualities often entitle them to no other than the most inferior station in it.

(o) These were papers, on which were the following motto, "England's liberty and the soldier's rights."

(p) "Lieutenant-general Cromwell, says Ludlow, not contenting himself with his part in an equal government, puffed up by his successes to an expectation of greater things, and having driven a bargain with the grandees of the house, either to comply with the king, or to settle things in a factious way without him, procured a party to stand by him in seizing some of those who appeared at the rendezvous in opposition to his designs: for though, when an agreement with the king was carried on by other hands, he could countenance the army in opposition to the parliament, yet now the bargain for sale of the people's liberties being carried on by himself, he opposed those who laboured to obstruct it, pretending his so doing to be only in order to keep the army in subjection to the parliament, who being very desirous to have this spirit suppressed by any means, not only approved what he had done, but gave him the thanks of the house for it; whereunto, though singly, I, adds Ludlow, gave as loud a No as I could, being fully convinced that he had acted in this manner for no other end but to advance his own passion and power into the room of right and reason." Ludlow, p. 86.

(q) According to Ashburnham's account, the king, at least six days before he attempted to escape, was confined within the limits of his house and garden.

continued for an hour, exclaiming at times, "Oh, gentlemen, you have undone me, in bringing the king into the island, if at least you have brought him; and if you have not, I pray let him not come; for what between my duty to him, and gratitude for this fresh obligation of confidence, and the discharge of my trust to the army, I shall be confounded." Berkeley had sense enough to regard this consternation of Hammond as no good presage, and would have receded from the purpose; but, after much conversation, in which both agents endeavoured, though in vain, to bring Hammond to a more particular and explicit declaration than the following, "That he did believe the king relied on him as a person of honour and honesty, and therefore he did engage himself to perform whatever could be expected from a person so qualified." Ashburnham yet persisting in the resolution of trusting him, assented to a proposition he had made of carrying him to Titchfield to the king. The king was thunderstruck when he heard from Ashburnham, that his agents, instead of bringing from Hammond a particular promise of protection, as he had required, had brought the governor himself; he struck his hand upon his breast, and said, "Oh, you have undone me; I am now made fast from stirring!" After some conversation of the same kind between the king and Ashburnham, in which the latter used many passionate lamentations for his precipitate step, and the king determined that it was too late to take other measure than what was now forced upon him, Hammond was introduced; and after a repetition to the king of the same general assurances which had been given to his agents, the whole company went forward from Titchfield to the Isle of Wight (r).

When the news of the king's flight reached the capital, the parliament passed an ordinance, declaring loss of life and confiscation of goods to any who should harbour or conceal his person, without revealing it to the two houses. The dwellings of those who had been the most notorious in the late riots, and the most zealous in their proceedings against the army, were searched. Orders were sent to shut all the ports in the kingdom; and a proclamation was issued for banishing from London, or within the distance of twenty miles, all persons who had borne arms for the king. The arrival of letters from colonel Hammond determined, on the subject of the king's flight, the hopes and the fears of all parties. It was voted, That the place of his confinement in the Isle of Wight should be Carisbrook Castle, and all malignants not only to be restrained from coming into his presence, but from remaining in the island.

Charles, when he retired from the camp, intended in some place of security to carry on the two opposite treaties he had entered into, the one with his Scotch subjects, and the other with sir Thomas Fairfax and the general officers of his army. In pursuance of this plan, the Scotch commissioners were summoned to repair to his presence; and letters (in which was expressed an entire confidence in their friendship) were sent by sir John Berkeley to Fairfax, to Cromwell, and to Ireton. Hammond, whose treatment of his prisoner had been humane and courteous, accompanied Charles's dispatches with others of his own to Ireton and Cromwell, in which he used many arguments and entreaties to persuade them to a speedy junction with the king. In the way to the camp, Berkeley received intelligence that the army was not yet come to any resolution respecting the king, and that something had been dropped by the agitators concerning bringing him to a trial. When he arrived at the general's quarters, and had delivered his compliments and letters, he had the mortification to be told by Fairfax, with a severe stern look, in a full assembly of officers, "That the army was the parliament's army, and therefore they could say nothing to the king's motion for peace, but must refer those matters to their principals, to whom they would send his majesty's letters." Berkeley looked round for comfort on the countenances of his old acquaintances, Cromwell and Ireton, who not only regarded him coldly, but treated with disdain the letters he had delivered to them from Hammond.

Full of the most melancholy apprehensions, Berkeley retired to his lodgings; and at twelve o'clock at night, in an unsuspected place, he had a meeting with Watson, the scout-master-general, who informed him, "That the army had now come to a resolution to bring the king to a trial: that though the officers had appeared superior at the general rendezvous, they were obliged to submit to the sense of the mutineers; for that two-thirds of the army were so resolutely bent against an agreement with the king, that they had declared, they would leave nothing unessayed to bring the whole body to their sense; and if all failed they would make a division, and join with any who would assist in the destruction of their opposers: that Cromwell, on a full information that this was the sense of the majority, had lain aside his former opposition; had acknowledged, that the glories of the world had so dazzled his eyes that he could not see clearly the great works the Lord was doing; had declared his resolution to humble himself, and desire the prayers of the saints, that God would be pleased to forgive him his self-seeking; had sent messages of comfort to those imprisoned for the late mutiny, desiring them to be of good cheer, for no harm should befal them, since it had pleased God to open his eyes: and that with these arts, and the assistance of Hugh Peters (a famous Independent minister), he had made a full peace with the party he had offended." Though to this intelligence Watson had added the two following propositions, made by Ireton, on the incident of Berkeley's arrival at the camp, first, "That he should be sent prisoner to London," and secondly, "That none should speak with him on pain of death;" yet this trusty servant, leaving no means unessayed which might possibly assist his master, sent a messenger to Cromwell to inform him, "That he had particular letters and instructions to him;" but received for answer, "That Cromwell durst not venture to see him; and that though he would serve his majesty as long as he could do it without his own ruin, yet he desired that it might not be expected he should perish for his sake."

The danger of the king was now apparent, and Berkeley lost no time in acquainting him of his danger; and joined to his intelligence an earnest supplication, that he would lay aside all schemes but that for an immediate escape: yet Charles, not apprehending the peril so great as represented, determined to wait the consequences of his present machinations; and resuming his correspondence with the two houses, renewed his offers for a personal treaty, and accompanied them with proposals for a peace (s). Notwithstanding the king's former denial, the parliament, before his removal from the army, had voted to address him once more on the subject of peace. The propositions drawn up on this occasion were now resumed; and, on a motion of the lords, it was resolved to admit the king to a personal treaty, on condition of his giving his assent to four preliminary articles, to be passed into acts: the first concerned securing to the parliament full power over the militia for the space of twenty years, with a right of resuming the same authority whenever they should declare the safety of the kingdom required it; by the second, the king was required to recall all his declarations and proclamations against the parliament, and acknowledge them to have taken arms for their just and necessary defence; by the third, he was to annul all the acts, and void all the patents of peerage, which had passed the great seal since it had been conveyed from London by Lyttleton the chancellor; and by the fourth, he was to give the two houses power to adjourn when they thought fit.

The resolution of parliament to renew the offer of agreement with the king, was disagreeable to the majority of the republicans; both because it disappointed their schemes for a more equal government, and through a well-grounded fear, that were Charles restored to any part of monarchical power, he would by the means of that part not only recover the remainder, but be enabled to gratify his own faction, and revenge himself of the rest. For very different reasons this intended application was opposed by the Scotch commissioners; who, in a large remonstrance protested against the four preliminary bills, (r) Hammond had had the precaution to carry Basket, the governor of Cowes Castle with him, and to order a file of musketeers to follow.

(s) The king in these proposals refused to give up episcopacy, or grant his consent to an alienation of church lands; because it could not be denied, he said, it was a sin of the highest sacrilege. He offered to restrain the power of bishops; to give up the militia during his own reign; to pay the arrears of the army; to give to the parliament the nomination of the great officers of state; to take away, for a valuable consideration, the court of Wards and Liveries; to pass an act of oblivion; and to give his two houses satisfaction as to Ireland. As the king's intention in this message was only to procure leave to come to London, that he might conveniently consult measures with and unite parties in his cause, he wrote word to the earl of Lanerk, that his conduct in this particular, though it might be misinterpreted, and so disliked by the Scotch commissioners, was to procure a personal treaty; that he thought it necessary to tell him, he might assure his fellow-commissioners, that change of place had not altered his mind from what it was when he saw him last. Burnet's Memoirs, p. 325.

and insisted upon a personal treaty. Altercation on each side ensued; but both houses adhering to their resolution, the committee they had appointed to wait on the king was accompanied with the Scotch commissioners, who delivered to his majesty a public declaration or protestation, on behalf of the kingdom of Scotland, against the propositions of the parliament. They were so successful in the insinuations and promises they made in private, that the ill-fated Charles returned a refusal to the offers of the parliament; and thus rejected the last chance which remained to him for the security and safety of his person.

Sir John Berkeley had cautioned the king, that an absolute negative would produce so strict a confinement of his person as to render his intended escape impracticable. To this observation Charles assented; yet depended on the success of the shallow expedient of delivering his answer sealed up to the parliament's commissioners. The commissioners sternly and absolutely refused to receive the king's answer sealed; in consequence it was opened: when the contents were known, the commissioners abruptly departed; and Hammond, who till this period had indulged the king in the full liberty of going out of and into the castle, and of riding about the island at his pleasure, who had admitted of the repair of his friends and partizans to see him, had been so successful in his expostulations to the parliament as to procure him the attendance of his own servants, now perceiving he had closed with the Scots, in opposition to the interests of England and the security of the Independents, doubled the guards round the castle, barred the gates, sent away Ashburnham, Berkeley, Leg, and the rest of his servants from the island, and thus prevented him from every possible means of an escape.

The receipt of the king's denial put both houses in a flame: the republicans took the opportunity to advance those opinions which had hitherto only transpired in their private councils and conversations. Sir Thomas Wroth, with the following whimsical expression, "That Bedlam was appointed for madmen, and Tophet for kings," moved, "that the person of Charles should be secured in some inland castle, with strong guards; that articles of impeachment should be drawn up against him; and that he should be set aside, and the kingdom settled without him: neither, added the passionate member, do I care what form of government you set up, so it be not by kings and devils." Commissary Ireton asserted, that the king by denying the four bills, had denied safety and protection to his people: subjection to a sovereign, he observed, was but a return for protection to the people; and that being denied by the king, subjection ought to be withheld, and the kingdom settled without him; it was now expected, after so long waiting, that parliament should shew its resolution, and not desert those valiant men who had engaged for them beyond all possibility of a retreat, and who would never forsake the parliament unless the parliament forsook them. Cromwell, who spoke last in the debate, after declaiming some time on the valour, good affections, and godliness of the army, said, "That it was now expected the parliament should govern and defend the kingdom by their own power and resolution, and not teach the people any longer to expect safety and protection from a man whose heart God had hardened: those men, continued he, who have defended you from so many dangers, with the expence of their blood, will defend you herein with fidelity and courage, against all opposition. Teach them not, by neglecting your own and the kingdom's safety, to think themselves betrayed and left to the rage and malice of an irreconcilable enemy, whom they have subdued for your sake, and therefore are likely to find his future government of them insupportable, and fuller of revenge than justice, lest despair (and here Cromwell laid his hand on his sword) indicate to them to seek their safety by some other means than adhering to you, who will not stick to yourselves; and how destructive such a resolution will be to you all, I tremble to think on."

On the question being called for, it passed in the affirmative, by one hundred and forty-one voices against ninety-two, "That the lords and commons do declare, that they will make no farther addresses or application to the king." This was on the 15th of January, 1648. The three following resolutions passed without a division: "That no application or addresses be made to the king by any person whatsoever, without the leave of both houses; and that the person or persons who shall make breach of this order, shall incur the penalty of high-treason: That the two houses do declare, that they will receive no messages from the king; and do enjoin that no person whatsoever do presume to receive or bring any message from the king to either or both houses of parliament: That the members of both houses of the committees of both kingdoms have power to sit and act alone (as formerly the committees of both kingdoms had) for the safety of the kingdom." The lords passed, with little hesitation, these resolutions; and the commons farther voted, "That colonel Hammond and sir William Constable, (who had been joined with Hammond in the office of guarding the king,) be required to remove from their attendance on the king's person all such as they shall judge improper to be trusted; and that it be referred to the committee of the revenue what persons are fit and necessary to attend on the king, and which way the expences of his entertainment may be conveniently retrenched." At the same time an ordinance passed for taking away all the first-fruits and tenths payable to the crown, with the discharging the arrears due on that score: and the parliament, to refresh the memory of the public on the provocations and reasons which had excited and urged them to these severities, published a declaration, in which were narrated all the errors and tyranny of the king's administration; his conspiracy against the Protestant cause; the war he had made on his people, since the spirit of liberty had raised a successful opposition to his pretensions; his obstinately rejecting the several propositions for peace which had been at different times offered to him, with the perfidious use he had made of treaties; his last refusal of giving a necessary security to his people; and every criminal transaction he had been supposed or known to be engaged in, from the death of his father to the present time.

Whilst matters in parliament were proceeding to such extremities against the king, he found means, notwithstanding his close confinement, to carry on a variety of negociations for the overwhelming on all sides the Independents, when they least expected it (t). The Scots, with whom he had concluded a treaty (u), were with all possible diligence to raise an army, to assist the king's friends in the recovery of his rights; the most violent of the Presbyterians had promised their countenance and support; the cavaliers were to keep themselves in readiness to rise on the first favourable opportunity; assurances were given of large succours from abroad; and a correspondence was carried on with the lord Inchiquin, in consequence of whose undertaking the marquis of Ormond, was to return into Ireland, and put himself at the head of the cavalier and Popish factions; the latter of which, being displeased with the ruinous and tyrannical proceedings of the nuncio, had now promised to put themselves under his command.

The vote of No more Addresses had to appearance cured those jealousies, which had so long subsisted between the civil and the military powers. The same views and interests seemed to unite in a close junction the parliament with the army, who presented to both houses a declaration, in which they avowed their resolution to adhere to them in their proceedings against the king, and in the settling and securing the kingdom without him. The army were sincere in these their professions; but the parliament, the majority of whom were Presbyterians, dissembled their sentiments till a fit opportunity offered to avenge themselves of a party whose principles they hated, and with (t) It was the knowledge that the king was carrying on intrigues opposite to the interests of the army, the Independents, and his own protestations, which raised the resentment of the soldiery against him, and which excited them, before his removal, to insist on the dismission of malignants from attendance on his person; and the forbearance of that indulgence which had been shewn him, in permitting the resort of all parties to his presence. To Cromwell, who procured intelligence from those who were admitted to the nearest confidence, every particular of these transactions was known, and the circumstance of the king's intriguing with his declared enemies the Scots, occasioned him, among other prevalent reasons, to lay aside the thoughts of rising by court favour.

(u) Which Clarendon tells us, he was induced to sign by the same vicious logic which tainted all his councils; viz. that it was not to be observed farther than it served the present turn; for when the armies which were to be raised for the king in England had joined with the Scots, they would not have power to exact these particulars, for every body would then be obliged to submit to what his majesty should think fit to be done. The same author shrewdly observes on the treaty, That it contained so many monstrous concessions, that, except the whole kingdom of England had been imprisoned with the king in Carisbrook Castle, it could not be imagined it could ever have been performed. The king prevailed with the Scotch commissioners to give way to his inserting in the treaty a declaration, That by the clause of confirming Presbyterian government he was not obliged to desire the settling it, nor to present any bills to that effect. Clar. Hist. vol. iii. p. 78, & seq.

whose measures they had unwillingly co-operated. Whilst the public seemed willing to forfeit the reward of their toils, and return to their old state of bondage, rather than endure the expence of supporting the military establishment any longer, the parliament heightened that impatience, by withstanding the necessary supplies; and notwithstanding the repeated remonstrances made by the soldiers, on the necessity they were laid under to grieve and enrage the country, by living on free-quarter; notwithstanding all the assurances given them on this subject by the two houses; notwithstanding all the ordinances passed both for their constant support, and payment of their arrears; the public treasure was diverted to other purposes, and the army left to shift for themselves. When murmurs and preparations from all quarters threatened new commotions, the parliament insisted on decreasing the military force, by disbanding supernumeraries; a command which was complied with by sir Thomas Fairfax, but with this caution, that the supernumeraries disbanded on this occasion were, the most of them, those who belonged to the old army, and whose officers were in the interest of the adverse faction. Whilst the parliament was thus secretly conspiring against the only body who were inclined or able to preserve their authority, combinations, which visibly tended to the restoring the royal authority, were forming in every part of the three kingdoms.

Secure as was the present situation of the Scots, their commissioners found on their return a large party, who were willing to endanger their present happy establishment, and to embark a second time in all the uncertainties of war, for the restoration of that power they had so largely contributed to destroy. The faction now formed in favour of the king, of whom the duke of Hamilton (who had obtained his liberty on the surrender of Pendennis Castle to the English parliament) was chief, caballed so successfully as to procure, notwithstanding the opposition of the marquis of Argyle, a parliament to be summoned. To this assembly all the shallow arguments diffused through the tedious remonstrances of the Scotch commissioners to the parliament of England, were urged as grounds for entering into the king's quarrel; viz. That he was kept by an army of sectaries in constraint and subjection; that every thing was carried in England as these sectaries pleased; that, contrary to the tenour of the covenant between the two nations, the English parliament had refused to consult with the Scotch commissioners, about the propositions sent to the king for peace; that they had in reality deposed the king, by stripping him of all his prerogatives, and by voting no more addresses to him; that they had hindered the Scots from having access to his person, though he was as much king of Scotland as king of England; and that Scotland ought to resent this affront, as a manifest breach of their rights, and the covenant between the two kingdoms. The parliament were likewise assured by their commissioners, that no sooner would Scotch troops enter England than all the English, except the army, would join them; and thus the government, being restored to freedom, would again unite with Scotland, and the covenant be punctually observed. These arguments had such a weight with the parliament, that a committee of twenty-four members was empowered to provide for the safety of the kingdom. This committee, who were almost all of the faction, and of whom the duke of Hamilton was president, on examining the state of the kingdom, found it to be so desperate as to necessitate the raising an army of forty thousand men, and the calling over the forces who were engaged against the Irish Papists under Monroe.

The faction, notwithstanding they had carried matters thus triumphantly in parliament, found an opposition in the kingdom, which though it did not prevent, yet it so far retarded their motions, as to preserve the country from that ruin in which their destructive projects, had they succeeded, must necessarily have involved it. The unnatural conjunction of episcopalians with Presbyterians, liberty-men and cavaliers, was regarded with horror by all those who had a just value for their present security, or had any regard for civil or religious principle. Eighteen lords and forty other members of parliament entered their protest against the determinations of the committee; the commissioners of the general assembly remonstrated strongly against the intended armament, as designed for the destruction of the covenant, which it pretended to defend; and a committee of the English parliament, who had been sent down on the first rumours of what was going forward in Scotland, played their part so well in fomenting the divisions of the country, that the levy of forces went on slowly and with great difficulty.

Whilst the king's friends in Scotland were making all possible dispatch in their preparations for the invasion of England, his party in this country, impatient at the delay, raised in every part of the kingdom tumults, conspiracies, and insurrections. Langhorn, Power, and Powell, three Presbyterian officers, who commanded bodies of troops in Wales, encouraged by the promise of a considerable supply of money and ammunition from the queen, gathered together a large company of mutinous disbanded soldiers, and declared for the king. In the north, sir Marmaduke Langdale and sir Philip Musgrave seized on the towns of Berwick and Carlisle; and, to confound the hopes, and dismay the courage of the Independents, a part of the fleet, instigated by their late commander, Batten, whom the Independents had displaced, and put Rainsborough (a man of great repute with that party) in his room, set their new admiral on shore, and sailing over to Holland, submitted first to the command of the duke of York, who had escaped from St. James's, and then to the prince of Wales, who came from Paris for that purpose. In Kent, by the persuasion of Roger Lestrange (v), an idle party put themselves under the command of one Hales, who were afterwards joined by the cavaliers under the earl of Norwich, father to lord Goring. Lord Capel, sir Charles Lucas, sir George Lisle, excited commotions in Essex; and the earl of Holland, who had ever changed sides according to the probability of success, collected forces in Surrey. Encouraged by these appearances, some men of profligate manners of the lower rank, flocked together in the metropolis, and other capital towns; and when, contrary to the laws, they repaired to their sports and drunken recreations on the Lord's day, they set upon the magistrates who would have put a stop to their licentious revels, and repeatedly exclaiming, "For God and king Charles," broke into such outrageous tumults, that, in London, sir Thomas Fairfax himself was obliged to make head against them.

Whilst the army was every where engaged in a vigorous defence of themselves and country, and the lower house was well thinned of the Independent members, who were employed in their military occupations, the Presbyterians in parliament, seizing on the favourable opportunity, reassumed their old project of establishing their tyranny by a junction with the crown. The city had petitioned for the restoration of their authority over the city militia; that their imprisoned magistrates and fellow-citizens might be set at liberty; and for a personal treaty with the king. These requests of the city were no sooner made than granted. By the same influence, orders which had been given Skippon to raise levies, for the preservation of the public peace, were countermanded; the eleven impeached members were recalled; the votes of non-addresses were repealed; and the commons in a declaration protested, That they would not alter the fundamental government of the kingdom by king, lords, and commons; that they were resolved to preserve and maintain the solemn league and covenant between the two kingdoms of England and Scotland; and that they would be ready to join the Scots in the propositions agreed upon between the two kingdoms, and presented to his majesty at Hampton Court. In consequence of these resolutions, five peers and ten commoners were sent as commissioners to Newport, in the Isle of Wight, to renew the treaty with the king, who was freed from the close restraint he had been under for some months, and, with a very few exceptions, allowed to summons and advise on this important transaction with his old friends and counsellors. But the royalists could not conceal the malignancy of their intentions, and the parliament, apprehensive of their own danger, should the avowed intentions of the royalists take place, shrunk from their former forwardness; and the city kept themselves quiet, nor engaged with any of the insurgents (w), who, not having observed concert in their several insurrections, were in a short time, with little difficulty, subdued. The (v) Lestrange, in the first civil war, had been apprehended for a design to betray Lynn in Norfolk to the king, and had with difficulty escaped a sentence of death.

(w) After the royalists had plainly manifested their hopes and intentions, a petition was presented to the parliament by the citizens, wherein they expressed their dislike to the insurrections which had been raised, and desired the parliament to adhere to their vow and covenant, the constant tenour of their former declarations, and not to recede from their first and just principles, viz. The safety of themselves and those who adhered to them, the reformation and preservation of religion, and the maintenance and defence of laws and liberties. Parl. Hist. vol. xvii. p. 297.

revolted

revolted troops in Wales, having been attacked and defeated by colonel Horton, threw themselves into Pembroke Castle, where they were closely besieged and taken by Cromwell: Langdale and Musgrave, in the north, were opposed with success by Lambert: at Kingston the earl of Holland was defeated and taken prisoner by sir Michael Livesey (x): at Maidstone lord Fairfax (y) routed the Kentish men; and pursuing the broken troops, forced them and the Essex insurgents to shut themselves up in the town of Colchester; to which place, as his troops were very inferior in number to the enemy, he laid a formal siege. To humour the sailors, the earl of Warwick was replaced in his old command; a new fleet was manned; and the prince of Wales, after a fruitless attempt upon Yarmouth, and lying some time in the river Thames, braving the city of London, and taking several of their rich merchant ships, was obliged to retire to Holland. To this coast he was pursued by the earl of Warwick, whose fidelity he had in vain attempted; and the States having intimated that they should not think themselves obliged to defend his ships, were they demanded by the English parliament, he gave up his naval command to prince Rupert (z), who sailed with the fleet to Ireland.

During these numerous transactions, the duke of Hamilton, in favour of the king, entered England with an army of twenty thousand men (a): but such mistrust had the cavaliers incurred from their imprudence, that he durst not unite his forces with those under the command of sir Marmaduke Langdale (b). Lambert, who had received particular orders from Cromwell not to engage with the Scots till he came up, retiring before these invaders, joined the lieutenant-general. When the junction had taken place, the army under Cromwell did not amount to more than eight thousand men; but as this valiant commander had entertained, in an high degree, both contempt and aversion for the Scots, he hurried to the place of action as to a scene of certain victory. The cavaliers under Langdale, who lay detached from the Scotch army, were attacked by Lambert, and, making a stout resistance, were many of them cut off; the rest were pursued into the Scotch quarters. The Scots, who lay dispersed in a negligent manner, were an easy prey: without making any considerable defence, they were almost all taken prisoners, and the general, being pursued to Utoxeter, surrendered himself to colonel Waight, who had lately gained a victory over some forces which had been raised in the shires of Huntingdon and Cambridge. Cromwell, to complete his work, marched without loss of time into Scotland, where, being joined by Argyle and the Kirk faction, he procured the surrender of Berwick and Carlisle, which the Scots on their entering England had taken possession of, obliged Lanerk and Monroe to lay down their arms, and subjected the whole party to the power of their adversaries. The royalists shut up in Colchester, in hopes that they should be relieved by a victorious army of Scots, had undergone almost the utmost extremities of famine; and, on account of this obstinacy, they were required by sir Thomas Fairfax to surrender at mercy. The officers would have persuaded the common soldiers to attempt the breaking through, or to sell their lives a dear purchase: but these men, to whom Fairfax had promised pardon, not only refused to act, but threatened to open the gates to the enemy if their commanders did not surrender. The terms insisted on by Fairfax were in this necessity submitted to; and the humane general, though he had been provoked by many irritating circumstances in the conduct of the besieged, only selected the two chief commanders, sir Charles Lucas and sir George Lisle, both of them implacable malignants, as a sacrifice to military justice (c).

Though the vote to renew addresses to the king had passed the lower house on the 24th of May, yet, by the arts of the Independents, it was the 28th of July before the conditions of the treaty were settled, and the 18th of September before it commenced: a delay which had given the army time so entirely to subdue the king's partizans, that Cromwell had defeated the duke of Hamilton, and Fairfax had reduced Colchester, before conferences began. Circumstances thus critical, it was imagined, would have induced the king to suspend the exercise of argument, and to have joined the parliament on any terms. It was with a view to accelerate a business, on the dispatch of which the fate of the party and the king's life depended, that the commissioners absolutely refused to permit his train of counsellors to be present, or to enter into reasoning with any but himself. This prudent caution was without effect; every minute article of the offered conditions was canvassed, and the argument for two whole months as pertinaciously sustained by the king, as if the matter on which consequences so tremendous depended had been a warfare of wit, and mere trial of skill: here the jus divinum of episcopacy was smartly attacked by the parliamentary theologians, and, with the same arguments as are constantly used by the divines on that side the question, obstinately defended by the king; who, on the point of religion, would not gratify the parliament with the alienation of church-lands, or with a farther establishment of the present church government than its continuation for three years (d). The utter extirpation of episcopacy, and the setting up their own idol in its stead, was the superior consideration for which, it is plain, the Presbyterians had entered into the hazard of war: this was the chief cause of their quarrel with their old associates, the Independents; and the not being fully gratified on this article by the king, was, in their eyes, losing the best fruits of their success. In vain did Charles assent to the recalling his proclamations and declarations against the parliament, and to the acknowledging they had taken arms in their own defence; that they should retain, during the term of twenty years, the whole power of the militia, with a right of resuming it afterwards, when they should declare it necessary for the public safety; that all the great offices, during twenty years, should be filled by parliament; that all the acts under their great seal should be valid, and those under his own annulled; that the entire government of Ireland, and the conduct of the war there, should be in both houses; that the power of the Wards should be given up, in lieu of one hundred thousand pounds a-year; and that no peers should be hereafter created by him, without consent of lords and commons. The parliament's commissioners, with earnestness and even tears, assured the king, that all his concessions would be useless, unless he gave up the point of episcopacy: he absolutely refused farther yielding on this article, and the parliament voted his concessions unsatisfactory.

Forty days had been assigned by the parliament for the continuation of the treaty (e); in the hope of conquering the king's obstinacy, it had been at three different times prolonged, and had already lasted near two months, when the army, who were now collected together, after their victorious campaign, took an effectual measure to prevent any farther proceedings. A remonstrance, the result of a council of war which had been called at Windsor by lord Fairfax, was presented in the name of the whole army, (x) When the earl of Holland had engaged the duke of Buckingham, and his brother lord Francis Villiers. On account of the tender age of the duke of Buckingham, the parliament generously offered him an indemnification, on condition of his surrendering himself, and engaging never again to take up arms against them: the duke refused the favour, and made his escape to Holland. His brother, who had braved the soldiers, and had refused to surrender, was killed on the field of battle. Parl. Hist. vol. xvii. p. 333.

(y) Sir Thomas Fairfax had, by the death of his father, attained to the title of lord Fairfax.

(z) On the surrender of Oxford, the princes Rupert and Maurice were included by the general in the benefit of its capitulation; but were afterwards commanded by the commons to leave the kingdom. Parl. Hist. vol. xiii. p. 473.

(a) Lesley, cajoled with the title of lord Newark, had resigned his pretensions to the duke of Hamilton.

(b) The strong remonstrances of the church, and the influence of the marquis of Argyle, had obliged the Scotch parliament to pass an order, that those who had not taken, or did refuse to take the covenant, should not be received into their army, nor joined with on their entrance into England

(c) This unusual severity, says Hume, to which Fairfax was instigated by Ireton, was loudly exclaimed against by all the prisoners. Lord Capel, fearless of danger, reproached Ireton with it; and challenged him, as they were all engaged in the same honourable cause, to exercise the same impartial vengeance on all of them. Lucas was first shot, and he himself gave orders to fire, with the same alacrity as if he had commanded a platoon of his own soldiers. Lisle instantly ran and kissed the dead body, then cheerfully presented himself to a like fate. Thinking that the soldiers, destined for his execution, stood at too great a distance, he called to them to come nearer: one of them replied, "I'll warrant you, Sir, we'll hit you." He answered, smiling, "Friends, I have been nearer you when you have missed me." They fired, and he fell. Thus perished these two brave officers.

(d) The king assented, on the article of religion, to the taking away archbishops, chancellors, commissaries, and all other subordinate ecclesiastical officers; to confirm the present form of government for the term of three years, and to suspend the exercise of episcopal government, and the power of ordination in bishops, till the king and the two houses could agree concerning the point of church-government.

to the commons (f), whilst in the midst of an ardent debate on the business of peace; and was accompanied with a letter from the general, who recommended it as a matter of the highest importance, both to the army and the whole kingdom. It demanded justice on the king for the evils he had brought on a people, whom, by the laws of religion, morality, and nations, he was bound to protect. It argued, that as in the late quarrel both sides had appealed to God for judgement, that righteous judgement had given it against the king. It accused the parliament of vice and weakness in their counsels; and that their unsettled conduct, in repealing their just determinations, had filled the wicked with vain hopes, and distracted the giddy multitude, to the renewing scenes of blood, and to the raising dangers to the army and kingdom, which nothing but the invincible courage of the former could have overcome. It exposed the insidious conduct of the enemies to the public weal, the credulousness of the commons in being led into their snares, the eagerness of the lords to forward mischievous counsels, and their backwardness in closing with measures calculated for the defence of the kingdom. It argued, that breach of trust in a governor, or attempting by force to enlarge a limited power, did effectually dissolve subjects from every bond of covenant and peace; and that the crimes the king had acted against his people were the greatest treason against the highest law among men. It shewed, that the king's hardness of heart, in never acknowledging his offences, rendered him an unfit object for pity, mercy, and pardon. It asked, What fruits could be hoped for from a re-union of such contrarieties as principles or affections of liberty with principles of tyranny, principles of public interest with principles of prerogative and particular interest, principles of zeal and the power of godliness with principles of formality and superstition? It challenged the parliament to shew one instance when the re-admitting a prince, whom his people had opposed and subdued, to the regal office, state, and revenue, with the least shadow of power, ever proved safe, either to the public interest in contest, or to the persons engaged in contest. It shewed, that whilst the king and his party openly complained of his want of freedom in the transaction of a treaty, they laid grounds for rescinding, with a plausible colour of reason, every concession the parliament in that condition had extorted from him; that though, since the king had been worsted by the parliament, he had been necessitated to have recourse to peace, yet, with the credulous people, he would come in with the reputation of having long graciously sought it; that he would come in with the reputation of having granted, for peace-sake, all that the parliament (who, it would be said, were unwilling to have peace) had rigidly stood on.

The Independents, from all quarters and in all departments, encouraged by the multiplied successes of the army, had preceded this remonstrance with numerous petitions of the like nature and tendency (g); and the different bodies of the army had addressed their general officers on the same subject. As the parliament (with a view to unite all parties in defence of the present government, against the Independents) had forborne to give answer to these petitions, or to the remonstrances of the army, Hammond, who had refused obedience in the article of delivering up the king, was commanded to attend the general at the head-quarters (h); colonel Ewer was sent down, with orders to keep the king in strict custody; and, in a few days afterwards, he was conveyed to the garrison of Hurst Castle, in the neighbourhood of the island.

The Presbyterians were intoxicated with rage on the intelligence of these violent transactions; and, assuming courage from despair, set aside in parliament the remonstrance of the army, without deigning to answer it; voted the seizing of the king's person to be without the consent of parliament; sent a message to the general, to know by what authority that enterprize was executed; and issued orders that the army should not approach the capital. The army, in return, published a declaration, in which they charged the parliament with a treacherous and corrupt neglect of, and apostacy from, the public trust, reposed in them; and the general, after writing to the city, that, for the prevention of all violence, they should advance him forty thousand pounds, marched several regiments to London, and quartered them in Whitehall, the Meuse, St. James's, Durham House, Covent Garden, and Palace Yard. The parliament, though surrounded by the army, and destitute of all means of defence, attempted to close with the king; and, in contradiction to their former votes that his concessions were not satisfactory, voted that they were a foundation for the houses to proceed on in the settlement of the kingdom. Additional regiments were now arrived, and filled the suburbs of London. The general by his own authority, set forth a proclamation, requiring all delinquents who remained in the town, on pretence of finishing the business of their compositions, to depart to the distance of ten miles for a month, on pain of being proceeded against as prisoners of war; and as the citizens had not paid in the money demanded of them, he sent three regiments into the city, took out of Weavers Hall the sum of twenty thousand pounds, and assigned the reimbursement upon the arrears due to the army.

The next day after the vote passed to proceed on the concessions of the king in the settlement of the kingdom, the commons found their house blockaded by two regiments of horse, commanded by colonel Pride. Colonel Pride, directed by the lord Grey of Groby, seized in the passage forty of the most noxious members of the Presbyterian party, and sent them under confinement to the Court of Wards. The commons still proved refractory, and instead of proceeding on the business recommended to them by the army, demanded the restoration of their members. By way of answer to this demand, colonel Whaley and colonel Axtel, at the bar of the house, presented, in the name of the general and his council of officers, a paper, in which was proposed, that the impeached members and major-general Browne (who, it was believed, had had a hand in calling in the Scots) should be secured and brought to justice; and that the ninety-one members who refused to vote against the Scottish engagement, and all who voted for the recalling the four votes of Non-addresses, who voted for a treaty, and who concurred in the votes that the king's concessions were a ground for a settlement, should be immediately suspended the house. Several of the members against whom these proposals were pointed, moved, That the officers who presented them should be declared traitors, and the army itself impeached of high treason. These motions of a few desperate madmen passed unregarded by the house; and a committee was again sent to the general, to expostulate with him concerning the secluded members: but the general refused to give any answer till he had received the resolutions of the house on the proposals he had sent them. As the commons still withheld the demanded satisfaction, the same rough expedient was repeated; and, the very day after the first force was committed, the ninety-one members in question were, with equal violence, secluded the house.

Cromwell, who, on his return from Scotland, had lain siege to Pontefract Castle, in Yorkshire, to chastise in person the garrison, both for the perfidy they had acted in getting possession of the place, and for a base murder they had committed on the valiant Rainsborough (i), on intelligence of what was doing and designed by the army, (f) It was presented by colonel Ewer, attended by several officers.

(g) In these petitions it was demanded, that kings, queens, princes, dukes, earls, lords, and all persons alike, should be liable to the law of the land. The designing to subject them to equal judgement, was a great offence to the aristocratic party: it was on such grounds only that the Independents were termed Levellers; since, in the same petitions in which they make these demands, they insist on the security of property. In these petitions, the commons had been desired to declare themselves the supreme authority of the nation. Rushworth, vol. vii. p. 1257. Parl. Hist. vol. xvii. p. 451, & seq.

(h) Colonel Hammond, persisting in the resolution to observe strictly the orders of the parliament in the disposal of the king, was kept under confinement at the head-quarters, till the army had secured his person.

(i) A party of forty horse sallied out of Pontefract Castle, and passing with the guards for friends, three of them entered the town of Doncaster, where, under pretence of bringing letters from lieutenant-general Cromwell, they were directed to colonel Rainsborough's lodgings. On the same pretence, they, unmolested, went up to the apartment where he slept; and the colonel, who expected that very morning the dispatches they pretended to have brought, opened his door to them, when the assassins assaulted and killed him, and afterwards escaped without any alarm given.

Colonel Morrice, the governor of Pontefract Castle, and those who had an immediate hand in the murder of colonel Rainsborough, being excepted persons, made their escape before the garrison surrendered; but Morrice, a profligate individual, who had formerly borne arms for the parliament, who was turned out of their army on account of the licentiousness of his manners, and who had gotten possession of the castle for the king by an infamous act of treachery against a trusting friend, with one cornet Blackbourne, who had had a hand in the fore-mentioned murder, were, in the year 1649, taken at Lancaster, and afterwards arraigned for treason before baron Thorpe and judge Puleston; by whom, for the crime of levying war against the kingdom, and other foul matters proved against them, they were condemned to die.

left this task to Lambert, the major-general; and hastening to that busy scene of action, the capital, took his seat in the house, on the day immediately succeeding the second force; an incident which in derision was commonly called Pride's purge. Cromwell received the hearty thanks of the commons (k), who reversed their former vote, and again declared the king's concessions unsatisfactory, determined that no member who had been absent when this vote passed should be received till he subscribed it, and repealed every vote which had been made in favour of the king and his party, declaring it high-treason for any person to make application on his behalf to either house: they also repealed the vote for restoring the impeached members. Sir William Waller, sir John Clotworthy, Massey, Brown, Copley, and others of the Presbyterian faction, were, by orders of the general and his council of war, committed to prison; yet the Presbyterians retained spirit enough to publish, in the name of the secluded members, a narrative of the violence put upon them, with a protestation that all acts from that time transacted by the commons were legally void (l). The commons declared this publication to be false, scandalous, and seditious, tending to the destruction of the visible and fundamental government of the kingdom, and resolved that all persons who had had any hand in framing or publishing it should be incapable to bear office, or to sit as members of either house. The lords, who, before this turn of affairs, had been very forward in pressing for a personal treaty with the king, and for a conjunction with the Scots, and had been a great means to accelerate the last treaty in the isle of Wight, were now as forward to approve and confirm the opposite measures of the army. They assented to all which had been transacted in the lower house; and both houses passed an ordinance, that no person who had been delinquents, or had assisted the king against the parliament in the first or second civil war, or had been aiding in bringing in the Scotch army, or had subscribed to the treasonable engagement in 1647, or had abetted the late tumults within the cities of London and Westminster, or the adjacent counties, should be elected, or give their voice for the electing the lord mayor or other officers. To the committee charged with the care of this ordinance it was recommended, to consider of taking away the oaths of allegiance and supremacy, enforced upon the subject before they could be made free of the city.

During these transactions, the council of officers were engaged in considering a scheme of government, called "The Agreement of the People." It contained, with many additions, the substance of those demands which, in the name of the army, had been presented to the house by colonel Ewer. It was the darling plan of the soldiery: for this they had threatened to divide from their officers; and for this, when it crossed his private views, the agitators, by the influence of Cromwell, had suffered.

Petitions now daily poured in from the garrisons and other parts, for speedy and effectual justice on all delinquents. Even the county of Somerset, which had distinguished itself for its attachment to the king, presented a petition desiring that justice might be done on the chief delinquents. The county of Norfolk, yet more explicit, requested that justice should be done on the king. Pursuant to the demands of these petitions, and the repeated requests of the army, the commons appointed a committee of thirty-eight to draw up a charge against the king. On their report, a vote passed, declaring it treason in a king to levy war against his parliament; and a special commission was appointed, on the 2nd of January, 1648-9, to try the delinquent monarch on these grounds. The declarative vote and ordinance for the king's trial, were rejected by the lords without a negative voice; but, on the fond hope that by an evasive conduct they should obstruct the career of proceedings, they forbore to send down their determinations to the commons, and adjourned for ten days. The commons, jealous of their intentions, ordered their journals to be examined; when, on finding the ordinance utterly rejected, they voted, That all members of the house of commons, and others appointed by order of that house, or any ordinance wherein the lords are joined, are impowered to sit and execute in the said several committees of themselves, notwithstanding the house of peers refuse to join with them; and the names of six lords who had been appointed of the special commission were left out. Nor was this all the resentment the commons expressed at the non-compliance of the lords in this capital point, nor of the high and uncontroulable capacity in which they acted as the elected representatives of the people. By the following votes they abolished the negative voice of king and lords, and established a principle, which though plausible, has ever been obstinately denied by authority: "Resolved, That the people, under God, are the origin of all just power. Resolved, That the commons of England assembled in parliament, being chosen by and representing the people, have the supreme authority of the nation. Resolved, That whatever is enacted and declared law by the commons of England assembled in parliament hath the force of law, and all the people are included therein, although the consent and concurrence of the king and house of peers be not had thereunto."

During the preparative measures to bring the king to a trial, he, by direction of the army, was removed from Hurst Castle to Windsor: by the same authority every symbol of royalty was withdrawn, and it was commanded that he should be served by his attendants without ceremony. Even in this alarming situation, he was little apprehensive of his approaching fate; still retained the opinion of his importance; never suffered himself to believe it possible, that his enemies would venture to proceed to a public trial and execution; and in his conversation was so imprudent as to declare, before his guards, that he expected deliverance by a foreign power.

From the 2nd of January to the 19th of the same month the terms of the important trial had been adjusting. The special commission was composed of the prime officers of the army, several members of the lower house, and several citizens of London: it consisted of one hundred and thirty-three persons (m), and was nominated "the High Court of Justice." Bradshaw, a lawyer of note, was by his fellow commissioners elected president; Coke was appointed solicitor for the people; Dorislaus Steele and Ask, assistants to the court; Westminster Hall was fitted up for their sitting; and the ceremony with which the whole transaction was conducted, corresponded in pomp and dignity to the singular, the great occasion: a sovereign prince brought before the tribunal of his own subjects, and tried by their delegates for his misgovernment and breach of trust. Dendy, the serjeant at arms to the house of commons, by beat of drum and sound of trumpet, had, in the Palace Yard, at the Old Exchange, and in Cheapside, proclaimed to the people the time when the commissioners of the high court of justice commenced their sitting; and that all those who had any thing to say against the king would be heard.

On the 20th of January, the commissioners proceeded in state from the Painted Chamber to Westminster Hall. Colonel Humphry carried the sword before the president, serjeant Dendy the mace, and twenty gentlemen (commanded by colonel Fox) attended as his guard of partizans. The royal prisoner, who, for the purpose of his trial, had been removed from Windsor to St. James's, was by a strong guard of musketeers conveyed by water to Westminster Hall. A chair of crimson velvet was prepared for him within the bar, and thirty officers and gentlemen waited with halberts behind it. The solicitor of the commons, in his charge against the king, represented, "That Charles Stuart, being admitted king of England, and entrusted with a limited power, had, with the wicked design to erect an unlimited and tyrannical government, (k) The commons had returned their thanks to lord Fairfax, and had passed an ordinance for settling on him and his heirs lands to the value of four thousand pounds a year. A letter of thanks had been sent to Cromwell, whilst in Scotland, for his good services in that kingdom. Parl. Hist.

(l) Amongst the secluded members was the famous Prynne, who had signalized himself for his sufferings and acrimonious opposition to the power of prelates. He now published a virulently penned protestation, in his own name, against the proceedings of the army. Prynne had made a speech in the house, to persuade them the king's concessions were sufficient grounds for a treaty: it contains a complete narrative of all the transactions between the king, the houses, and the army, from the beginning of the parliament; it takes up above one hundred and forty octavo pages, and kept the house so long together, that the debates on the question, Whether the king's concessions were a ground, &c. lasted from Monday morning till nine o'clock on Tuesday morning. Prynne afterwards, on being questioned concerning a pamphlet he had written against the proceedings of the house, denied its authority, and was taken into custody; but not being thought of sufficient consequence to violate, on his particular, the freedom of the subject, was granted the benefit of the Habeas Corpus.

(m) Though there were one hundred nominated to the high commission, there was not above fifty odd who had courage enough to engage personally in the daring office.

traitorously and maliciously levied war against the people and their representatives: That, on the behalf of the people, he did, for this treasonable breach of trust, impeach him as a tyrant, a traitor, a murderer, and a public and implacable enemy to the commonwealth."

On the conclusion of the charge, the king demanded by what authority he was brought before that court (n)? He told the commissioners to "remember he was their king, their lawful king, and to beware of the sins with which they were going to stain themselves and the land." He was answered by the president, "that he was tried in the name and authority of the parliament assembled, and the good people of England." Charles objected, "That both king and house of lords were necessary to constitute a parliament: He had a trust, he said, committed to him by God, by old and lawful descent; and he would not betray it to answer to a new and unlawful authority: he again bade the commissioners remember he was their hereditary sovereign; and that the whole authority of the state, when free and united, was not entitled to try him, who derived his dignity from the supreme majesty of heaven: that, admitting those extravagant principles which place the origin of power in the people, the court could plead no authority delegated by the people, unless the consent of every individual, down to the meanest, the most ignorant peasant, had been previously asked and obtained (o): there was no jurisdiction on earth could try a king: the authority of obedience to kings was clearly warranted and strictly commanded both in the Old and New Testaments: this, if denied, he was ready instantly to prove; "Where the word of a king was there was power, and who might say unto him, what dost thou?" He owned, he said, he was entrusted; a sacred trust had been committed to him by God, the liberties of his people, which he would not betray by recognizing a power founded on violence and usurpation: he had taken arms, and frequently exposed his life, in defence of public liberty, in defence of the constitution, in defence of the fundamental laws of the kingdom, and was now willing to seal with his blood those precious rights for which he had so long in vain contended." To the king's assertion, that he had taken up arms to defend the liberty of the constitution, and that he now pleaded for the rights and freedom of all his subjects, the president returned, "How great a friend, Sir, you have been to the laws and liberties of the people, let all England and the world judge: your actions have sufficiently declared it, and your meaning has been written in bloody characters throughout the kingdom." The court was reminded by the prisoner, "that the laws of England determined the king could do no wrong; however, he was able, he said, by the most satisfactory reasons, to justify his conduct; but must forego the apology of his innocence, lest, by ratifying an authority no better founded than that of robbers and pirates, he should be justly branded as the betrayer, instead of applauded as the martyr, of the constitution."

Three several days the king was produced before the court, and as often urged to answer to his charge. The fourth, on his constantly persisting to decline its jurisdiction, the commissioners, after having examined witnesses (p), by whom it was proved that the king had appeared in arms against his people, proceeded to pronounce sentence against him. Before the passing sentence, Charles earnestly desired to be admitted to a conference with the two houses: he had something to propose, he said, which he was sure would be for the welfare of the kingdom and the liberty of the subject. It was supposed that he intended to offer to resign the crown to his son; and some of the commissioners pressed that he might be heard. This was not the opinion of the majority; and the commissioners returning from the court of Wards, where they had adjourned to consult on the king's proposal, acquainted the prisoner, that his request was considered as a delay of justice. The president passed sentence of death, by severing the head from the body, on the 27th of January, and all the members of the court stood up in token of approbation (q).

In every sovereign prince of Europe was now awakened a sense of horror and indignation; whilst political reasons, of a different nature, inclined them to endeavour to prevent the change of government in England. The French court authorized their ambassador to interpose for favour to the king; and the Dutch employed very earnest intercessions for the preservation of his life. All solicitations, however, were in vain. The Scots likewise exclaimed and protested against the violence, but without producing any good effect; the prince wrote an ineffectual letter to the army, and the queen to the parliament. Three days only were allowed the king between his sentence and his execution (r). This interval he passed in reading and devotion; and preserved, from the time when his intended fate was known to him, to his last moment, a perfect tranquillity and composure; nor can his bitterest enemies deny that in his conduct, under the dreadful apprehension of a violent death were united the magnanimity of heroism and the patience of martyrdom.

All his family that remained in England were allowed access to him. It consisted only of the princess Elizabeth and the duke of Gloucester; for the duke of York had made his escape. Gloucester was little more than an infant: the princess, notwithstanding her tender years, shewed an advanced judgement; and the calamities of her family had made a deep impression upon her. After many pious consolations and advices, the king gave her in charge to tell the queen, that, during the whole course of his life, he had never once, even in thought, failed in his fidelity towards her; and that his conjugal tenderness and his life should have an equal duration. To the young (n) Ludlow says, That the king interrupted the clerk whilst he was reading, and exclaimed, "I am not entrusted by my people; they are mine inheritance." Ludlow, p. 107.

(o) This argument is mere sophistry; since the sense of the people, in their collective capacity, never can come to any determined conclusive point, unless the sense of the majority is binding to the whole.

(p) One of these witnesses gave an evidence of the king's want of sincerity in his last treaty with the parliament, at Newport, in the Isle of Wight. The witness, Henry Goode, deposed, That having access to and discourse with the king at Newport, he told him, that, since his majesty had justified the parliament's taking up arms, he did not question but the Presbyterian party would stick close to him; that to this the king had replied, he would have all his old friends know, that, though for the present he was contented to give the parliament leave to call their own war what they pleased, yet he neither did then, nor should decline the justice of his own cause. Moreover, upon the deponent's saying his majesty's business was much retarded through want of commissions, the king made answer, That being upon a treaty, he would not dishonour himself; but if the deponent would go over to the prince his son, who had full authority from him, he or any for him should receive whatever commissions they should desire. Rushworth, vol. vii. p. 1413.

(r) Clement Walker, a petulant writer of the Presbyterian party, in his History of Independency, has propagated the following calumny on the parliament and army: That they lodged the king in an apartment at Whitehall, so near the destined place of execution, that his retirement and even rest were disturbed with the noise of the workmen employed in framing the scaffold; whereas, in fact, the king remained at St. James's till the very morning of his execution, January 30, 1649, when he walked across the Park, and from thence was carried in a coach to Whitehall.

duke too, he could not forbear giving some advice, in order to season his mind with early principles of loyalty and obedience towards his brother, who was so soon to be his sovereign. Holding him on his knee, he said, "Now they will cut off thy father's head." At these words the child looked very stedfastly upon him. "Mark, child! what I say: They will cut off my head! and perhaps make thee a king: but mark what I say, thou must not be a king, as long as thy brothers Charles and James are alive. They will cut off thy brothers' heads, when they can catch them! And thy head too they will cut off at last! Therefore, I charge thee, do not be made a king by them!" The duke, sighing, replied, "I will be torn in pieces first!" So determined an answer, from one of such tender years, filled the king's eyes with tears of joy and admiration.

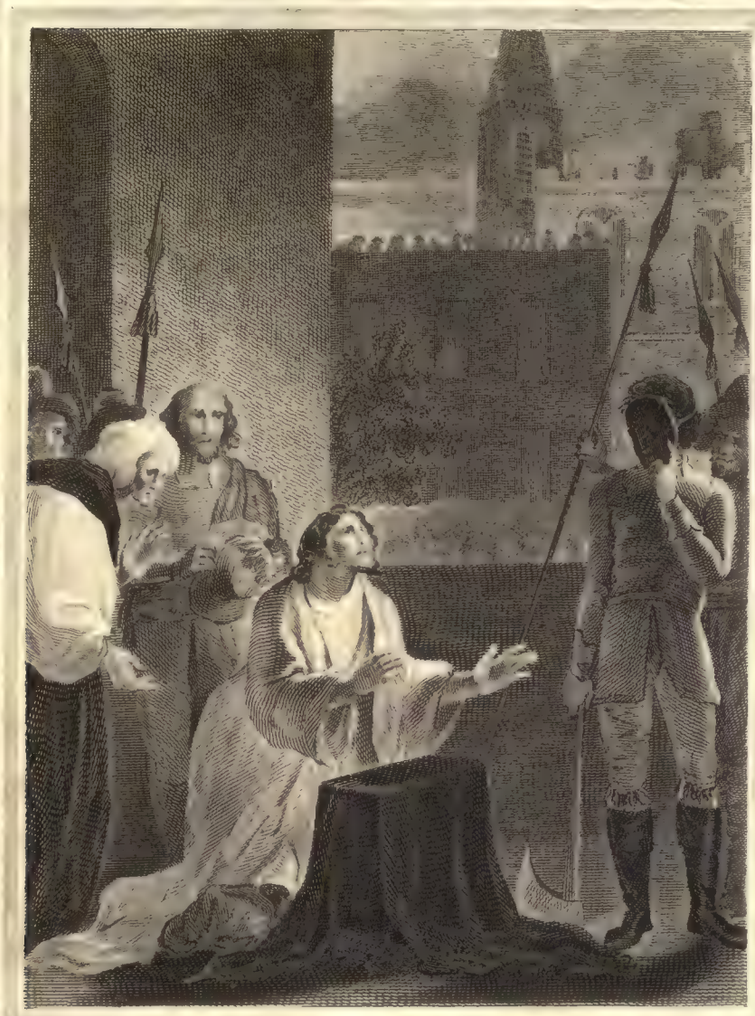
The scaffold for the king's execution was erected before the palace at Whitehall; care was taken that it should be sufficiently surrounded with soldiers, to prevent disorder or interruption; and the king, finding himself shut out from the hearing of the people, addressed a speech to colonel Tomlinson, the commander of the guard, in which he attempted to justify his innocence in the war he had levied, termed it defensive, accused the parliament of having first enlisted forces, and averred that he had no other object in his military operations than to preserve entire that authority which had been transmitted to him by his ancestors; insisted on a perfect innocence towards his people; observed, that the unjust sentence now inflicted on him was an equitable return for that which he had suffered to be inflicted on Strafford; forgave his enemies; and exhorted the people to return to the paths of obedience, and submit to the government of their lawful sovereign, his son and successor. Bishop Juxon, whose attendance the king had very particularly and earnestly desired, remembered his master, that the people would expect him to make some declaration on the point of religion: on this the king very earnestly protested, that he had ever lived, and now died in the religion of the church of England. Whilst he was preparing for execution, the bishop assisted him in his devotions; and said to him, "There is, Sir, but one stage more, which, though turbulent and troublesome, is yet a very short one. Consider, it will soon carry you a great way; it will carry you from earth to heaven; and there you shall find, to your great joy, the prize to which you hasten, a crown of glory."—"I go," replied the king, "from a corruptible to an incorruptible crown, where no disturbance can have place." Then laying his head upon the block, the executioner (whose face was concealed in a vizor) severed it with one stroke from the body (s): an assistant (in the like disguise) held it up to the spectators, streaming with blood, and, after the usual manner observed in similar executions, cried aloud, "This is the head of a traitor."

Thus

(s) It has long been a matter of uncertainy who was the person that actually struck off Charles's head on the scaffold, but the following note will perhaps set this matter in a clear light, seeing there could be no inducement to cause the person who made the declaration to make it known, if he had not been actually the executioner:

"George II. on his return to London, after the battle of Dettingen, could with difficulty bear the sight of lord Stair. He could not forgive his lordship's reproaching him for the danger which threatened the English army, in case the king had obstinately persisted in leaving it in the camp which it occupied, and where it would have been compleatly defeated, if the duke de Grammont by his rashness had not saved it. Lord Stair, as proud as he was skilful in war, having soon perceived the king's dislike, and being little disposed to bear the shame of a formal disgrace, was on the point of returning to his estate in Scotland, when he received the following letter:

"My Lord,



"Your bravery is well known: but will you have the courage to go, to-morrow night, to the entrance of Somerset House, where you will meet one who (if you dare follow him) will conduct you to a part of the town not much frequented, but where you will find one who is impatient to see you and to discover secrets which are of more importance than you imagine, and which cannot be disclosed in a letter. If you are afraid this should be a plot on your purse, bring nothing valuable about you."

We may conceive his lordship's surprise at the reading of this note. At first he took it for a trick of some secret enemy; or some affair of gallantry, the heroine of which had probably her reasons for so acting; however, he determined to go. He therefore, after providing himself with a brace of good pistols, went to Somerset House, and found there a man, who, without speaking, made a sign to follow him; after walking for about an hour, they came into a street almost empty, where the conductor knocked at the door of a small old house: when it was opened, he said, "Walk in, my lord," and the door was shut against them. The intrepid nobleman, holding a sword in one hand and pistol in the other, went up the staircase and entered a room, the furniture of which seemed very ancient. "Come in, my lord," said a faint voice issuing from a bed, "come in, you have nothing to fear: pray sit down in a chair near my bed, and we will converse together."—"Very well," said lord Stair; "but make haste and tell me the reason of this odd adventure."

"You are hasty, my lord, but have patience: lay down your arms, take that seat, and come and look at me." His lordship, surprised at such authoritative commands, to which he was little accustomed, got up, took the lamp, went to the bed, and remained stupified at the sight of an old man, pale and thin, with a long white beard, and whose eyes were instantly fixed upon him.—"Look at me, my lord," said he, "I am still alive, I owe to you the only true pleasure I have tasted these many, many years. Age and misfortunes have entirely effaced the marks of one who is nearly related to you, and who is delighted to find in you features which are most dear to him!" His lordship, still astonished, looked at the old man, and unable to account for the different emotions which agitated him, spoke not a word. "Stoop," said the old man, "and you will find under my bed, a box which contains papers capable of amply repairing the losses which your family has suffered by the civil wars." His lordship having placed the box upon the bed, sat down again upon the chair. "Here, my lord," said the old man, "here are copies of the sales of three of the principal seats belonging to your ancestors, which your great grandfather sold, or rather pretended to sell, during the troubles. Here are also the letters of the pretended buyers, by which you may immediately recover the estates on your arrival in Scotland: precautions have been taken to prevent any disputes." What was his lordship's astonishment when he saw these three contracts of estates, which he knew formerly belonged to his house? "Ah!" cried he with transport, "Ah! who are you, respectable and benevolent old man, to whom I owe more than to my own father? Speak, I beg of you! favour me with the name of so generous a benefactor, in whom I am so singularly interested, and whose days Heaven seems to have prolonged, that he may find in me the most tender and respectable of friends, and the most grateful of men?"—"Leave me, my dear lord," said the old man in haste, "I am too weak to bear a longer conversation; leave me, I beg; take that box, and bid adieu to an old man, who thinks himself less unfortunate since he has had the happiness of holding you in his arms."—"Ah! whoever you are," said lord Stair, "and whatever reasons you may have to conceal the name of so generous a man, can you have the cruelty to oblige him to obey you? To abandon you in such a situation, without help, without ——" "Stop, my dear lord, it is with pleasure I see in you such generous sentiments; but I know that your friend (since you think him worthy of that title), however unfortunate he may be in other respects, is still free from want; therefore, if you wish to oblige me, leave me, my lord, instantly; nay, do more, and believe me I have a right to demand it: swear to me that you will never come here again, nor ever search after me, unless I send for you." His lordship seeing by his tone of voice that he would not be refused, promised to obey him; once more embraced him, and then left him with tears in his eyes. On his return home he immediately opened the box, and found a great number of papers which he judged would be of great use to him. Next morning, as he was preparing (notwithstanding his promise) to return to the old man, he was suddenly stopped by the following letter, sealed with his own arms, and to his extreme surprise, signed "George Stair:"

"Do not return to me, my dear lord, for you will not find me. If it had been only to tell you who I am, that is, your great grand-father, who has so long been supposed dead, and who justly deserved to be so, I should not have opposed your just desire of knowing your benefactor; but the consequences which I foresaw of so interesting a scene, too much so for my weak age to bear, made me dread to satisfy your curiosity, upon circumstances, which, far from offering to you so dear and respectable a relation as you imagined, would only have shewn to you a wretch—a monster less worthy of pity than horror!

"My father died a few months after my birth; my mother soon followed him; I was left to the care of an aunt, sister to my father, who brought me up so tenderly that (though she was the cause of my crime,) I still retain the most grateful remembrance of her in my heart. I was scarcely seventeen, when, struck with indignation, at seeing my countrymen armed against their lawful sovereign, I formed the design of tendering to king Charles I. the offer of my fortune and sword: but what was my astonishment, when, at disclosing my intention to my good aunt, I saw her tremblingly lift her hands to heaven and look at me with a kind of horror! Surprised and afflicted at the state she was in, and turning with impatience to know the reason, 'You force me then to tell you,' cried she, bursting into tears: 'know, then, the prince you are so desirous of serving, is the author of my shame and of your father's death. I was about fifteen, and among the attendants who waited on his mother, when the wretch, imposing on my age and credulity, by the most sacred oaths, contrived to seduce me—in short, I was ruined. The perfidious prince soon after went to Spain, in hopes of marrying the infanta. I should have been entirely lost, if your father had not come to London; to him I was obliged to own my misfortune, and the consequences which I dreaded. That dear brother, afflicted even to tears, ran immediately to the queen, obtained permission to take me away, and sent me to one of his seats near Edinburgh, where I remained till I was perfectly recovered. 'Alas!' added she, 'I was doomed to see him no more! The grief which he conceived for my undoing, soon killed him; and his worthy wife, who, after bringing you into the world, survived only a month. Such, my dear nephew, were the secrets and deplorable motives which reduced me to that obscurity in which I have since lived, and of which you are alone acquainted. Judge now, my friend, if after the care I have taken of your infancy, and the education I have procured you, say, can you devote your fortune and arms to the author of so many calamities, to a barbarian who has carried death into the breasts of your parents, and into mine eternal remorse!'—'No!' cried I, 'by God! no! the wretch is unworthy of life, and he shall die by my hand!' To tell you, my lord, by what means, as refined as dangerous, my fury against the king continually increasing, was at last able to fulfil my revenge and execrable oath; to tell you all the events, and excess of remorse which soon followed my crime, would be now too grievous in my weak state to relate.

Thus, by a fate unparalleled in the annals of princes (t), terminated the unfortunate life and turbulent reign of Charles Stuart; a monarch whose principles, conduct, fortune, and death, by powerfully engaging the opposite affections attending the different views and different interests of men, have given rise to bitter and irreconcileable contest. Regarded as the martyr to church (u) and state, the patron of the clergy, the support of the nobility, we behold him, in the representations of a considerable party, adorned with every flower of panegyric: by the bigots of a different persuasion, his memory, notwithstanding the tribute he paid to his crimes, is held in the highest detestation. The partizans of liberty applaud his fate; the liberal and humane condemn and pity him: to a mind softened by habits of amusement, and intoxicated with ideas of self-importance, the transition from royal pomp to a prison, from easy, gay, and luxurious life to a premature and violent death by the hands of an executioner, are punishments so sharp and touching, that, in the suffering prince, we are apt to overlook the designing tyrant, to dwell on his hardships, and forget his crimes. Compassion is the constant attendant of liberal minds; and the commiseration of Charles's singular and unfortunate fate, but for the interests of truth and the violence of his partizans, would have inclined all such to have thrown the mantle of oblivion over the dark parts of his character, and only have remembered that he bore his sufferings in a manner which would have done honour to the best of causes. From such indulgence the ill-fated Charles is necessarily excluded: history is called upon to scrutinize with exactness his principles, his conduct, and his character; since, from the false colourings which by designing men have been thrown on these, and the rancour with which his opponents have been falsely aspersed, have been deduced consequences destructive to the security and welfare of man, and highly injurious to the reputation of patriot citizens.

In the character of Charles the First, as represented by his panegyrists, we find the qualities of temperance, chastity, regularity, piety, equity, humanity, dignity, condescension, and equanimity; some have gone so far as to allow him integrity; and many writers, who condemn his political principles, give him the title of a moral man. In the comparison of this representation with Charles's conduct, accurately and justly described, from which alone we are able to discover his true character, it is discernible that vices of the worst tendency, (when shaded by a formal and plausible carriage, when concordant to the interests of a faction and the prejudices of the vulgar,) assume the appearance of, and are imposed on the credulous world as, virtues of the first rank.—Passion for power was Charles's predominant vice; idolatry to his regal prerogatives his governing principle (v): the interests of his crown legitimated every measure, and sanctified in his eye the widest deviation from moral rectitude. His religion was to this a secondary and subordinate affection: the prelates of the church of England paid him an impious flattery; they inculcated a slavish dependence on the regal authority; the corruptions in their ecclesiastical discipline fostered superstition; superstition secured their influence over the people; and on these grounds, and to these ends, they kept an interest in the king's heart, which continued to the last period of his life (w). If Charles had a higher estimation of the faith in which he had been educated than of popery, it was because the principles of popery acknowledged a superior allegiance to their spiritual than their temporal prince; but regarding that superstition to be more favourable to the interests of monarchy, he preferred it to the religion of any differing sect, and publicly avowed his wish, that there never had been a schism in the church. Neither gratitude (x), clemency, humanity (y), equity, nor generosity (z), have place in the fair part of Charles's character. Of the virtues of temperance, fortitude, and personal bravery, he was undeniably possessed. His manners partook of the dissipation, and his conversation of the indecency of a court (a). His chastity has been called in question by an author of the highest repute (b); and were it relate. Be satisfied with knowing, that you may abhor me as much as I detest myself; that the executioner of king Charles I. who appeared under a mask, was in fact no other than your unworthy, too guilty, great grandfather, sir George Stair."

From 1649 (when Charles I. was beheaded) to 1743 (when the battle of Dettingen was fought) there is an interval of ninety-four years. On supposition that sir George Stair was twenty years old when he committed this crime, his age in 1743 must have been one hundred and fourteen years.

Whatever were the emotions of lord Stair on reading the letter, his first care was to look for the street and the house where he had seen his great-grandfather; but finding the house empty, he learned from the neighbours that it had only been occupied since eight days; that it was never known by whom; that since the preceding night the servants had abandoned it, furnished as it was; that they could not tell of whom the tenant held the house, the proprietor being long since settled in America. See an ingenious work entitled, "Pieces Interressantes et peu Connues."

(t) In a neighbouring country, events have lately occurred which bear some resemblance to our present subject. Louis XVI. of France, like the unfortunate Charles, was imprisoned, tried, condemned, and beheaded, by the misguided zeal of his subjects, in January, 1791. As we shall have occasion to take notice of this event in a future page of our history, we shall not anticipate our observations on that important business, which has proved the means of revolutionizing Europe.

(u) The opinion of Charles's dying a martyr to the church is grounded on his refusing to give satisfaction, on this article, in his last treaty with the parliament; but, if there is any credence to be given to Lilly, the king would have signed the propositions in the form sent down to him, had he not been diverted from it by the lord Say, on the hopes that the parliament would conclude with him upon easier terms. Lilly, p. 72, & seq.

(v) The History of Coins affords an anecdote which shews Charles's affection towards prerogative and popular rights: in the years 1601, 2, 3, 4, and 5, there were several coins stricken in Scotland by James the First, bearing on their reverse the motto, "Salus populi suprema lex esto:" a noble sentence borrowed from that famous republican of antiquity Marcus Tullius Cicero. In the first year of Charles's government, he altered on his coins the just sentiment of this motto, to "Salus reipublicæ suprema lex esto."

(w) In the British Museum, No. 122, there is a MS. letter from the king to the queen, dated from Newcastle, 1646, wherein he tells her, "That whoever gave her the advice that he should submit to take the damned covenant, was a fool or knave; that it was the child of rebellion, and breathed nothing but treason; that if episcopacy was to be introduced by the covenant he would not take it, for he was as much bound in conscience to do no act for the destruction of monarchy as to resist heresy." In a letter of the 17th of October, from the same place, the king, in answer to the queen's pressing importunity (by Davenant) for his agreeing to the establishment of Presbyterian government, says, "That such an establishment would make him but a titular king; that a flower of the crown, given away by an act of parliament, is not recoverable; that if the supremacy in church affairs was not a flower of the crown, he knew not what was; that the difference between episcopal and Presbyterian government was one of the least of his disputes with the parliament, who, under the pretence of a thorough reformation, did intend to take away all the ecclesiastical power of government from the crown; that they would introduce a doctrine which taught rebellion to be lawful, That the supreme power is in the people, to whom kings were accountable." In a letter of the 20th of November, the king tells the queen, "That unless religion was preserved, the militia (being not, as in France and other kingdoms, a formed powerful strength,) would be of little use to the crown; that if the pulpits had not obedience, which would never be if Presbyterian government was absolutely established, the king would have but small comfort of the militia; that for his three years concession of Presbyterian government, he never heard that any right was yielded so long as the claim was kept up, which was clearly done by the article of a debate by divines how the church should be governed, the determination being still free to him and the two houses, on which if his conscience was wronged, he could blame nothing but his own want of courage." In the end of this letter the king says, "He is confident that he shall in a short time be recalled with much honour, and that his friends will see he had neither a foolish nor a peevish conscience." British Museum, MS. 6988.

(x) The favours which Charles's fortunes occasioned him to receive from his subjects, he regarded only as obligations of duty to their prince; and any failure, either through motives of conscience or regard to personal safety or interest, in the lengths he exacted of them, cancelled the merits of former services. Of all the nobility and gentry slain in his service, the only individuals whose premature death, it is observed, he gave any public testimony of regretting, were sir Charles Lucas and sir George Lisle, when his mind was softened by long adversity. Whitlocke informs us, that when he was told they had been shot, he dissolved into a flood of tears.

(y) Notwithstanding Clarendon's extravagant encomium on the king for these virtues, the severe punishments he inflicted on several individuals, by the court of Star-Chamber, shew an extreme rigour in regard to offenders who opposed his government and opinions.—Ludlow and other writers aver, That the prisoners of war, in places immediately under his command, were treated with inhuman cruelty; and there are some traits in history which shew an indifference, or rather hardness of heart, to the sufferings of others. One, which is to be met with in the Strafford Papers, mentions the king's laughing at the relation of an officer's having lost part of his cheek in an engagement: this anecdote happened in the beginning of his reign. The same Papers make mention of a great unfeelingness, or rather harshness, in the king's behaviour to his servant Cottington, on the melancholy occasion of his wife's death. Lilly, the astrologer, who knew the king well, and who was sometimes consulted on his future fortunes, says, That in the times of war he was seldom seen to be sorrowful for the slaughter of his people or his soldiers. Lilly's Observations on the Life and Death of King Charles, ed. 1715, p. 13.

(z) The innovation of laws committed to his trust, with several mean as well as unjust acts, testify this. In particular, in the commencement of his reign, he dispensed by proclamation with the legal obligation his subjects lay under to buy the honour of knighthood; and then levied fines upon them for non-performance.

(a) Before the commencement of the civil wars, plays, and every kind of dissipation which the times afforded, reigned in the king's court. Milton, in his masterly Defence, &c. against Salmasius, taxes the king with amorous indecencies committed in public; and, notwithstanding the contrary has been so strongly asserted by Clarendon, there are two passages in the Sydney Papers which demonstrate that the conversation of the court, and even of Charles himself, was not only indelicate but lewd.

(b) Milton, in his Defence, &c. gives shrewd intimations that the king

it allowed, it was tainted by an excess of uxoriousness, which gave it the properties and the consequences of vice. The want of integrity is manifest in every part of his conduct; which, (whether it were the corruption of his judgement or heart,) lost him fair opportunities of reinstatement in the throne, and was the vice for which, above all others, he paid the tribute of his life. His intellectual powers were naturally good, and so improved by a continued exercise, that, though in the beginning of his reign he spoke with difficulty and hesitation, towards the close of his life he discovered in his writings purity of language and dignity of style, in his debates elocution and quickness of conception. The high opinion he entertained of regal dignity occasioned him to observe a stateliness and imperiousness of manner, which, to the rational and intelligent, was unamiable and offensive; by the weak and the formal, it was mistaken for dignity (c). In the exercise of horsemanship he excelled; had a good taste, and even skill in several of the polite arts; but, though a proficient in some branches of literature, was no encourager of useful learning, and only patronized adepts in the jargon of the divine right and utility of kings and bishops. His understanding in this point was so depraved by the prejudices of his education, the flattery of priests, and the affections of his heart, that he would never endure conversation which tended to inculcate the principles of equal rights in men; and notwithstanding that the particularity of his situation enforced his attention to doctrines of this kind, he went out of the world with the same fond preju dices with which he had been fostered in his nursery, and cajoled in the zenith of his power (d).

Charles was of a middle stature; his body strong, healthy, and justly proportioned; his face was regular, handsome, and well complexioned; and his aspect melancholy, yet not unpleasing. His surviving issue were three sons and three daughters (e). He was executed in the forty-ninth year of his age, and buried, by the appointment of the parliament, at Windsor, decently, yet without pomp. The duke of Richmond, the marquis of Hertford, the earls of Southampton and Lindsay, at their express desire, were permitted to pay the last duty to their master, but were denied (by colonel Whichcot, the governor of Windsor Castle) the use of the burial service, according to the book of Common Prayer (f).

Of the voluminous works published in Charles's name, his letters and messages to the parliament, during his strict confinement in the Isle of Wight, are known to be his, with several letters written to the queen and others. It may be expected that we should here mention the "Eikon Basilike," a work published in the king's name a few days after his execution. It seems almost impossible, in the controverted parts of history, to say any thing which will satisfy the zealots of both parties: but with regard to the genuineness of that production, it is not easy for an historian to fix any opinion, which will be entirely to his own satisfaction. The proofs brought to evince that this work is or is not the king's, are so convincing, that, if an impartial reader peruse any one side apart (g), he will think it impossible, that arguments could be produced, sufficient to counterbalance so strong an evidence; and when he compares both sides, he will be some time at a loss to fix any determination. Should an absolute suspense of judgement be found difficult or disagreeable in so interesting a question, we confess, that we rather incline to give the preference to the arguments of Toland. The testimonies, which prove that performance to be the king's, though more numerous, are not so certain and direct, as those on the other side. This is the case, even if we consider the external evidence: but when we weigh the internal, derived from the style and composition, there appears great similarity to the king's method. These meditations resemble in elegance, purity, neatness, and simplicity, the genius of those performances which we know with certainty to have flowed from the royal pen; but they are somewhat unlike the bombast, perplexed, rhetorical, and corrupt style of Dr. Gauden, in his other works, to whom they are ascribed, that no human testimony would seem sufficient to convince some persons that he was the author. Yet all the evidences, which would rob the king of that honour, tend to prove that Dr. Gauden had the merit of writing so fine a performance, and had imposed it on the world for the king's. It is not easy to conceive the general compassion excited towards the king, by the publishing, at so critical a juncture, a work so full of piety, meekness, and humanity. Many have not scrupled to ascribe to that book the subsequent restoration of the royal family. Milton compares its effects to those which were wrought on the tumultuous Romans by Anthony's reading to them the will of Cæsar. The Eikon passed through fifty editions in a twelvemonth; and independent of the great interest taken in it by the nation, as the supposed production of their sovereign, it must be acknowledged the best prose composition, which, at the time of its publication, was to be found in the English language.

In order to close this part of the British history, it is also necessary to relate the dissolution of monarchy in England: that event soon followed upon the death of the monarch. When the peers met, on the day appointed in their adjournment, the 6th of February, 1649, they entered upon business, and sent down some votes to the commons, of which the latter deigned not to take the least notice. In a few days, the lower house passed a vote, that they would make no more addresses to the house of peers, nor receive any from them; and that that house was useless and dangerous, and was therefore to be abolished. A like vote passed with regard to the monarchy; and it is remarkable, that Martin, a zealous republican, in the debate on this question, confessed that, if they desired a king, the last was as proper as any gentleman in England. The commons ordered a new great seal to be engraved, on was defective in the point of chastity. Lilly says of him, That he honoured the virtuous, and was very shy and choice in wandering in irregular paths; that when he did, it was with much cautiousness and secrecy; that he never prostituted his affections but to those of exquisite persons or parts. The same author asserts that Charles had one or two natural children. Lilly, p. 11. And the circumstance mentioned above, in the note, p. 184, which points out that sir George Stair was the person who actually beheaded the king, is fully convincive.

(c) In the king's palaces different rooms were allotted to the different ranks of the nobility and gentry; and orders were hung up in every apartment, forbidding all persons below a certain quality to enter. The observance of these ridiculous distinctions was exacted with such rigour, that sir Henry Vane the younger, having intruded himself into an apartment allotted to a superior rank, was so suddenly, whilst in discourse, surprized with the king's appearance, that, not having opportunity to retire unperceived, he hid himself behind a large carpet, which hung before a sideboard cupboard: in this situation he was discovered by the king, who, with an unmanly insolence, struck him with his cane. Even in Charles's days of humiliation, he struck colonel Whaley for the omission of some ceremony, or fancied disrespect; and when sir Thomas Fairfax (who proved one of the principal actors in his overthrow) presented him on his knees a petition, the king, who knew the contents would be disagreeable to him, turned haughtily away, with a motion so sudden that the petitioner was hurt by his horse's feet, and had liked to have been trampled to death. With manners so insolent and provoking, the king's general carriage was stiff and formal, to a degree which carried the appearance of high contempt, to his inferiors. Clarendon spends many pages in panegyrising the king on the article of his stateliness; sets forth the glories of Solomon's court as an example for all princes to follow; and observes, "That its pompous ceremonies struck the queen of Sheba with the high idea she is said to have conceived of Solomon's wisdom:" This, though a very natural sentiment in a female princess, is a little out of character in the mouth of a moralist, a philosopher, and an historian. Carte's Life of Ormond, vol. i. p. 356, & seq. Clarendon's History.

(d) In apology for Charles's government, it has been often advanced, that the same tyrannical principles prevailed equally in those of all his predecessors, and in particular in the government of that favourite sovereign queen Elizabeth; that Charles only endeavoured to preserve the rights he found in the crown; and that the usurpation began on the side of the commons. In contradiction to this assertion, it is to be observed, that Charles, by offering to bring things back to the course preserved in church and state during Elizabeth's government, acknowledged he had innovated both. Were it granted, that the commons made the first attack on the established encroachments of the crown, was that supposed right to be defended by any mean? Charles's situation, and consequently his political conduct, differed widely from that of Elizabeth and the rest of his fortunate predecessors: in the peaceful possession of their tyranny, they ruled a willing people, and preserved the forms of the constitution. The opposition with which Charles encountered engaged him in breach of faith, in civil war, and other criminal transactions; whilst his inflexible tenacity, with the steady opposition of the commons, must, had he prevailed, have destroyed every principle of liberty in the constitution.

(f) In consequence of which he was buried, on the 9th of February, 1649, in a vault about the middle of the choir of St. George's Chapel, over against the eleventh stall on the sovereign's side, near Henry VIII. and Jane Seymour, with this inscription in capital letters, on a fillet of lead, "King Charles, 1648." The whole funeral charges came but to two hundred and twenty-nine pounds five shillings.

(g) See on the one hand, Toland's "Amyntor," and on the other, Wagstaffe's "Vindication of the royal Martyr," with Young's addition. We may remark, that lord Clarendon's total silence with regard to this subject, in so full a history, composed in vindication of the king's measures and character, forms a presumption on Toland's side, and a presumption of which that author was ignorant; the works of the noble historian not being then published. Bishop Burnet's testimony from the duke of York himself too must be allowed of great weight against the Eikon.

which

which that assembly was represented, with this legend, "ON THE FIRST YEAR OF FREEDOM, BY GOD'S BLESSING, RESTORED, 1648." The forms of all public business were changed, from the king's name, to that of the keepers of the liberties of England. And it was declared high treason to proclaim, or any otherwise acknowledge Charles Stuart, commonly called prince of Wales.

The king's statue, in the Exchange, was thrown down; and on the pedestal these words were inscribed: "EXIT TYRANNUS, REGUM ULTIMUS;" that is, "The tyrant is gone, the last of the kings."

Duke Hamilton was tried by a new high court of justice, as earl of Cambridge in England; and condemned for treason. This sentence, which was certainly hard, but which ought to save his memory from all imputations of treachery to his master, was executed on a scaffold, erected before Westminster Hall. Lord Capel underwent the same fate. Both these noblemen had escaped from prison, but were afterwards discovered and taken. To all the solicitations of their friends for pardon, the generals and parliamentary leaders replied, that it was certainly the intention of Providence they should suffer; since it had permitted them to fall into the hands of their enemies, after they had once recovered their liberty.

The earl of Holland lost his life by a like sentence. Though of a polite and courtly behaviour, he died lamented by no party. His ingratitude to the king, and his frequent changing of sides, were regarded as great stains on his memory. The earl of Norwich and sir John Owen, being condemned by the same court, were pardoned by the commons.

CHAP. IV.

THE REPUBLIC.

THE troubles and confusions which overspread England after the execution of Charles I. proceeded as well from the spirit of refinement and innovation, which agitated the ruling party, as from the dissolution of all that authority, both civil and ecclesiastical, by which the nation had been accustomed to be governed. Every man had framed the model of a republic; and, however new it was, he was eager in recommending it to his fellow-citizens. Every man had adjusted a system of religion, which was peculiar to himself; and being founded on supposed inspiration, had no means by which it could recommend itself to others. The levellers insisted on the abolition of rank, and asserted, that God, being the Author of the human race, never intended that one man should be a noble and another his slave; they therefore required an equality of rank with their fellow citizens. The millenarians or fifth-monarchy-men required, that government itself should be abolished, and all human powers be laid in the dust, in order to pave the way for the dominion of Christ, whose second coming they suddenly expected. The Antinomians insisted, that the obligations of morality and natural law were suspended, and that the elect, guided by an internal principle more perfect and divine, were superior to the beggarly elements of justice and humanity. A considerable party declaimed against tithes and a hireling priesthood, and were resolved that the magistrate should not support by power or revenue any ecclesiastical establishment. Another party inveighed against the law and its professors; and on pretence of rendering more simple the distribution of justice, were desirous of abolishing the whole system of English jurisprudence, which seemed interwoven with monarchical government. Even those among the republicans who adopted not such extravagancies, were so elated, that they supposed themselves possessed of peculiar privileges, on account of the religion they professed; and all professions, oaths, laws, and engagements, had, in a great measure, lost their influence over them. The bands of society were every where loosened; and the irregular passions of men were encouraged by speculative principles, still more unsocial and irregular.

The royalists, consisting of the nobles and more considerable gentry, being degraded from their authority, were inflamed with the highest resentment and indignation against those adversaries, who had reduced them to subjection. The Presbyterians, whose credit had first supported the arms of the parliament, were enraged to find that the fruits of their labours were ravished from them. The former party, from inclination and principle, zealously attached themselves to the son of their unfortunate monarch, whose memory they respected, and whose tragical death they deplored. The latter cast their eye towards the same object; but they had still many prejudices to overcome, many fears and jealousies to be allayed, ere they could cordially entertain thoughts of restoring the family, which they had so grievously offended, and whose principles they regarded with such violent abhorrence.

The support of the republican independent faction, which had got possession of the government, was a numerous army of near fifty thousand men. But this army, formidable from its discipline and courage, as well as its numbers, was actuated by a spirit that rendered it dangerous to the assembly which had the command over it. Accustomed to indulge their fancy in politics and religion, the soldiers knew little of the subordination of citizens, and being republicans in one were so in the other. They therefore maintained, that all these enormous violations of law and equity, of which they had been guilty, were justified by the success with which Providence had blessed them.

But that which gave stability to all these unsettled humours was, the great influence both civil and military acquired by Oliver Cromwell. This man, suited to the age in which he lived, was equally qualified to gain the affection and confidence of men, as to command their obedience. Though familiar with the meanest centinel, he never lost his authority: transported to a high degree with religious extasies, he never forgot the political purposes to which they might serve. Hating monarchy, while a subject; despising liberty, while a citizen; though he retained for a time all orders of men under a seeming obedience to the parliament; he was secretly paving the way, by artifice and courage, to his own unlimited authority.

The parliament, for so we must henceforth call that part of the house of commons which adhered to republican principles, having sacrificed their sovereign with so many appearing circumstances of solemnity and justice, and so much violence, began to assume more the air of a civil, legal power, and to enlarge a little the ground upon which they stood. They admitted a few of the excluded and absent members, such as were liable to least exception; but on condition that these members should sign an approbation of whatever had been done in their absence with regard to the king's trial; and some of them were willing to acquire a share of power on such terms. They issued some writs for new elections, in places where they hoped to have interest enough to bring in their own friends and dependents. They named a council of state, thirty-eight in number, to whom all addresses were made, who gave orders to all generals and admirals, who executed the laws, and who digested all business before it was introduced into parliament (h). They pretended to employ themselves entirely in adjusting the laws, forms, and plan of a new representative; and as soon as they should have settled the nation, they professed their intention of restoring the power to the people, from whom they acknowledged they had entirely derived it.

The commonwealth found every thing in England composed into a seeming tranquillity by the terror of their arms. Foreign powers, occupied in wars among themselves, had no leisure or inclination to interpose in the domestic dissensions of this island. The young king, poor and neglected, living sometimes in Holland, sometimes in France, sometimes in Jersey, comforted himself amidst his present distresses with the hopes of better fortune. The situation alone of Scotland and Ireland gave any immediate inquietude to the new republic.

After the successive defeats of Montrose and Hamilton, and the ruin of their parties, the whole authority in Scotland fell into the hands of Argyle and the rigid churchmen, that party which was most averse to the interests of the royal family. Their enmity, however, against the Independents, who had prevented the settlement of Presbyterian discipline in England, carried them to embrace opposite maxims in their political conduct. Though invited by the English parliament to model their government into a republican form, they resolved still to adhere to monarchy, which had ever prevailed in their country, and which, by the express terms of their covenant, they had engaged to defend. They considered besides, that as the property of the kingdom lay mostly in the hands of great families, it would be difficult to establish a commonwealth, or without some chief magistrate, invested with royal authority, to preserve peace or justice in the community. The execution, therefore, of the king, against which they had always protested, having occasioned a vacancy of the throne, they immediately proclaimed his son and successor, Charles II.; but upon condition "of his good behaviour and strict observance of the covenant, and his entertaining no other persons about him but such as were godly men and faithful to that obligation." These unusual clauses, inserted in the very first acknowledgement of their prince, sufficiently shewed their intention of limiting his authority. And the English commonwealth, having no pretence to interpose in the affairs of that kingdom, allowed the Scots for the present to take their own measures in settling their form of government.

The dominion which England claimed over Ireland, demanded more immediately their efforts for subduing that country. But in order to convey a just idea of Irish affairs, it will be necessary to look backwards some years, and to relate briefly those transactions which had past during the revolutions in England. When the late king agreed to that cessation of arms with the popish rebels in 1643, the parliament reproached him with favouring that odious rebellion, and exclaimed loudly against the terms of the cessation. They even declared it null and invalid, because it was concluded without their consent; and to this declaration the Scots in Ulster, and the earl of Inchiquin, a nobleman of great authority in Munster, professed to adhere. By their means the war was still kept alive; but as the dangerous distractions in England hindered the parliament from sending any considerable assistance to their allies in Ireland, the marquis of Ormond, lord lieutenant, being a native of Ireland, formed a scheme for composing the disorders of his country, and for engaging the rebel Irish to support the cause of his royal master. There were many circumstances which strongly invited the natives of Ireland to embrace the king's party. The maxims of that prince had always led him to give indulgence to the Catholics throughout all his dominions; and one principal ground of that enmity, which the Puritans professed against him, was this toleration. The parliament, on the contrary, had ever menaced the papists with the most rigid restraint; and immediately after the commencement of the Irish rebellion, they put to sale all the estates of the rebels, and had engaged the public faith for transferring them to the adventurers, who had already advanced money upon that security. The success, therefore, which the arms of the parliament met with at Naseby, struck terror into the Irish; and engaged the council of Kilkenny, composed of deputies from all the Catholic counties and cities, to conclude a peace with the marquis of Ormond, in 1646. They professed to return to their duty and allegiance, engaged to furnish ten thousand men for the support of the king's authority in England, and were content with stipulating, in return, indemnity for their rebellion and toleration of their theological system.

The earl of Ormond, not doubting but a peace, so advantageous to the Irish, would be strictly observed, advanced with a small body of troops to Kilkenny, in order to concert measures for common defence with his new allies. The pope had sent over to Ireland a nuncio, Rinuccini, an Italian; and this man, whose commission empowered him to direct the spiritual concerns of the Irish, was emboldened, by their ignorance and bigotry, to assume the chief authority in the civil government. Foreseeing that a general submission to the lord-lieutenant would put an end to his own influence, he conspired with Owen O'Neal, who commanded the native Irish in Ulster, and who bore a great jealousy to Preston, the general chiefly trusted by the council of Kilkenny. By concert, these two malcontents secretly drew forces together, and were ready to fall on Ormond, who remained in security, trusting to the pacification so lately concluded with the rebels. He received intelligence of their treachery, made his retreat with celerity and conduct, and sheltered his small army in Dublin and the other fortified towns, which still remained in the hands of the Protestants.

The nuncio, full of arrogance, levity, and ambition, was not contented with this violation of treaty. He summoned an assembly of the clergy at Waterford, and engaged them to declare against that pacification, which the civil council had concluded with their sovereign. He even thundered out a sentence of excommunication against all who should adhere to a peace, so prejudicial as he pretended, to the catholic religion; and the deluded Irish, terrified with his spiritual menaces, ranged themselves on his side, and submitted to his authority. Without scruple, he carried on war against the lord-lieutenant, and threatened with a siege the Protestant garrisons, which were, all of them, ill provided for defence.

In the mean time the unfortunate king was necessitated to take shelter in the Scottish army; and being there reduced to close confinement, and secluded from all commerce with his friends, despaired, that his authority, or even his liberty, would ever be restored to him. He sent orders to Ormond, if he could not defend himself, rather to submit to the English than to the Irish rebels; and accordingly the lord-lieutenant, being reduced to extremities, delivered up Dublin, Tredah, Dundalk, and other garrisons, to colonel Michael Jones, who took possession of them in the name of the English parliament. Ormond himself went over to England, was admitted into the king's presence, received a grateful acknowledgement for his past services, and during some time lived in tranquillity near London. But being banished, with the other royalists, to a distance from that city, and seeing every event turn out unfortunately for his royal master, and threaten him with a catastrophe still more direful, he thought proper to retire into France, where he joined the queen and the prince of Wales.

In Ireland, during these transactions, the authority of the nuncio prevailed without control among all the Catholics; and that prelate soon made them repent of the power with which they had entrusted him. Prudent men likewise were sensible of the total destruction, which was hanging over the nation from the English parliament, and saw no safety but in giving support to the declining authority of the king. The earl of Clanricarde, a nobleman of an ancient family, who had preserved his loyalty, was sensible of the ruin which threatened his countrymen, and was resolved, if possible, to prevent it. He secretly formed a combination among the Catholics; he entered into a correspondence with Inchiquin, who preserved great authority over the Protestants in Munster; he attacked the nuncio, whom he chased out of the island; and he sent to Paris a deputation, inviting the lord-lieutenant to return and take possession of his government.

Ormond, on his arrival in Ireland, found the kingdom divided into many factions, among which either open war or secret enmity prevailed. The authority of the English parliament was established in Dublin, and the other towns, which he himself had delivered into their hands. O'Neal maintained his credit in Ulster; and having entered into a secret correspondence with the parliamentary generals, was more intent on schemes for his own personal safety than anxious for the preservation of his country or religion. The other Irish, divided between their clergy, who were averse to Ormond, and their nobility, who were attached to him, were uncertain in their motions and feeble in their measures. The Scots in the north, enraged against the usurpations of the sectarian army, professed their adherence to the king; but were still hindered by many prejudices from entering into a cordial union with his lieutenant. These distracted councils and contrary humours checked the progress of Ormond, and enabled the parliamentary forces in Ireland to maintain their ground against him. The republican faction, meanwhile, in England, employed in subduing the revolted royalists, in reducing the parliament to subjection, in the trial, condemnation, and execution of the king, totally neglected the supplying of Ireland, and allowed Jones and the forces in Dublin to remain in the utmost weakness and necessity. The lord-lieutenant, though surrounded with difficulties, neglected not the favourable opportunity of promoting the royal cause. Having at last assembled an army of sixteen thousand men, he advanced upon the parliamentary garrisons. Dundalk, where Monk commanded, was delivered up by the troops, who mutinied against their governor. Tredah, Neury, and other forts, were taken. Dublin was threatened with a siege; and the affairs of the lieutenant appeared in so prosperous a condition, that the young king entertained thoughts of coming in person to Ireland.

When the English commonwealth was brought to some tolerable tolerable settlement, men began to cast their eyes towards the neighbouring island. During the contest of the two parties, the government of Ireland had remained a great object of intrigue; and the Presbyterians endeavoured to obtain the lieutenancy for Waller, the Independents for Lambert. After the execution of the king, Cromwell himself began to aspire to a command, where so much glory, he saw, might be won, and so much authority acquired. In his absence, on the 15th of March, his name was proposed to the council of state; and both friends and enemies concurred to vote him into that important office. When informed of his election, he feigned surprize, and pretended at first to hesitate with regard to the acceptance of the command. And Lambert, either deceived by his dissimulation, or feigning to be deceived, continued, notwithstanding this disappointment, his friendship and connexions with Cromwell.

The new lieutenant immediately applied himself with his wonted vigilance to make preparations for his expedition. Many disorders in England it behoved him previously to compose. All places were full of danger and inquietude. Though men, astonished with the successes of the army, remained in seeming tranquillity, symptoms of discontent began to appear. The English could not immediately conform their speech and countenance to the present necessity, or pretend attachment to the republican form of government. It was requisite to change the magistracy of London, and to degrade, as well as punish, the mayor and some of the aldermen, before the proclamation for the abolition of monarchy could be published in the city. An engagement being framed to support the commonwealth without king or house of peers, the army subscribed it; but though it was imposed upon the rest of the nation under severe penalties, no less than putting all who refused out of the protection of law; such reluctance was observed in the people, that even the parliament desisted from it. The spirit of fanaticism, by which that assembly had at first been strongly supported, was now turned, in a great measure, against them. The pulpits, being chiefly filled with Presbyterians, or disguised royalists, and having long been the scene of news and politics, could by no penalties be restrained from declarations unfavourable to the established government. Numberless were the extravagances which broke out among the people. Everard, a disbanded soldier, having preached that the time was now come when the community of goods would be renewed among Christians, led out his followers to take possession of the land; and being carried before the general, he refused to salute him; because he was but his fellow-creature. What seemed more dangerous, the army itself was infected with like humours. Though the levellers had for a time been suppressed by Cromwell, they still continued to propagate their doctrines among the private men and inferior officers, who pretended a right to be consulted, as before, in the administration of the commonwealth. They now practised against their officers the same lesson which they had been taught against the parliament. They framed a remonstrance, and sent five agitators to present it to the general and council of war: these were cashiered with ignominy by sentence of a court martial. One Lockyer, having carried his sedition farther, was sentenced to death; but this punishment was so far from quelling the mutinous spirit, that above a thousand of his companions showed their adherence to him, by attending his funeral, and wearing in their hats black and sea-green ribbons by way of favours. About four thousand assembled at Burford, under the command of Thomson, a man formerly condemned for sedition by a court-martial, but pardoned by the general. Colonel Reynolds, and afterwards Fairfax and Cromwell, fell upon them, while they were seduced by the appearance of a treaty. Four hundred were taken prisoners: some of them capitally punished: the rest pardoned: and this tumultuous spirit, though it still lurked in the army, and broke out from time to time, seemed for the present to be suppressed.

Petitions, framed in the same spirit of opposition, were presented to the parliament by lieutenant-colonel Lilburn, the person who, for dispersing seditious libels, had formerly been treated with such severity by the star-chamber. His liberty was at this time as ill relished by the parliament, and he was thrown into prison, as a promoter of sedition and disorder in the commonwealth. The women applied by petition for his release; but were now desired to mind their household affairs, and leave the government of the state to the men. From all quarters, the parliament was harassed with petitions of a very free nature, which proved how ardently all men longed for the restoration of their laws and liberties. Even in a feast, which the city gave to the parliament and council of state, it was deemed a requisite precaution, if we may credit Walker and Dugdale, to swear all the cooks, that they would serve nothing but wholesome food to them.

The parliament judged it necessary to enlarge the laws of high treason beyond those bounds, within which they had been confined during the monarchy. To affirm the present government to be an usurpation, to assert that the parliament or council of state were tyrannical or illegal, to endeavour subverting their authority, or stirring up sedition against them; these offences were declared to be high-treason. The power of imprisonment, of which the petition of right had bereaved the king, it was now found necessary to restore to the council of state; and all the jails in England were filled with men whom the jealousies and fears of the ruling party had represented as dangerous. The taxes, continued by the new government, and which, being unusual, were esteemed heavy, increased the general ill will under which it laboured. Besides the customs and excise, ninety thousand pounds a-month were levied on land for the subsistence of the army. The sequestrations and compositions of the royalists, the sale of the crown lands, and of the dean and chapter lands, though they yielded great sums, were not sufficient to support the vast expences, and, as was suspected, the great depredations of the parliament and of their adherents.

But amidst all these difficulties, the steady mind of Cromwell still pursued its purpose. While he was collecting an army of twelve thousand men in the west of England, he sent to Ireland, under Reynolds and Venables, a reinforcement of four thousand horse and foot, in order to strengthen Jones, and enable him to defend himself against the marquis of Ormond, who lay at Finglass, and was making preparations for the attack of Dublin. Inchiquin, who had now made a treaty with the king's lieutenant, having, with a separate body, taken Tredah and Dundalk, gave a defeat to O'Farrell who served under O'Neal, and to young Coot who commanded some parliamentary forces. After he had joined his troops to the main army, with whom, for some time, he remained united, Ormond passed the river Liffy, and took post at Rathmines, two miles from Dublin, with a view of commencing the siege of that city. In order to cut off all farther supply from Jones, he had begun the reparation of an old fort which lay at the gates of Dublin; and being exhausted with continual fatigue for some days, he had retired to rest, after leaving orders to keep his forces under arms. On the 2nd of August, he was suddenly awaked with the noise of firing; and, starting from his bed, saw every thing already in confusion. Jones, an excellent officer, had sallied out with the reinforcement newly arrived; and, attacking the party employed in repairing the fort, he totally routed them, pursued the advantage, and fell in with the army, which had neglected Ormond's orders. These he soon threw into disorder; put them to flight, in spite of all the efforts of the lord-lieutenant; chased them off the field; seized all their tents, baggage, ammunition; and returned victorious to Dublin, after killing a thousand men, and taking above two thousand prisoners.

This loss was irreparable to the royal cause. That numerous army which, with so much pains and difficulty, the lord-lieutenant had been collecting for more than a year, was dispersed in a moment. On the 15th of the same month, Cromwell arrived in Dublin, where he was welcomed with shouts and rejoicings. He hastened to Tredah. That town was well fortified: Ormond had thrown into it a good garrison of three thousand men, under sir Arthur Aston, an officer of reputation. He expected that Tredah, lying in the neighbourhood of Dublin, would first be attempted by Cromwell, and he was desirous to employ the enemy some time in that siege, while he himself should repair his broken forces. But Cromwell knew the importance of dispatch. Having made a breach, he ordered a general assault. Though twice repulsed with loss, he renewed the attack, and himself, along with Ireton, led on his men. All opposition was overborne by the furious valour of the troops. The town was taken sword in hand; and orders being issued to give no quarter, a cruel slaughter was made of the garrison. Even a few, who were saved by the soldiers were next day miserably butchered by orders from the general. One person alone of the the garrison escaped to be a messenger of this universal havoc and destruction.

Cromwell pretended to retaliate by this severe execution the cruelty of the Irish massacre: but he well knew, that almost the whole garrison was English; and his justice was only a barbarous policy, in order to terrify all other garrisons from resistance. His policy, however, had the desired effect. Having led the army without delay to Wexford, he began to batter the town. The garrison, after a slight defence, offered to capitulate; but, before they obtained a cessation, they imprudently neglected their guards; and the English army rushed in upon them. The same severity was exercised as at Tredah.

Every town before which Cromwell presented himself, now opened its gates without resistance. Ross, though strongly garrisoned, was surrendered by lord Taffe. Having taken Estionage, Cromwell threw a bridge over the Barrow, and made himself master of Passage and Carric. The English had no farther difficulties to encounter than what arose from fatigue and the advanced season. Fluxes and contagious distempers creeped in among the soldiers, who perished in great numbers. Jones himself, the brave governor of Dublin, died at Wexford. And Cromwell had so far advanced with his decayed army, that he began to find it difficult, either to subsist in the enemy's country, or retreat to his own garrison. But in November, while he was in these straits, Cork, Kinsale, and all the English garrisons in Munster, deserted to him, and opening their gates, resolved to share the fortunes of their victorious countrymen.

This desertion of the English put an end to Ormond's authority, which was already much diminished by the misfortunes at Dublin, Tredah, and Wexford. The Irish, actuated by national and religious prejudices, could no longer be kept in obedience by a Protestant governor, who was so unsuccessful in all his enterprizes. The clergy renewed their excommunications against him and his adherents, and added the terrors of superstition to those which arose from a victorious enemy. Cromwell, having received a reinforcement from England, again took the field early in the spring. He made himself master of Kilkenny and Clonmel, the only places where he met with any vigorous resistance. The whole frame of the Irish union being in a manner dissolved, Ormond soon after left the island, and delegated his authority to Clanricarde, who found affairs so desperate as to admit of no remedy. The Irish were glad to embrace banishment as a refuge. Above forty thousand men passed into foreign service; and Cromwell, well pleased to free the island from enemies, who never could be cordially reconciled to the English, gave them full liberty and leisure for their embarkation.

Thus Cromwell, in the space of nine months had almost entirely subdued Ireland, but fortune was preparing for him a new scene of victory and triumph in Scotland. Charles was at the Hague when sir Joseph Douglas informed him that he was proclaimed king by the Scottish parliament. At the same time, Douglas acquainted him of the hard conditions annexed to the proclamation, and extremely damped that joy which might arise from his being recognised sovereign in one of his kingdoms. Charles too considered, that those who pretended to acknowledge his title, were at the same time in rebellion against his family, and would be sure to intrust very little authority in his hands. As the prospect of affairs in Ireland was at that time not unpromising, he intended rather to try his fortune in that kingdom, from which he expected more submission and obedience.

It was, however, expedient that he should depart from Holland, where the people were much attached to his interests; for, besides his connexion with the family of Orange, which was extremely beloved by the populace, all men regarded with compassion his helpless condition, and expressed the greatest abhorrence against the murder of his father. But though the public in general bore great favour to the king, the States were uneasy at his presence. They dreaded the parliament, so formidable by their power, and so prosperous in all their enterprizes; and, after the murder of Dorislaus, they found it still more necessary to satisfy the English commonwealth, by removing the king to a distance from them (i).

Charles, having passed some time at Paris, where no assistance was given him, and even few civilities were paid him, made his retreat into Jersey, where his authority was still acknowledged. Here Winram, laird of Liberton, came to him, as deputy from the committee of estates in Scotland, and informed him of the conditions to which he must necessarily submit before he could be admitted to the exercise of his authority. Conditions extremely hard; but as the affairs of Ireland began to decline, and the king found it no longer safe to venture himself in that island, he gave a civil answer to Winram, and desired commissioners to meet him at Breda, in order to enter into a treaty with regard to these conditions.

The earls of Cassilis and Lothian, lord Burley, the laird of Liberton, and other commissioners, arrived at Breda; but without power of treating: the king must submit, without reserve, to the terms imposed upon him. The terms were, that he should issue a proclamation, banishing from court all excommunicated persons, that is, all those who, either under Hamilton or Montrose, had ventured their lives for his family; that no English subject who had served against the parliament should be allowed to approach him; that he should bind himself by his royal promise to take the covenant; that he should ratify all acts of parliament, by which Presbyterian government, the Directory of Worship, the Confession of Faith, and the Catechism, were established; and that in civil affairs he should entirely conform himself to the direction of parliament, and in ecclesiastical to that of the assembly. These proposals, the commissioners, after passing some time in sermons and prayers, very solemnly delivered to the king.

Most of the king's English counsellors dissuaded him from accepting these conditions. They said that the men who now governed Scotland were the most furious and bigoted of that party, which had first excited a rebellion against the late king; that they had even renewed their rebellion, and stopped the progress of his victories; and after he had entrusted his person to them in his distress, had basely sold him to his barbarous enemies: that they had as yet shown no marks of repentance, and in the terms which they now proposed, displayed the same antimonarchical principles by which they had been actuated: that nothing could be more dishonourable than that the king, in his first enterprize, should sacrifice, merely for the empty name of royalty, those principles for which his father had died a martyr, and in which himself had been strictly educated: that by this hypocrisy he might lose the royalists, who alone were attached to him; but never would gain the Presbyterians, who were averse to his family and his cause, and who would ascribe his compliance to policy: that the Scots had refused to give him any assurances of their intending to restore him to the throne of England; and could they even be brought to make such an attempt, it had sufficiently appeared, by the event of Hamilton's engagement, how unequal their force was to so great an enterprize: that on the first check which they should receive, Argyle and his partizans would lay hold of the quickest expedient for reconciling themselves to the English parliament, and would betray the king, as they had done his father, into the hands of his enemies: and that however desperate the royal cause, it must still be regarded as highly imprudent in the king to make a sacrifice of his honour, where the sole purchase was to endanger his life or liberty.

The earl of Lanerc, now duke of Hamilton, the earl of Lauderdale, and others of that party, who had been banished their country for the late engagement, were then with the king; and being desirous of returning home in his retinue, they joined the opinion of the young duke of Buckingham, and pressed him to submit to the conditions required of him. It was urged, that nothing would more gratify the king's enemies than to see him fall into the snare laid for him, and by so scrupulous a nicety, leave the possession of his dominions to those who desired but a pretence for excluding him: that Argyle, not daring so far to oppose the bent of the nation as to throw off all allegiance to his sovereign, had embraced this expedient, by which he hoped to make Charles dethrone himself, and refuse a kingdom which was offered him: that it was not to be doubted but the same national spirit, assisted by Hamilton and his party, would rise still higher in favour of their prince after he had entrusted himself to their fidelity, and would much abate the rigour of the conditions now imposed upon him: that whatever might be the present intentions of the ruling party, they must unavoidably be engaged in a war with England, and must accept the assistance of the king's friends of all parties, in order to support themselves against a power so much superior: that how much soever a steady, uniform conduct might have been suitable to the advanced age and strict engagements of the late king, no one would throw any blame on a young prince for complying with conditions which necessity had extorted from him: that even the rigour of those principles professed by his father had been extremely prejudicial to his interests; nor could any thing be more serviceable to the royal cause, than to give all parties room to hope for more equal and more indulgent maxims of government: and that where affairs were reduced to so desperate a situation, dangers ought little to be regarded; and the king's honour lay rather in showing some early symptoms of courage and activity, than in chusing strictly a party among theological controversies, with which, it might be supposed, he was but little acquainted.

(i) Dorislaus, though a native of Holland, had long resided in England; and being employed as assistant to the high court of justice, which condemned the late king, he had risen to great credit and favour with the ruling party. They sent him envoy to Holland; but no sooner had he arrived at the Hague, than he was set upon by some royalists, chiefly retainers to Montrose. They rushed into the room, where he was sitting with some company; dragged him from the table; put him to death as the first victim to their murdered sovereign; very leisurely and peaceably separated themselves; and though orders were issued by the magistrates to arrest them, these were executed with such slowness and reluctance, that the criminals had all of them the opportunity of making their escape.

These arguments, seconded by the advice of the queen-mother and of the prince of Orange, the king's brother-in-law, who both of them thought it ridiculous to refuse a kingdom merely from regard to episcopacy, had great influence on Charles. But what chiefly determined him to comply was the account brought him of the fate of Montrose, who, with all the circumstances of rage and contumely, had been put to death by his zealous countrymen. Though in this instance the king saw more evidently the furious spirit by which the Scots were actuated, he had now no farther resource, and was obliged to grant whatever was demanded of him.

Montrose, having laid down his arms at the command of the late king, had retired into France, and had lived for some time unactive at Paris. He there became acquainted with the famous cardinal de Retz; and that penetrating judge celebrates him in his memorials as one of those heroes, of whom there are no longer any remains in the world, and who are only to be met with in Plutarch. Desirous of improving his martial genius, he took a journey to Germany, was caressed by the emperor, received the rank of mareschal, and proposed to levy a regiment for the Imperial service. While employed for that purpose in the Low Countries, he heard of the tragical death of the king; and at the same time received from his young master a renewal of his commission of captain general in Scotland. He then gathered followers in Holland and the north of Germany, whom his great reputation allured to him. The king of Denmark and duke of Holstein sent him some small supply of money: the queen of Sweden furnished him with arms: the prince of Orange with ships: and Montrose, hastening his enterprize, lest the king's agreement with the Scots should make him revoke his commission, set out for the Orkneys with about five hundred men, most of them Germans. These were all the preparations which he could make against a kingdom, settled in domestic peace, supported by a disciplined army, fully apprized of his enterprize, and prepared against him. Some of his retainers having told him of a prophesy, that "to him and him alone it was reserved to restore the king's authority in all his dominions;" he lent a willing ear to suggestions which, however ill-grounded or improbable, were so conformable to his own daring character.

He armed several of the inhabitants of the Orkneys, though an unwarlike people, and carried them over with him to Caithness; hoping that the general affection to the king's service, and the fame of his former exploits, would make the Highlanders flock to his standard. But many of those who formerly adhered to him, had been severely punished by the covenanters; and no prospect of success was entertained in opposition to so great a force as was drawn together against him. The committee ordered Lesley and Holborne to march against him with an army of four thousand men. Strahan was sent before, with a body of cavalry to check his progress. He fell unexpectedly on Montrose, who had no horse to bring him intelligence. The royalists were put to flight; all of them either killed or taken prisoners; and Montrose himself, having put on the disguise of a peasant, was delivered into the hands of his enemies, by a friend to whom he had entrusted his person.

Lesley led him about for several days in the same low habit under which he had disguised himself. The vulgar, wherever he passed, reproached and vilified him. When he came to Edinburgh, he was met by the magistrates, at the gate of the city, and put into a new cart, purposely made with a high chair or bench, where he was placed, that the people might have a full view of him. He was bound with a cord, drawn over his breast and shoulders, and fastened through holes made in the cart. The hangman then took off the hat of the noble prisoner, and rode himself before the cart in his livery, and with his bonnet on; the other officers, who were taken prisoners with the marquis, walking two and two before them.

When he was carried before the parliament, which was then sitting, Loudon the chancellor, reproached him with the breach of the national covenant, which he had subscribed; his rebellion against God, the king, and the kingdom; and the many horrible murders, treasons, and impieties, for which he was now to be brought to condign punishment. Montrose in his answer told the parliament, that, since the king, as he was informed, had so far avowed their authority as to enter into treaty with them, he now appeared uncovered before their tribunal; a respect, which, while they stood in open defiance to their sovereign, they would in vain have required of him. That he acknowledged, with infinite shame and remorse, the errors of his early conduct, when their plausible pretences had seduced him to tread with them the paths of rebellion, and bear arms against his prince and country. That his following services, he hoped, had sufficiently testified his repentance; and his death would atone for that guilt, the only one with which he could justly reproach himself. That in all his warlike enterprizes he was warranted by that commission, which he had received from his and their master, against whose lawful authority they had erected their standard. That to venture his life for his sovereign was the least part of his merit: he had even thrown down his arms in obedience to the sacred commands of the king; and had resigned to them the victory, which, in defiance of all their efforts, he was still enabled to dispute with them. That no blood had ever been shed by him but in the field of battle; and many persons were now in his eye, many now dared to pronounce sentence of death upon him, whose life, forfeited by the laws of war, he had formerly saved from the fury of the soldiers. That he was sorry to find no better testimony of their return to allegiance than the murder of so faithful a subject, in whose death the king's commission must be, at once, so highly injured and affronted. That as to himself, they had in vain endeavoured to vilify and degrade him by all their studied indignities: the justice of his cause, he knew, would ennoble any fortune; nor had he other affliction than to see the authority of his prince, with which he was invested, treated with so much ignominy. And that he now joyfully followed, by a like unjust sentence, his late sovereign; and should be happy if, in his future destiny, he could follow him to the same blissful mansions, where his piety and humane virtues had already, without doubt, secured him an eternal recompense.

Montrose's sentence was next pronounced against him, "That he, James Graham" (for this was the only name they vouchsafed to give him), "should next day be carried to Edinburgh Cross, and there be hanged on a gibbet, thirty feet high, for the space of three hours: then to be taken down, his head be cut off upon a scaffold, and affixed to the prison: his legs and arms be stuck up on the four chief towns of the kingdom: his body to be buried in the place appropriated for common malefactors; except the church, upon his repentance, should take off his excommunication."

The clergy, hoping that the terrors of immediate death had now given them an advantage over their enemy, flocked about him, and insulted over his fallen fortunes. They pronounced his damnation, and assured him, that the judgement, which he was so soon to suffer, would prove but an easy prologue to that which he must undergo hereafter. They next offered to pray with him: but he refused their offers, and told them, that they were a miserably deluded and deluding people; and would shortly bring their country under the most insupportable servitude, to which any nation had ever been reduced. "For my part," added he, "I am much prouder to have my head affixed to the place where it is sentenced to stand, than to have my picture hang in the king's bed-chamber. So far from being sorry that my quarters are to be sent to four cities of the kingdom; I wish I had limbs enough to be dispersed into all the cities of Christendom, there to remain as testimonies in favour of the cause for which I suffer." On the 21st of May, 1650, he was led forth to suffer the ignominious death to which he was destined.

The vengeance of the covenanters, however, was not satisfied with Montrose's execution. Urrey, whose inconstancy now led him to take part with the king, suffered about the same time: Spotiswood of Daersie, a youth of eighteen, sir Francis Hay of Dalgetie, and colonel Sibbald, all of them of birth and character, underwent a like fate. These were taken prisoners with Montrose. The marquis of Huntley, about a year before, had also fallen a victim to the severity of the covenanters.

On the 23rd of June, the king, in consequence of his agreement with the commissioners of Scotland, set sail for that country; and being escorted by seven Dutch ships of war, who were sent to guard the herring fishery, he arrived in the Frith of Cromarty. Before he was permitted to land, he was required to sign the covenant; and many sermons and lectures were made him, exhorting him to persevere in that holy confederacy. Hamilton, Lauderdale, Dumfermling, and other noblemen of that party, whom they called Engagers, were immediately separated from him, and obliged to retire to their houses, where they lived in a private manner, without trust or authority. None of his English friends, who had served his father, were allowed to remain in the kingdom. The king himself found that he was considered as a mere pageant of state, and that the few remains of royalty which he possessed, served only to draw on him the greater indignities. One of the quarters of Montrose, his faithful servant, who had borne his commission, had been sent to Aberdeen, and was still allowed to hang over the gates when he passed by that place. The general assembly, and afterwards the committee of estates and the army, who were entirely governed by the assembly, set forth a public declaration, in which they protested, "that they did not espouse any malignant quarrel or party, but fought merely on their former grounds or principles; that they disclaimed all the sins and guilt of the king, and of his house; nor would they own him or his interest, otherwise than with a subordination to God, and so far as he owned and prosecuted the cause of God, and acknowledged the sins of his house, and of his former ways."

The king, lying entirely at mercy, and having no assurance of life or liberty, farther than was agreeable to the fancy of these austere zealots, was constrained to embrace a measure, which nothing but the necessity of his affairs, and his great youth and inexperience, could excuse. He issued a declaration, on the 16th of August, in which he owned "the sin of his father, in marrying into an idolatrous family:" he acknowledged "the bloodshed, in the late wars, lay at his father's door:" he expressed a deep sense of his own ill education, and the prejudices he had drank in against the cause of God, of which he was now very sensible:" he confessed "all the former parts of his life to have been a course of enmity to the work of God:" he repented "of his commission to Montrose, and of every thing he had done, that gave offence:" and, with solemn protestations, he affirmed, "that he was now sincere in his declaration, that he would adhere to it to the end of his life, in Scotland, England, and Ireland."

Still the covenanters and the clergy were diffident of the king's sincerity. The facility which he discovered in yielding whatever was required of him, made them suspect, that he regarded all his concessions merely as ridiculous farces, to which he must of necessity submit. They had another trial prepared for him. Instead of the solemnity of his coronation, which was delayed, they were resolved, that he should pass through a public humiliation, and do penance before the whole people. They sent him twelve articles of repentance, which he was to acknowledge; and the king had agreed, that he would submit to this indignity. The various transgressions of his father and grandfather, together with the idolatry of his mother, are again enumerated and aggravated in these articles; and farther declarations were insisted on, that he sought the restoration of his rights for the sole advancement of religion, and in subordination of the kingdom of Christ. In short, having exalted the altar above the throne, and brought royalty under their feet, the clergy were resolved to trample on it, and vilify it, by every instance of contumely, which their present influence enabled them to impose upon their unhappy prince.

Charles in the mean time found his authority entirely annihilated, as well as his character degraded. He was consulted in no public measure. He was not called to assist at any councils. His favour was sufficient to discredit any pretender to office or advancement. All efforts which he made to unite the opposite parties, increased the suspicion which the covenanters had entertained of him, as if he were not entirely their own. Argyle, who by subtleties and compliances, was partly led and partly governed by this wild faction, still turned a deaf ear to all advances which the king made to enter into confidence with him. Malignants and Engagers continued to be the objects of general hatred and persecution; and whoever was noxious to the clergy, failed not to have one or other of these epithets assigned to him. The fanaticism which prevailed had acquired a new object of abhorrence: these were the Sorcerers. So prevalent was the opinion of witchcraft, that great numbers, accused of that crime, were burnt by sentence of the magistrates throughout all parts of Scotland. In a village near Berwick which contained only fourteen houses, fourteen persons were punished by fire; and it became a science, every where much studied and cultivated, to distinguish a true witch by proper trials and symptoms.

The advance of the English army under Cromwell was not able to appease or soften the animosities among the parties in Scotland. The clergy were still resolute to exclude all but their more zealous adherents. As soon as the English parliament found that the treaty between the king and the Scots would probably terminate in an accommodation, they made preparations for a war which, they saw, would in the end prove inevitable. Cromwell, having broken the force and courage of the Irish, was sent for; and he left the command of Ireland to Ireton, who governed that kingdom in the character of deputy, and with vigilance and industry persevered in the work of subduing the natives.

It was expected that Fairfax, who still retained the name of general, would continue to act against Scotland, and appear at the head of the forces; a station for which he was well qualified. But Fairfax had entertained scruples against invading the Scots, whom he considered as zealous Presbyterians, and united to England by the sacred bands of the covenant. He was farther confirmed in his repugnance by the exhortations of his wife, who had great influence over him, and was herself much governed by the Presbyterian clergy. A committee of parliament was sent to reason with him; and Cromwell was of the number. In vain did they urge that the Scots had first broken the covenant by their invasion of England under Hamilton; and that they would surely renew their hostile attempts, if not prevented by the vigorous measures of the commonwealth. Cromwell, who knew the rigid inflexibility of Fairfax in every thing which he regarded as matter of principle, ventured to solicit him with the utmost earnestness; and he went so far as to shed tears of grief and vexation on the occasion. No one could suspect any ambition in the man, who laboured so zealously to retain his general in that high office which, he knew, he himself was entitled to fill. The same warmth of temper which made Cromwell an enthusiast, rendered him the most dangerous of hypocrites; and it was to this turn of mind, as much as to his courage and capacity, that he owed all his wonderful successes. By his zeal, he engaged every one to cooperate with him in his measures; and entering easily and affectionately into every part which he was disposed to act, he was enabled to cover, under a tempest of passion, all his schemes and artifices.

Fairfax having resigned his commission, it was bestowed on Cromwell, who was declared captain-general of all the forces in England. This command, in a commonwealth, which stood entirely by arms, was of the utmost importance; and was the chief step which this ambitious politician had yet made towards sovereign power. He immediately marched his forces, and entered Scotland with an army of sixteen thousand men.

The command of the Scottish army was given to Lesley, an experienced officer, who formed a very proper plan of defence. He entrenched himself in a fortified camp between Edinburgh and Leith, and took care to remove from the counties of Merse and the Lothians every thing which could serve to the subsistence of the English army. Cromwell advanced to the Scotch camp, and endeavoured by every expedient to bring Lesley to action: the prudent Scotchman knew that, though superior in numbers, his army was much inferior in discipline to the English; and he carefully kept himself within his entrenchments. By skirmishes and small rencounters he tried to confirm the spirits of his soldiers; and was successful in these enterprizes. His army daily increased both in numbers and courage. The king came to the camp; and having exerted himself in an action, gained on the affections of the soldiery, who were more desirous of serving under a young prince of spirit and vivacity, than under a committee of gown-men. The clergy were alarmed. They ordered Charles immediately to leave the camp. They also purged it carefully of about four thousand Malignants and Engagers, whose zeal had led them to attend the king, and who were the soldiers of chief credit and experience in the nation. They then concluded, that they had an army composed entirely of saints, and could not be beaten. They murmured extremely against their general. An advantage having offered itself on a Sunday, they hindered their general from making use of it, lest he should involve the nation in the guilt of sabbath-breaking.

Cromwell found himself in a very bad situation. He had no provisions but what he received by sea. He had not had the precaution to bring these in sufficient quantities; and his army was reduced to difficulties. He retired to Dunbar. Lesley followed him, and encamped on the heights of Lammermure, which overlook that town. There lay many difficult passes between Dunbar and Berwick, and of these Lesley had taken possession. The English general was reduced to extremities. He had even embraced a resolution of sending by sea all his foot and artillery to England, and of breaking through, at all hazards, with his cavalry. The madness of the Scottish ecclesiastics saved him from this loss and dishonour.

Night and day the ministers had been wrestling with the Lord in prayer, as they termed it; and they fancied that they had at last obtained the victory. Revelations, they said, were made them, that the sectarian and heretical army, together with Agag, meaning Cromwell, was delivered into their hands. Upon the faith of these visions, they forced their general, in spite of his remonstrances, to descend into the plain, with a view of attacking the English in their retreat. Cromwell, looking through a glass, saw the enemy's camp in motion; and foretold, without the help of revelation, that the Lord had delivered them into his hands. He gave orders immediately for an attack. In this battle, which was fought on the 3rd of September, 1650, it was easily observed that nothing, in military actions, can supply the place of discipline and experience; and that, in the presence of real danger, where men are not accustomed to it, the fumes of enthusiasm presently dissipate, and lose their influence. The Scots, though double in number to the English, were soon put to flight, and pursued with great slaughter. The chief, if not only resistance was made by one regiment of Highlanders, that part of the army which was the least infected with fanaticism. No victory could be more complete than this which was obtained by Cromwell. About three thousand of the enemy were slain, and nine thousand taken prisoners. Cromwell pursued his advantage, and took possession of Edinburgh and Leith. The remnant of the Scottish army fled to Stirling. The approach of the winter season, and an ague, which seized Cromwell, kept him from pushing the victory any farther.

The clergy made great lamentations, and told the Lord, that to them it was little to sacrifice their lives and estates, but to him it was a great loss to suffer his elect to be destroyed. They published a declaration, containing the cause of their late misfortunes. These visitations they ascribed to the manifold provocations of the king's house, of which they feared he had not yet thoroughly repented; the secret intrusion of malignants into the king's family, and even into the camp; the leaving of a most malignant and profane guard of horse, who, being sent for to be purged, came two days before the defeat, and were allowed to fight with the army; the owning of the king's quarrel by many without subordination to religion and liberty; and the carnal self-seeking of some, together with the neglect of family prayers by others.

Cromwell, having been so successful in the war of the sword, took up the pen against the Scottish ecclesiastics. He wrote them some polemical letters, in which he maintained the chief points of the independent theology. He took care likewise to retort on them their favourite argument of providence; and asked, Whether the Lord had not declared against them? But the ministers thought that the same events, which to their enemies were judgements, to them were trials; and they replied, that the Lord had only hid his face for a time, from Jacob. But Cromwell insisted, that the appeal had been made to God in the most express and solemn manner, and that, in the fields of Dunbar, an irrevocable decision had been awarded in favour of the English army (k).

The defeat of the Scots was regarded by the king as a fortunate event. The armies, which fought on both sides, were almost equally his enemies; and the vanquished now offered him more authority, and applied to him for support. The parliament was summoned to meet at St. John's Town. Hamilton, Lauderdale, and all the Engagers, were admitted into court and camp, on condition of doing public penance, and expressing repentance for their late transgressions. Some Malignants also creeped in under various pretences. The intended humiliation or penance of the king was changed into the ceremony of his coronation, which was performed at Scone with great pomp and solemnity, on the first of January, 1651. But amidst all this appearance of respect, Charles remained in the hands of the most rigid covenanters: and though treated with civility and courtesy by Argyle, a man of parts and address, he was little better than a prisoner.

Charles was now in a situation which very ill suited his temper and disposition. His affability, his wit, his gaiety, were here so many vices; and his love of ease, liberty, and pleasure, was regarded as the highest enormity. He was obliged to attend from morning to night at prayers and sermons; but he betrayed evident symptoms of weariness or contempt. The clergy never could esteem the king sincere; and by continual exhortations, remonstrances, and reprimands, they endeavoured to bring him to a juster sense of his spiritual duty (l).

The king was now very unpleasantly situated, and the formalities of the religious by no means suited with his disposition; so that he made an attempt to regain his liberty. General Middleton, at the head of some royalists, being proscribed by the covenanters, kept in the mountains, expecting some opportunity of serving his master. The king resolved to join this body. He secretly made his escape from Argyle, and fled towards the Highlands. Colonel Montgomery, with a troop of horse, was sent in pursuit of him. He overtook the king, and persuaded him to return. The royalists being too weak to support him, Charles was the more easily induced to comply. This incident procured him afterwards better treatment and more authority; the covenanters being apprehensive of driving him, by their rigours, to some desperate resolution. Argyle renewed his courtship to the king, and the king, with equal dissimulation, pretended to repose great confidence in that nobleman. He even went so far as to drop hints of his intention to marry the earl's daughter: but he had to do with a man too wise to be seduced by such gross artifices.

As soon as the season would permit, the Scottish army was assembled under Hamilton and Lesley; and the king was allowed to join the camp. The forces of the western counties, notwithstanding the imminent danger which threatened their country, were resolute not to unite their cause with that of an army which admitted any engagers or malignants among them; and they kept in a body apart under Ker. They called themselves the Protesters; and (k) The following passage is extracted from Cromwell's composition on this occasion: "You say you have not so learned Christ as to hang the equity of our cause upon events. We could wish that blindness had not been upon your eyes to all those marvellous dispensations, which God had wrought lately in England. But did not you solemnly appeal and pray? Did not we do so too? And ought not we and you to think, with fear and trembling, of the hand of the great God, in this mighty and strange appearance of his, but can slightly call it an event? Were not both your and our expectations renewed from time to time, while we waited on God, to see which way he would manifest himself upon our appeals? And shall we, after all these our prayers, fastings, tears, expectations, and solemn appeals, call these mere events? The Lord pity you. Surely we fear, because it has been a merciful and a gracious deliverance to us. I beseech you in the bowels of Christ, search after the mind of the Lord in it towards you, and we shall help you by our prayers that you may find it. For yet, if we know our heart at all, our bowels do in Christ yearn after the godly in Scotland." Thurloe, vol. i. p. 158.

(l) The king's passion for the fair could not be restrained. He had been observed using some familiarities with a young woman; and a committee of ministers was appointed to reprove him for a behaviour so unbecoming a covenanted monarch. Mr. Douglas, the spokesman of the committee, began by informing the king that great scandal had been given to the godly; he enlarged on the heinous nature of sin, and concluded with exhorting his majesty, whenever he was disposed to amuse himself, to be more careful, for the future, in shutting the windows. This delicacy, so unusual to the place and to the character of the man was remarked by the king; and he never forgot the obligation.

their clergy declaimed equally against the king and against Cromwell. The other party were denominated Resolutioners; and these distinctions continued long after to divide and agitate the kingdom.

Charles encamped at the Torwood, between Edinburgh and Stirling; and his generals resolved to conduct themselves by the same cautious maxims which, so long as they were embraced, had been successful during the former campaign. The town of Stirling lay at his back, and the whole north supplied him with provisions. Strong entrenchments defended his front; and it was in vain that Cromwell made every attempt to bring him to an engagement. After losing much time, the English general sent Lambert over the frith into Fife, with an intention of cutting off the provisions of the enemy. Lambert fell upon Holborne and Brown, who commanded a body of four thousand Scots, and put them to rout with great slaughter. Cromwell also passed over his whole army; and lying at the back of the king, made it impossible for him to keep his post any longer.

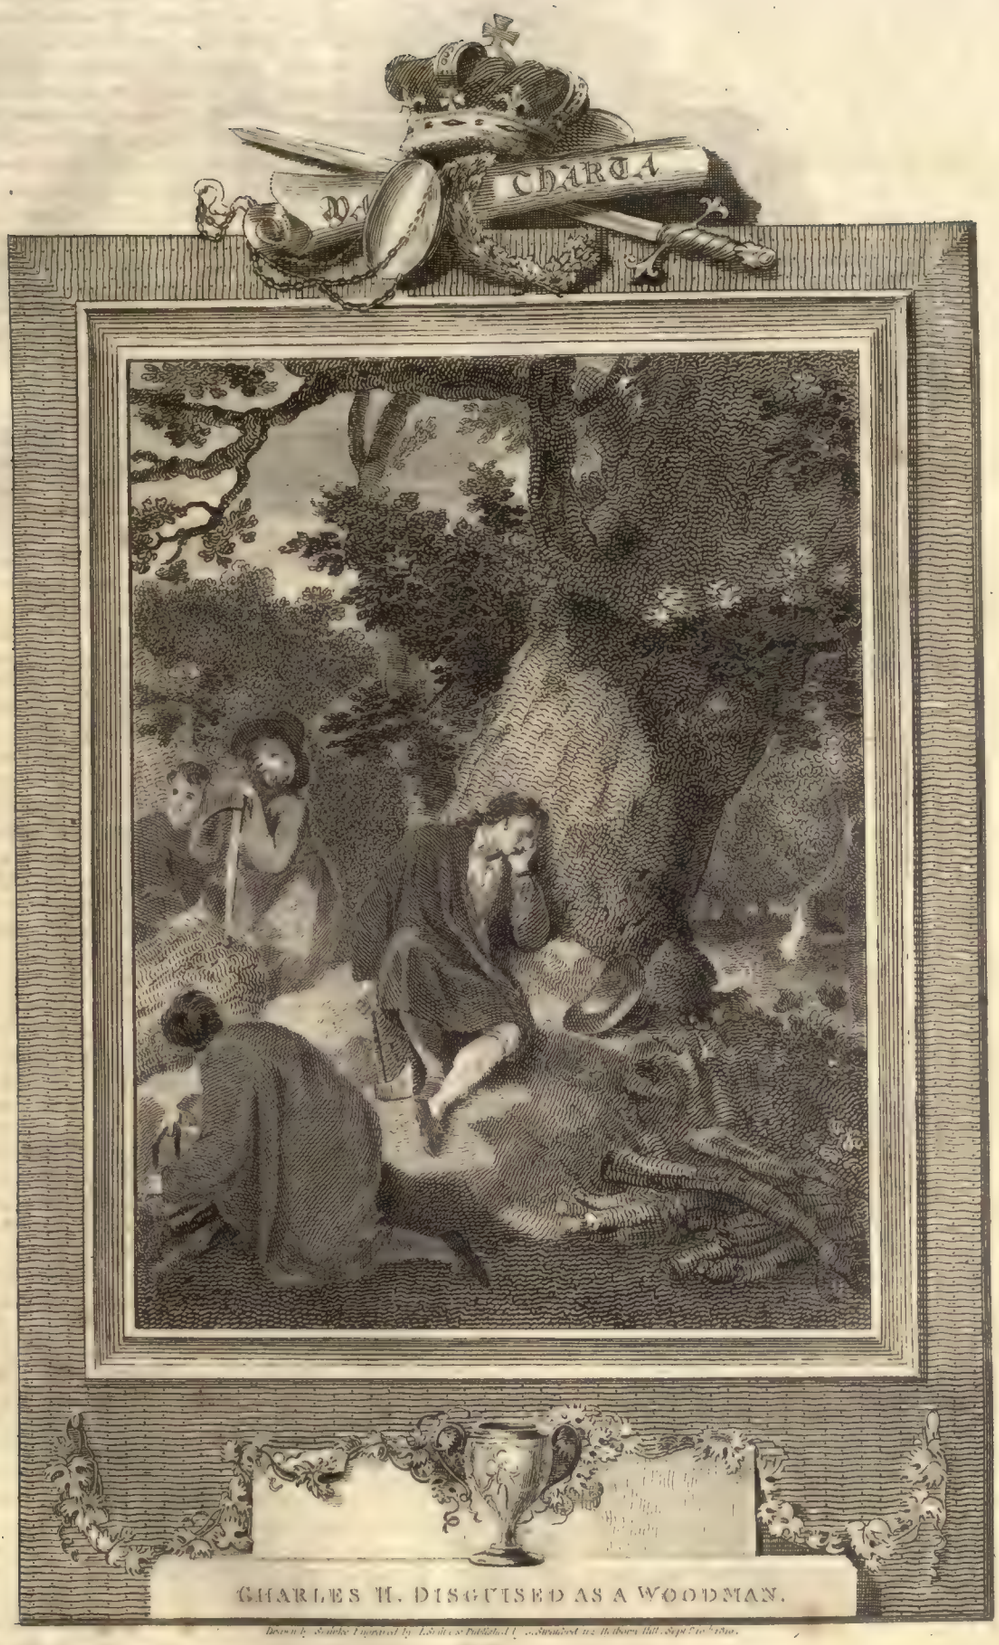
Charles, reduced to despair, embraced the resolution of marching into England; where he expected that all his friends, and all those who were discontented with the present government, would flock to his standard. He persuaded the generals to enter into the same views; and with one consent the army, to the number of fifteen thousand foot, and three thousand horse, broke up their camp, and advanced towards the south.

Cromwell was surprized at this movement of the royal army. Wholly intent on offending his enemy, he had exposed his friends to imminent danger, and saw the king with numerous forces marching into England; where his presence, from the general hatred which prevailed against the parliament, was capable of producing some great revolution. But if this conduct was an oversight in Cromwell, he quickly repaired it by his vigilance and activity. He dispatched letters to the parliament, exhorting them not to be dismayed at the approach of the Scots: he sent orders every where for assembling forces to oppose the king: he ordered Lambert with a body of cavalry to hang upon the rear of the royal army, and infest their march: and he himself, leaving Monk with five thousand men to complete the reduction of Scotland, followed the king with all the expedition possible.

Charles found himself disappointed in his expectations of increasing his army. The Scots, terrified at the prospect of so hazardous an enterprize, fell off in great numbers. The English Presbyterians, having no warning given them of the king's approach, were not prepared to join him. To the royalists, this measure was equally unexpected; and they were farther deterred from joining the Scottish army, by the orders which the committee of ministers had issued, not to admit any, even in this desperate extremity, who would not subscribe the covenant. The earl of Derby, leaving the Isle of Man, where he had hitherto maintained his independence, was employed in levying forces in Cheshire and Lancashire; but was soon suppressed by a party of the parliamentary army. And the king, when he arrived at Worcester, where he was honourably received by the magistrates, and solemnly proclaimed, found that his forces, extremely harassed by a hasty and fatiguing march, were not more numerous than when he rose from his camp at Torwood.

The parliament raised the militia of the counties; and these, united with the regular forces, bent all their efforts against the king. With an army of about thirty thousand men, Cromwell fell upon Worcester on the 3rd of September; and attacking it on all sides, and meeting with little resistance, except from duke Hamilton and general Middleton, broke in upon the disordered royalists. The streets of the city were strewed with dead. Hamilton, a nobleman of bravery and honour, was mortally wounded; Massey wounded and taken prisoner; the king himself, having given many proofs of personal valour, was obliged to fly. The whole Scottish army was either killed or taken prisoners. The country people, inflamed with national antipathy, put to death the few that escaped from the field of battle.

The king left Worcester at six o'clock in the afternoon, and, without halting, travelled about twenty-six miles, in company with fifty or sixty of his friends. To provide for his safety, he thought it best to separate himself from his companions; and he left them without communicating his intentions to any of them. By the earl of Derby's directions, he went to Boscobel, a lone house in the borders of Staffordshire, inhabited by one Penderell, a farmer. To this man Charles entrusted himself; and though death was denounced against all who concealed the king, and a great reward promised to any one who should betray him, he professed and maintained unshaken fidelity. He took the assistance of his four brothers, equally faithful with himself; and having clothed the king in a garb like their own, they led him into the neighbouring wood, put a bill into his hand, and pretended to employ themselves in cutting faggots. Some nights he lay upon straw in the house, and fed on such homely fare as it afforded. For a better concealment, he mounted upon an oak, where he sheltered himself among the leaves and branches for twenty-four hours. He saw several soldiers pass by. All of them were intent in search of the king; and some expressed, in his hearing, their earnest wishes of seizing him. The tree was afterwards denominated the Royal Oak; and for many years was regarded by the neighbourhood with great veneration.



Charles was in the middle of the kingdom, and could neither stay in his retreat, nor stir a step from it, without the most imminent danger. Fear, hopes, and party zeal, interested multitudes to discover him; and even the smallest indiscretion of his friends might prove fatal. Having joined lord Wilmot, who was skulking in the neighbourhood, they agreed to put themselves into the hands of colonel Lane, a zealous royalist, who lived at Bentley, not many miles distant. The king's feet were so hurt by walking about in heavy boots or countrymen's shoes which did not fit him, that he was obliged to mount on horseback; and he travelled in this situation to Bentley, attended by the Penderells, who had been so faithful to him. Lane formed a scheme for his journey to Bristol, where, it was hoped, he would find a ship, in which he might transport himself. He had a near kinswoman, Mrs. Norton, who lived within three miles of that city, and was with child, very near the time of her delivery. He obtained a pass (for, during those times of confusion, this precaution was requisite,) for his sister Jane Lane and a servant, to travel towards Bristol, under pretence of visiting and attending her relation. The king rode before the lady, and personated the servant.

When they arrived at Norton's, Mrs. Lane pretended that she had brought along as her servant a poor lad, a neighbouring farmer's son, who was ill of an ague; and she begged a private room for him, where he might be quiet. Though Charles kept himself retired in this chamber, the butler, one Pope, soon knew him: the king was alarmed, but made the butler promise that he would keep the secret from every mortal, even from his master; and he was faithful to his engagement.

No ship, it was found, would, for a month, set sail from Bristol, either for France or Spain; and the king was obliged to go elsewhere for a passage. He entrusted himself to colonel Windham of Dorsetshire, an affectionate partizan of the royal family. The royalists had, many of them, been obliged to make concealments in their houses for themselves, their friends, or more valuable effects; and the arts of eluding the enemy had been frequently practised. All these circumstances proved favourable to the king in the present exigency. As he often passed through the hands of Catholics, the Priest's Hole, as they called it, the place where they were obliged to conceal their persecuted priests, was sometimes employed for sheltering the distressed Charles.

Colonel Windham, before he received the king, asked leave to entrust the important secret to his mother, his wife, and four servants, on whose fidelity he could rely. Of all these, no one proved wanting either in honour or discretion. The venerable old matron, on the reception of her royal guest, expressed the utmost joy, that having lost, without regret, three sons and one grandchild in the defence of his father, she was now reserved, in her declining years, to be instrumental in the preservation of himself. Windham told the king, that sir Thomas, his father, in the year 1636, a few days before his death, called to him his five sons. "My children," said he, "we have hitherto seen serene and quiet times under our three last sovereigns: but I must now warn you to prepare for clouds and storms. Factions arise on every side, and threaten the tranquillity of your native country. But whatever happen, do you faithfully honour and obey your prince, and adhere to the crown. I charge you never to forsake the crown, though it should hang upon a bush." "These last words," added Windham, "made such impressions on all our breasts, that the many afflictions of these sad times could never efface their indelible characters."

The king continued several days in Windham's house; while while all his friends in Britain, and in every part of Europe, remained in the most anxious suspence with regard to his welfare: no one could conjecture whether he were dead or alive; and the report of his death being generally believed, relaxed the vigilant search of his enemies. Trials were made to procure a vessel for his escape; but he still met with disappointments. Having left Windham's house, he was obliged again to return to it. He passed through many other adventures; assumed different disguises; in every step was exposed to imminent perils; and received daily proofs of fidelity and attachment from several individuals. The sagacity of a smith, who remarked that his horse's shoes had been made in the north, not in the west, as he pretended, once detected him; and he narrowly escaped. At Shoreham in Sussex a vessel was at last found, in which he embarked. He had been known to so many, that if he had not set sail in that critical moment, it had been impossible for him to escape. After one and forty days concealment, he arrived safely at Fescamp in Normandy, on the 22nd of October. No less than forty men and women had at different times been privy to his concealment and escape.

For the trial of offences, the parliament erected a high court of justice, which was to receive indictments from the council of state. Colonel Eusebius Andrews, and colonel Walter Slingby, were tried by this court for conspiracies, and condemned to death. Love, Gibbons, and other Presbyterians, having entered into a plot against the republic, were also tried, condemned, and executed. The earl of Derby, sir Timothy Featherstone, Bemboe, being taken prisoners at the battle of Worcester, were put to death by sentence of a court-martial.

In their principles of toleration also, by which the republicans regulated ecclesiastical affairs they prognosticated a durable settlement. The Presbyterian model of congregation, classes, assemblies, was not yet completed; and it seemed to be the intention of some of the leaders in the parliament not to admit of any established church, and to leave every one, without any guidance of the magistrate, to embrace whatever sect, and to support whatever clergy, were most agreeable to his own conviction. This they considered as the natural right of man, and therefore could not conceive that they had any right to lay restraint upon their consciences.

The victory of Worcester, and the successes in Scotland, gave such a reputation to the new republic, that every state in Europe either courted its friendship, or dreaded its power. For this reason, most of the sovereigns excused themselves from making offers to the king, or supplying him with money, for fear of being suspected by the parliament; so that the king saw himself reduced to great extremities, and even to a want of common necessaries. He lived at Paris, maintained by his mother, who had a pension from the crown; but cardinal Mazarin, making his court to the parliament of England, took no notice of the distress of her unfortunate son.

On the other hand, Cromwell's glory and credit were so increased, since the battles of Dunbar and Worcester, that, as he was master of the armies of the three kingdoms, he was, in effect, master of the resolutions of the parliament, no man daring openly to oppose him. He had, besides, in the house, a great number of creatures, that it was easy for him to procure what resolutions he pleased; so that it may be truly said, he was the head of the commonwealth, whilst he had only the title of general.

This commonwealth was very powerful from its commencement. This appears rather strange at first, considering the great sums that were expended, and the blood that was shed, during the civil war. But it is to be considered, with regard to the expence, that the money had not been carried out of the kingdom. The only alteration was, that the rich were become poor, and the poor rich; which had not sunk the capital of the kingdom. And, as to the number of men killed in the war, it must also be considered, that England swarmed with people in the year 1642, having had no wars since the death of Elizabeth; so that the effusion of blood had not diminished the number of the inhabitants, so as to weaken the kingdom in any material degree. This is evident from the easiness wherewith, in the space of one year, the parliament raised an army for Ireland, and another more considerable for Scotland, besides the forces remaining in England. The navy, having had no enemies to engage during the war, was in a flourishing condition. In a word, England was not less powerful than under Elizabeth, or than it might have been under James the First and Charles the First, had those princes thought proper to engage in foreign wars. Nothing therefore was altered but the form of government; and that was in the hands of the most able men England had for a long time produced. In this respect England found itself in a very different state from what it was under the two foregoing kings, whose capacities to govern cannot be greatly commended by the impartial. Indeed the power of England had never, in any period, appeared so formidable to the neighbouring kingdoms as it did at this time, in the hands of the commonwealth. A numerous army served equally to retain every one in implicit subjection to established authority, and to strike a terror into the nations on the continent. The power of peace and war was lodged in the same hands with that of imposing taxes; and no difference of views, among the several members of the legislature, could any longer be apprehended. The present impositions, though superior to what had ever formerly been experienced, were in reality moderate, and what a nation so opulent could easily bear. The military genius of the people had, by the civil contests, been roused from its former lethargy; and excellent officers were formed in every branch of service. The confusion, into which all things had been thrown, had given opportunity to men of low stations to break through their obscurity, and to raise themselves by their courage to commands which they were well qualified to exercise. And while so great a power was lodged in such active hands, no wonder the republic was successful in all its enterprizes.

Blake, a man of great courage and a generous disposition, the same person who had defended Lyme and Taunton with such unshaken obstinacy against the late king, was made an admiral; and though he had hitherto been accustomed only to land service, into which too he had not entered till after fifty years of age, he soon raised the naval glory of the nation to a greater height than it had ever attained in any former period. A fleet was put under his command, and he received orders to pursue prince Rupert, to whom the king had entrusted that squadron which had deserted to him. Rupert took shelter in Kinsale in Ireland; and escaping thence, fled towards the coast of Portugal. Blake pursued and chased him into the Tagus, where he intended to make an attack upon him. But the king of Portugal, moved by favour to the royal cause, refused Blake admittance, and aided prince Rupert in making his escape. To be revenged of this partiality, the English admiral made prize of twenty Portuguese ships richly laden; and threatened still farther vengeance. The king of Portugal, dreading so dangerous a foe to his newly acquired dominion, and sensible of the unequal contest in which he was engaged, made all possible submissions to the republic, and was at last admitted to negociate the renewal of his alliance with England. Prince Rupert, having lost a great part of his squadron on the coast of Spain, made sail towards the West Indies. His brother, prince Maurice, was there shipwrecked in a hurricane. Every where this squadron subsisted by privateering, sometimes on English, sometimes on Spanish vessels. And Rupert at last returned to France, where he disposed of the remnant of his fleet, together with his prizes.

All the settlements in America, except New England, which had been planted entirely by the Puritans, adhered to the royal party, even after the settlement of the republic; and sir George Ayscue was sent with a squadron to reduce them. Bermudas, Antigua, Virginia, were soon subdued. Barbadoes, commanded by lord Willoughby of Parham, made some resistance; but was at last obliged to submit.

With equal ease were Jersey, Guernsey, Scilly, and the Isle of Man, brought under subjection to the republic; and the sea, which had been much infested by privateers from these islands, was rendered safe to the English commerce. The countess of Derby defended the Isle of Man; and with great reluctance yielded to the necessity of surrendering to the parliament. This lady, a daughter of the illustrious house of Tremoille in France, had during the civil war, displayed a manly courage by her obstinate defence of Latham House against the parliamentary forces; and she retained the glory of being the last person in the three kingdoms, and in all their dependent dominions, who submitted to the victorious commonwealth.

Ireland and Scotland were now entirely subjected and reduced to tranquillity. Ireton, the new deputy of Ireland, land, at the head of a numerous army, thirty thousand strong, prosecuted the work of subduing the revolted Irish; and he defeated them in many rencounters, which, though of themselves of no great moment, proved fatal to their declining cause. He punished without mercy all the prisoners who had any hand in the cruel massacres practised in the reign of Charles the First against the Protestants. Sir Phelim O'Neale, among the rest, was, some time after, brought to the gibbet, and suffered an ignominious death, which he had so well merited by his inhuman cruelties. Limeric, a considerable town, still remained in the hands of the Irish; and Ireton, after a vigorous siege, made himself master of it. He was here infected with the plague, and shortly after died (m).

The command of the army in Ireland devolved on lieutenant-general Ludlow. The civil government of the island was entrusted to commissioners. Ludlow continued to push the advantages against the Irish, and every where obtained an easy victory. That unhappy people, disgusted with the king on account of those violent declarations against them and their religion, which he had published at the instigation of the Scots, applied to the king of Spain, and the duke of Lorraine, but found no one willing to give assistance. Clanricarde, unable to resist the prevailing power, made submissions to the parliament, and retired into England, where he soon after died. He was a steady Catholic; but a man much respected by all parties.

The successes which attended Monk in Scotland were no less decisive. That able general laid siege to Stirling Castle; and though it was well provided for defence, it was soon surrendered to him. He there became master of all the records of the kingdom; and he sent them to England. The earl of Leven, the earl of Crawford, lord Ogilvy, and other noblemen, having met near Perth, in order to concert measures for raising a new army, were suddenly set upon by colonel Alured, and most of them taken prisoners. Sir Philip Musgrave, with some Scots, being engaged at Dumfries in a like enterprize, met with a similar fate. Dundee was a town well fortified, supplied with a good garrison under Lumsden, and full of all the rich furniture, the plate, and money of the kingdom, which had been sent thither as to a place of safety. Monk appeared before it; and having made a breach, gave a general assault. He carried the town; and following the example and instructions of Cromwell, put all the inhabitants to the sword, in order to strike a general terror into the kingdom. Warned by this example, Aberdeen, St. Andrew's, Inverness, and other towns and forts, yielded, of their own accord, to the enemy. Argyle made his submissions to the English commonwealth; and excepting a few royalists, who remained some time in the mountains, under the earl of Glencairn, lord Balcarras, and general Middleton, that kingdom was reduced to total subjection.

The English parliament sent sir Harry Vane, St. John, and other commissioners, to settle affairs in Scotland. These men required the voluntary consent of all the counties and towns of this conquered kingdom, before they would unite them into the same commonwealth with England. The clergy protested; because, they said, this incorporating union would draw along with it a subordination of the church to the state in the things of Christ. English judges, joined to some Scottish, were appointed to determine all causes; justice was strictly administered; order and peace maintained; and the Scots, freed from the tyranny of the ecclesiastics, were not much dissatisfied with the present government. The prudent conduct of Monk, a man who possessed a capacity for the arts both of peace and war, served much to reconcile the minds of men, and to allay their prejudices.

By the total reduction and pacification of the British dominions, the parliament had leisure to look abroad, and to exert their vigour in foreign enterprizes. The Dutch were the first that felt the weight of their arms.

During the life of Frederic Henry, prince of Orange, the Dutch republic had maintained a neutrality in the civil wars of England, and had never interposed, except by her good offices, between the contending parties. When William, who had married an English princess, succeeded to his father's commands and authority, the States, both before and after the execution of the late king, were accused of taking steps more favourable to the royal cause, and of betraying a great prejudice against that of the parliament. It was long before the envoy of the English commonwealth could obtain an audience of the states-general. The murderers of Dorislaus were not pursued with such rigour as the parliament expected. And much regard had been paid to the king, and many good offices performed to him, both by the public, and by men of all ranks in the United Provinces.

After the death of William, prince of Orange, which took place on the 17th of October, 1650, and which was attended with the depression of his party and the triumph of the Dutch republicans, the parliament thought that the time was now favourable for cementing a closer confederacy with the States. St. John, chief justice, who was sent over to the Hague, had entertained the idea of forming a kind of coalition between two republics, which would have rendered their interests totally inseparable; but fearing that so extraordinary a project would not be relished, he contented himself with dropping some hints of it, and openly went no farther than to propose a strict defensive alliance between England and the United Provinces. But the States offered only to renew the former alliances with England. And St. John, disgusted with this disappointment, as well as incensed at many affronts, which had been offered him with impunity, by the retainers of the Palatine and Orange families, and indeed by the populace in general, returned into England, and endeavoured to foment a quarrel between the republics.

Though war with so considerable a naval power as the Dutch, who were in peace with all their other neighbours, might seem dangerous to the new commonwealth, there were several motives which at this time induced the English parliament to embrace hostile measures. Among the principal, to divert the attention of the public from domestic quarrels towards foreign transactions, seemed, in the present disposition of men's minds, to be good policy. The superior power of the English commonwealth, together with its advantages of situation, promised success; and the parliamentary leaders hoped to gain many rich prizes from the Dutch, to distress and sink their flourishing commerce, and by victories to throw a lustre on their own establishment. These views, enforced by the violent spirit of St. John, who had great influence over Cromwell, determined the parliament to change the purposed alliance into a furious war against the United Provinces.

To cover these hostile intentions, the parliament embraced such measures as they knew would give disgust to the States. They framed the famous act of navigation; which prohibited all nations from importing into England in their bottoms any commodity which was not the growth and manufacture of their own country. By this law, which was to commence the first of December, 1651, though the terms in which it was conceived were general, the Dutch were principally affected; because their country produces few commodities, and they subsist chiefly by being the general carriers and factors of Europe. Letters of reprisal were granted to several merchants, who complained of injuries, which, they pretended, they had received from the States; and above eighty Dutch ships fell into their hands, and were made prizes. The cruelties committed on the English at Amboyna, which were certainly enormous, but which seemed to be buried in oblivion by a thirty years' silence, were again made the ground of complaint. And the allowing the murderers of Dorislaus to escape, and the conniving at the insults to which St. John had been exposed, were represented as symptoms of an unfriendly, if not a hostile, disposition in the States.

The States, alarmed at these steps, sent orders to their ambassadors to endeavour the renewal of the treaty of alliance, which had been broken off by the abrupt departure of St. John. Not to be unprepared, they equipped a fleet of a hundred and fifty sail, and took care, by their ministers at London, to inform the council of state of that armament. This intelligence, instead of striking terror into the English republic, was considered as a menace, and farther confirmed the parliament in their hostile resolutions. The minds of men in both states were, every day, more irritated against each other; and it was not long before these humours broke forth into action.

(m) General Ireton was much celebrated for his vigilance, industry, capacity, and for the strict execution of justice in that unlimited command which he possessed in Ireland. He was observed to be inflexible in all his purposes; and he was animated with a sincere and passionate love of liberty, and never could have been induced by any motive to submit to the smallest appearance of regal government. Cromwell was much affected by his death; and the republicans, who reposed great confidence in him, were inconsolable. To shew their regard for his merit and services, they bestowed an estate of two thousand pounds a-year on his family, and honoured him with a magnificent funeral at the public charge.

Van Tromp, an admiral of great renown, received from the States the command of a fleet of forty-five sail, in order to protect the Dutch navigation against the privateers of the English. He was forced, by stress of weather, as he alledged, to take shelter in the road of Dover, where he met with Blake, who commanded an English fleet consisting of twenty-six ships only. Who was the aggressor in the action, which ensued between these two admirals, both of them men of such prompt and fiery dispositions, it is not easy to determine; since each of them sent to his own state a relation totally opposite in all its circumstances to that of the other, and yet supported by the testimony of every captain in his fleet. Blake pretended that, having given a signal to the Dutch admiral to strike, Van Tromp, instead of complying, fired a broadside at him. Tromp asserted that he was preparing to strike, and that the English admiral, nevertheless, began hostilities. It is certain that the admiralty of Holland, who are distinct from the council of state, had given Tromp no orders to strike, but had left him to his own discretion with regard to that vain but much contested ceremonial. They seemed willing to introduce the claim of an equality with the new commonwealth, and to interpret the former respect paid the English flag, as a deference due only to the monarchy. This circumstance forms a strong presumption against the narrative of the Dutch admiral. The whole Orange party, it must be remarked, to which Tromp was suspected to adhere, were desirous of a war with England.

Blake maintained the fight with bravery for five hours, and sunk one ship of the enemy, and took another. Night parted the combatants, and the Dutch fleet retired towards the coast of Holland. The populace of London were enraged, and would have insulted the Dutch ambassadors, who lived at Chelsea, had not the council of state sent guards to protect them.

When the States heard of this action, of which the consequences were easily foreseen, they were in the utmost consternation. On the 30th of April, 1652, they dispatched Paw, pensionary of Holland, as their ambassador extraordinary to London, and ordered him to lay before the parliament the narrative which Tromp had sent of the late rencounter. They entreated them, by all the bands of their common religion and common liberties, not to precipitate themselves into hostile measures, but to appoint commissioners, who should examine every circumstance of the action, and clear up the truth, which lay in obscurity. And they pretended that they had given no orders to their admiral to offer any violence to the English, but would severely punish him, if they found, upon inquiry, that he had been guilty of an action which they so much disapproved. The parliament, however, would not hearken to any of these reasons or remonstrances. Elated by the numerous successes which they had obtained over their domestic enemies, they thought that every thing must yield to their fortunate arms; and they gladly seized the opportunity, which they sought, of making war upon the States. They demanded that, without any farther delay or inquiry, reparation should be made for all the damages which the English had sustained. And when this demand was not complied with, they dispatched orders for commencing war against the United Provinces.

Blake sailed northwards with a numerous fleet, and fell upon the herring busses, which were escorted by twelve men of war. All these he either took or dispersed. Tromp followed him with a fleet of above a hundred sail. When these two admirals were within sight of each other, and preparing for battle, a furious storm attacked them. Blake took shelter in the English harbours. The Dutch fleet was dispersed, and received great damage.

Sir George Ayscue, though he commanded only forty ships, according to the English accounts, engaged on the 16th of August, near Plymouth, the famous de Ruiter, who had under him fifty ships of war, with thirty merchantmen. The Dutch ships were indeed of inferior force to the English. De Ruiter, the only admiral in Europe who has attained a renown equal to that of the greatest general, defended himself so well, that Ayscue gained no advantage over him. Night parted them in the greatest heat of the action. De Ruiter next day sailed off with his convoy. The English fleet had been so shattered in the fight, that it was not able to pursue.

Near the coast of Kent, on the 28th of October, Blake, seconded by Bourne and Pen, met a Dutch squadron, nearly equal in numbers, commanded by de Witte and de Ruiter. A battle was fought much to the disadvantage of the Dutch. Their rear-admiral was boarded and taken. Two other vessels were sunk, and one blown up. The Dutch next day made sail towards Holland.

The English were not so successful in the Mediterranean. Van Galen, with a much superior force, attacked captain Badily, and defeated him. He bought, however, his victory with the loss of his life.

Sea fights are seldom so decisive as to disable the vanquished from making head in a little time against the victors. Van Tromp, seconded by de Ruiter, met, near the Goodwin Sands, on the 29th of November, with Blake, whose fleet was inferior to the Dutch, but who resolved not to decline the combat. A furious battle commenced, where the admirals on both sides, as well as the inferior officers and seamen, exerted great bravery. In this action the Dutch had the advantage. Blake himself was wounded. The Garland and Bonaventure were taken. Two ships were burned, and one sunk; and night came opportunely to save the English fleet. After this victory, Tromp, in a bravado, fixed a broom to his main-mast; as if he were resolved to sweep the sea entirely of all English vessels.

Great preparations were made in England, in order to wipe off this disgrace. A fleet of eighty sail was fitted out. Blake commanded, and Dean under him, together with Monk, who had been sent for from Scotland. When the English lay off Portland, they descried, near break of day, on the 18th of February, 1653, a Dutch fleet of seventy-six vessels, sailing up the channel, with a convoy of three hundred merchantmen, who had received orders to wait at the isle of Rhé, till the fleet should arrive to escort them. Van Tromp, and, under him, de Ruiter, commanded the Dutch. This battle was the most furious that had yet been fought between these warlike and rival nations. Three days was the combat continued with the utmost rage and obstinacy; and Blake, who was victor, gained not more honour than Van Tromp, who was vanquished. The Dutch admiral made a skilful retreat, and saved all the merchant ships, except thirty. He lost, however, eleven ships of war, had two thousand men slain, and near fifteen hundred taken prisoners. The English, though many of their ships were extremely shattered, had but one sunk. Their slain were not much inferior in number to those of the enemy.

These successes of the English were chiefly owing to the superior size of their vessels; an advantage which all the skill and bravery of the Dutch admirals could not compensate. By means of ship-money, an imposition which had been so much complained of, and in some respects with reason, the late king had put the navy into a situation which it had never attained in any former reign; and he ventured to build ships of a size which was then unusual. But the misfortunes which the Dutch met with in battle, were small in comparison of those which their trade sustained from the English. Their whole commerce by the channel was cut off: even that to the Baltic was much infested by English privateers. Their fisheries were totally suspended. A great number of their ships, above sixteen hundred, had fallen into the hands of the English. And all this distress they suffered, not for any national interests or necessity; but from vain points of honour and personal resentments, of which it was difficult to give a satisfactory account to the public. They resolved, therefore, to gratify the pride of the parliament, and to make some advances towards peace. They met not, however, with a favourable reception; and it was not without pleasure that they learned the dissolution of that haughty assembly by the violence of Cromwell; an event from which they expected a more prosperous turn to their affairs.

The zealous republicans in the parliament had not been the chief or first promoters of the war; but when it was once entered upon, they endeavoured to draw from it every possible advantage. On all occasions they set up the fleet in opposition to the army, and celebrated the glory and successes of their naval armaments. They insisted on the intolerable expence to which the nation was subjected, and urged the necessity of diminishing it, by a reduction of the land forces. They had ordered some regiments to serve on board the fleet, in the quality of marines. And Cromwell, by the whole train of their proceedings, evidently perceived that they had entertained a jealousy of his power, and were resolved to bring him to a subordination under their authority. Without scruple or delay he resolved to prevent them.

On such firm foundations was built the credit of Cromwell, that he judged it superfluous to employ any disguise in conducting this bold enterprize. He therefore summoned a general council of officers; and immediately found that they were disposed to receive whatever impressions he was pleased to give them. Most of them were his creatures, had owed their advancement to his favour, and relied entirely upon him for their future preferment. The breach being already made between the military and civil powers, when the late king was seized at Holdenby; the general officers regarded the parliament as at once their creature and their rival; and thought that they themselves were entitled to share among them those offices and riches, of which its members had so long kept possession. Harrison, Rich, Overton, and a few others, were guided by notions so extravagant, that they were easily deluded into measures the most violent. And the whole army, which had kept the nation in subjection, could entertain no scruple with regard to any enterprize which might serve their purposes.

In the council of officers it was presently voted to frame a remonstrance to the parliament. After complaining of the arrears due to the army, they there desired the parliament to reflect how many years they had sitten, and what professions they had formerly made of their intentions to new-model the representative, and establish successive parliaments, who might bear the burthen of national affairs, from which they themselves would gladly, after so much danger and fatigue, be at last relieved. They confessed that the parliament had atchieved great enterprizes, and had surmounted mighty difficulties; yet was it an injury, they said, to the rest of the nation to be excluded from bearing any part in the service of their country. It was now full time for them to give place to others; and they therefore desired them, after settling a council, who might execute the laws during the interval, to summon a new parliament, and establish that free and equal government, which they had so long promised to the people.

The parliament took this remonstrance in ill part, and made a sharp reply to the council of officers. The officers insisted on their advice; and by mutual altercation and opposition the breach became still wider between the army and the commonwealth. Cromwell, finding matters ripe for his purpose, called a council of officers, on the 10th of April, in order to come to a determination with regard to the public settlement. As he had here many friends, so had he also some opponents. Harrison having assured the council that the general sought only to pave the way for the government of Jesus and his saints, major Streater briskly replied, that Jesus ought then to come quickly: for if he delayed it till after Christmas, he would come too late; he would find his place occupied. While the officers were in debate, colonel Ingoldsby informed Cromwell, that that parliament was sitting, and had come to a resolution not to dissolve themselves, but to fill up the house by new elections; and was at that very time engaged in deliberations with regard to this expedient. Cromwell, in a rage, immediately hastened to the house, and carried a body of three hundred soldiers along with him. Some of them he placed at the door, some in the lobby, some on the stairs. He first addressed himself to his friend St. John, and told him that he had come with a purpose of doing what grieved him to the very soul, and what he had earnestly with tears besought the Lord not to impose upon him: but there was a necessity, in order to the glory of God and good of the nation. He sat down for some time, and heard the debate. He beckoned Harrison, and told him that he now judged the parliament ripe for a dissolution. "Sir," said Harrison, "the work is very great and dangerous: I desire you seriously to consider, before you engage in it." "You say well," replied the general; and thereupon sat still about a quarter of an hour. When the question was ready to be put, he said again to Harrison, "This is the time: I must do it." And suddenly starting up, he loaded the parliament with the vilest reproaches, for their tyranny, ambition, oppression, and robbery of the public. Then stamping with his foot, which was a signal for the soldiers to enter, "For shame," said he to the parliament, "get you gone; give place to honester men; to those who will more faithfully discharge their trust. You are no longer a parliament: I tell you, you are no longer a parliament. The Lord has done with you: he has chosen other instruments for carrying on his work." Sir Harry Vane exclaiming against this proceeding, he cried with a loud voice, "O! sir Harry Vane, sir Harry Vane! The Lord deliver me from sir Harry Vane!" Taking hold of Martin by the cloak, "Thou art a whore-master," said he. To another, "Thou art an adulterer." To a third, "Thou art a drunkard and a glutton:" "And thou an extortioner," to a fourth. He commanded a soldier to seize the mace. "What shall we do with this bauble? Here take it away. It is you," said he, addressing himself to the house, "that have forced me upon this. I have sought the Lord night and day, that he would rather slay me than put me upon this work." Having commanded the soldiers to clear the hall, he himself went out the last, and ordering the doors to be locked, departed to his lodgings in Whitehall.

In this manner did Cromwell, without the least opposition, annihilate that famous assembly, which had filled all Europe with the renown of its actions, and with astonishment at its crimes, and whose commencement was not more ardently desired by the people than was its final dissolution. All parties now reaped successively the melancholy pleasure of seeing the injuries which they had suffered, revenged on their enemies; and that too by the same arts which had been practised against them. The king had, in many instances, stretched his prerogative beyond its just bounds; and, aided by the church, had well nigh put an end to all the liberties and privileges of the nation. The Presbyterians checked the progress of the court and clergy, and excited the populace, first to tumults, then to war, against the king, the peers, and the royalists. No sooner had they reached the pinnacle of grandeur, than the Independents instigated the army against them, and reduced them to subjection.

Congratulatory addresses were now made to Cromwell by the fleet, by the army, and by many of the chief corporations and counties of England; but especially by the several congregations of Independents, which were dispersed throughout the kingdom (n). The royalists, though they could not love the man who had been instrumental in the death of their sovereign, expected more lenity from him, than from the jealous and imperious republicans, who had hitherto governed. The Presbyterians were pleased to see those men, by whom they had been outwitted and expelled, now in their turn expelled and outwitted by their own servant; and they applauded him for this last act of violence upon the parliament. These two parties composed the bulk of the nation, and kept the people in some tolerable temper. All men likewise, harassed with wars and factions, were glad to see any prospect of settlement. And they deemed it less ignominious to submit to a person of such admirable talents and capacity than to a few ignoble enthusiastics, who, under the name of a republic, had reduced them to subjection.

The republicans, being dethroned by Cromwell, were the party whose resentment he had the greatest reason to apprehend. That party, besides the Independents, contained two sets of men, who are seemingly of the most opposite principles, but who were then united by a similitude of genius and of character. The first and most numerous were the millenarians, or fifth monarchy men, who insisted, that, dominion being founded in grace, all distinction in magistracy must be abolished, except what arose from piety and holiness; who expected suddenly the second coming of Christ upon earth; and who pretended, that the saints in the mean while, that is, themselves, were alone entitled to govern. The second were the deists, who had no other object than political liberty, who denied entirely the truth of revelation, and insinuated, that all the various sects, so heated against each other, were alike founded in folly and in error. Men of such daring geniuses were not contented with the ancient and legal forms of civil government; but challenged a degree of freedom beyond what they expected ever to enjoy under any monarchy. Martin, Challoner, Harrington, Sidney, Wildman, Nevil, were esteemed the heads of this small division.

The deists were perfectly hated by Cromwell, because he had no hold of enthusiasm, by which he could govern or over-reach them; he therefore treated them with rigour and disdain, and usually denominated them the heathens. As the millenarians had a great interest in the army, it was much more important for him to gain their confidence. Of late years it had been so usual a topic of conversation to discourse of parliaments and councils and senates, and the the soldiers themselves had been so much accustomed to enter into that spirit, that Cromwell thought it requisite to establish something which might bear the face of a commonwealth. He supposed that God, in his providence, had thrown the whole right, as well as power, of government into his hands; and without any more ceremony, by the advice of his council of officers, he sent summons to a hundred and twenty-eight persons of different towns and counties of England, to five of Scotland, to six of Ireland. He pretended, by his sole act and deed, to devolve upon these the whole authority of the state. This legislative power they were to exercise during fifteen months, and they were afterwards to choose the same number of persons, who might succeed them in that high and important office.

There were great numbers at that time, who made it a principle always to adhere to any power which was uppermost, and to support the established government. This maxim is not peculiar to the people of that age; but what may be esteemed peculiar to them, is, that there prevailed a hypocritical phrase for expressing so prudential a conduct: it was called a waiting upon providence. They therefore, on the 4th of July, 1653, being assembled at Whitehall, immediately voted themselves a parliament; and having their own consent, as well as that of Oliver Cromwell, for their legislative authority, they now proceeded very gravely to the exercise of it.

In this notable assembly were some persons of the rank of gentlemen; but the greater part were low mechanics; fifth-monarchy men, anabaptists, antinomians, independents. They began with seeking God by prayer: this office was performed by eight or ten gifted men of the assembly; and with so much success, that, according to the confession of all, they had never before, in any of their devotional exercises, enjoyed so much of the Holy Spirit as was then communicated to them. Their hearts were, no doubt, dilated when they considered the high dignity, to which they supposed themselves exalted. They had been told by Cromwell, in his first discourse, that he never looked to see such a day, when Christ should be so owned (o). They thought it, therefore, their duty to proceed to a thorough reformation, and to pave the way for the reign of the Redeemer, and for that great work which, it was expected, the Lord was to bring forth among them. All fanatics, being consecrated by their own fond imaginations, naturally bear an antipathy to the ecclesiastics, who claim a peculiar sanctity, derived merely from their office and priestly character. This parliament took into consideration the abolition of the clerical function, as savouring of popery; and the taking away of tithes, which they called a relict of Judaism. Learning also and the universities were deemed heathenish and unnecessary: the common law was denominated a badge of the conquest and of Norman slavery; and they threatened the lawyers with a total abrogation of their profession. Some steps were even taken towards an abolition of the chancery, the highest court of judicature in the kingdom; and the Mosaical law was intended to be established as the sole system of English jurisprudence.

Of all the extraordinary schemes adopted by these legislators, they had not leisure to finish any, except that which established the legal solemnization of marriage by the civil magistrate alone, without the interposition of the clergy. They found themselves exposed to the derision of the public. Among the fanatics of the house, there was an active member, much noted for his long prayers, sermons, and harangues. He was a leather-seller in London: his name Praise-god Barebone. This curious name, which seems to have been chosen by some poet or allegorist to suit so ridiculous a personage, struck the fancy of the people; and they commonly affixed to this assembly the appellation of Barebone's parliament (p).

The Dutch ambassadors endeavoured to enter into negociations with this parliament; but, though Protestants and even Presbyterians, they met with a bad reception from those who pretended to a sanctity so much superior. The Hollanders were regarded as worldly-minded men, intent only on commerce and the accumulation of wealth; whom it was fitting the saints should first extirpate, ere they undertook that great work, to which they believed themselves destined by providence, of subduing Antichrist, the man of sin, and extending to the uttermost bounds of the earth the kingdom of the Redeemer. The ambassadors finding themselves proscribed, not as enemies of England, but of Christ, remained in astonishment, and knew not which was most to be admired, the implacable spirit or egregious folly of the fanatics they now had to deal with.

If ever Cromwell had any design in summoning so preposterous an assembly beyond amusing the populace and the army; he had intended to alarm the clergy and lawyers; and he had so far succeeded as to make them desire any other government, which might secure their professions, now brought in danger by these desperate enthusiasts. Cromwell himself was dissatisfied, that the parliament, though they had derived all their authority from him, began to pretend power from the Lord, and to insist already on their divine commission. He had been careful to summon in his writs several persons entirely devoted to him. By concert, these met early; and it was mentioned by some among them, that the sitting of this parliament any longer would be of no service to the nation. They hastened therefore, to Cromwell, along with Rouse, their speaker; and, by a formal deed or assignment, on the 12th of December, 1653, restored into his hands that supreme authority which they had so lately received from him. General Harrison and about twenty more remained in the house; and that they might prevent the reign of the saints from coming to an untimely end, they placed one Moyer in the chair, and began to draw up protests. They were soon interrupted by colonel White, with a party of soldiers. He asked them what they did there? "We are seeking the Lord," said they. "Then you may go elsewhere," replied he: "For to my certain knowledge, he has not been here these many years."

CHAP. V.

OLIVER CROMWELL CHOSEN PROTECTOR.

THE members of Barebone's parliament, who left their seats, and went to Cromwell and the council of officers, declared to them, "that they found themselves incapable of the trust reposed in them, and therefore resigned the instrument they had received," and besought them to take care of the government. Thus Cromwell and his officers were once more invested with the supreme power, by that parliament on which themselves had conferred their pretended authority. Two days after, the 14th of December, 1653, the council of officers, by virtue of the authority lately given them by parliament, declared, (o) These are his expressions. "Indeed, I have but one word more to say to you, though in that perhaps I shall show my weakness: it is by way of encouragement to you in this work; give me leave to begin thus: I confess I never looked to have seen such a day as this, it may be nor you neither, when Jesus Christ should be so owned as he is at this day and in this work. Jesus Christ is owned this day by your call, and you own him by your willingness to appear for him, and you manifest this (as far as poor creatures can do) to be a day of the power of Christ. I know you will remember that scripture, he makes his people willing in the day of his power. God manifests it to be the day of the power of Christ, having through so much blood and so much trial as has been upon this nation, he makes this one of the greatest mercies, next to his own Son, to have his people called to the supreme authority. God hath owned his Son, and hath owned you, and hath made you to own him. I confess, I never looked to have seen such a day: I did not:" The rest of the speech may be seen among Milton's State Papers, p. 106.

(p) It was usual for the enthusiasts at that time to change their names from Henry, Edward, Anthony, William, which they regarded as heathenish, into others more sanctified and godly: even the New Testament names, James, Andrew, John, Peter, were not held in such regard as those which were borrowed from the Old Testament, Hezekiah, Habbakuk, Joshua, Zerobabel. Sometimes a whole godly sentence was adopted as a name. Here are the names of a jury said to be enclosed in the county of Sussex about that time:

Accepted, Trevor of Norsham.	Return, Spelman of Watling.
Redeemed, Compton of Battle.	Be faithful, Joiner of Britling.
Faint not, Hewit of Heathfield.	Fly Debate, Roberts of the same.
Make peace, Heaton of Hare.	Fight the good Fight of Faith, White of Emer.
God Reward, Smart of Fivehurst.	More Fruit, Fowler of East Hadley.
Standfast on High, Stringer of Crowhurst.	Hope for, Bending of the same.
Earth, Adams of Warbleton.	Graceful, Harding of Lewes.
Called, Lower of the same.	Weep not, Billing of the same.
Kill Sin, Pimple of Witham.	Meek, Brewer of Okeham.

See Broome's Travels in England, p. 279. "Cromwell," says Cleveland, "hath beat up his drums clean through the Old Testament. You may learn the genealogy of our Saviour by the names of his regiment. The muster master hath no other list than the first chapter of St. Matthew." The brother of this Praise-god Barebone had for name, If Christ had not died for you, you had been damned Barebone. But the people, tired of this long name, retained only the last word, and commonly gave him the appellation of Damn'd Barebone.

that,

that, for the future, the government of the republic should reside in a single person, namely, Oliver Cromwell, captain-general of the forces of England, Scotland, and Ireland; who should have the title of Protector of the three kingdoms, and be assisted by a council of twenty-one persons (q).

Cromwell said, that he accepted the dignity of protector, merely that he might exert the duty of a constable, and preserve peace in the nation. Affairs indeed were brought to that pass, by the furious animosities of the several factions, that the extensive authority and even arbitrary power of some first magistrate was become a necessary evil, in order to keep the people from relapsing into blood and confusion. The Independents alone were too small a party to establish a popular government, or entrust the nation with the free choice of its representatives. The Presbyterians had adopted the violent maxims of persecutiou; incompatible at all times with the peace of society, much more with the wild zeal of those numerous sects which prevailed among the people. The royalists were so much enraged by the injuries which they had suffered, that the other prevailing parties would never submit to them, whom they knew, if they again got the power, would take severe vengeance upon them.

During the variety of ridiculous and distracted scenes, which the civil government exhibited in England, the military force was exerted with vigour, conduct, and unanimity; and never did the kingdom appear more formidable to all foreign nations. The English fleet, consisting of a hundred sail, and commanded by Monk and Dean, and under them by Pen and Lauson, met, near the coast of Flanders, with the Dutch fleet, equally numerous, and commanded by Van Tromp. The two republics were not inflamed by any national antipathy, and their interests very little interfered: yet few battles have been disputed with more fierce and obstinate courage than were those many naval combats, which were fought during this short, but violent, contest. The desire of remaining sole lords of the ocean animated these states to an honourable emulation against each other. After a battle of two days, in the first of which Dean was killed, the Dutch, inferior in the size of their ships, were obliged, with great loss, to retire into their harbours. Blake, towards the end of the fight, joined his countrymen with eighteen sail. The English fleet lay off the coast of Holland, and totally interrupted the commerce of that republic.

The ambassadors, whom the Dutch had sent over to England, gave them hopes of peace. But as they could obtain no cessation of hostilities, the States, unwilling to suffer any longer the loss and dishonour of being blockaded by the enemy, made the utmost efforts to recover their injured honour. Never on any occasion did the power and vigour of that republic appear in a more conspicuous light. In a few weeks, they had repaired and manned their fleet; and they equipped some ships of a larger size than any which they had hitherto sent to sea. Van Tromp issued out, determined again to fight the victors, and to die rather than to yield the contest. He met with the enemy, commanded by Monk; and both sides immediately rushed into the combat. Van Tromp, gallantly animating his men, with his sword drawn, was shot through the heart with a musquet ball, on the 29th of July, 1653. This event alone decided the battle in favour of the English. Though near thirty ships of the Dutch were sunk and taken, they little regarded this loss compared with that of their brave admiral.

The negociations for peace were in the mean time advancing. The States, overwhelmed with the expence of the war, terrified by their losses, and mortified by their defeats, were extremely desirous of an accommodation with an enemy whom they found, by experience, too powerful for them. Charles having shown an inclination to serve on board their fleet; though they expressed their sense of the honour intended them, they declined an offer, which might inflame the quarrel with the English commonwealth. The great obstacle to the peace was found not to be any animosity on the part of the English; but on the contrary a desire too earnest of union and confederacy. Cromwell had revived the chimerical scheme of a coalition with the United Provinces; a total conjunction of government, privileges, interest, and councils. This project appeared so wild to the States, that they wondered any man of sense could ever entertain it; and they refused to enter into conferences with regard to a proposal, which could serve only to delay any practicable scheme of accommodation; and peace was signed by Cromwell, now invested with the dignity of protector, on the 5th of April, 1654: it proves sufficiently, that the war had been impolitic, since, after the most signal victories, few advantageous terms could be obtained. A defensive league was made between the two republics. They agreed, each of them, to banish the enemies of the other; those who had been concerned in the massacre of Amboyna were to be punished, if any remained alive; the honour of the flag was yielded to the English; eighty-five thousand pounds were stipulated to be paid by the Dutch East India company for losses which the English company had sustained; and the island of Polerone in the East Indies was promised to be ceded to the latter.

Cromwell, jealous of the connexions between the royal family and that of Orange, insisted on a separate article; that neither the young prince nor any of his family should ever be invested with the dignity of stadtholder. The province of Holland, strongly prejudiced against that office, which they esteemed dangerous to liberty, secretly ratified this article. The protector, knowing that the other provinces would not be induced to make such a concession, was satisfied with this security.

The Dutch war being successful, and the peace reasonable, brought credit to Cromwell's administration. An act of justice, which he exercised at home, gave likewise satisfaction to the people; though the regularity of it may perhaps to some fastidious minds appear somewhat doubtful. Don Pantaleon Sa, knight of St. Malta, brother to the Portuguese ambassador, and joined with him in the same commission, fancying himself to be insulted, came upon the Exchange, armed and attended by several servants. By mistake, he fell on a gentleman, whom he took for the person that had given him the offence; and having butchered him with many wounds, he and all his attendants took shelter in the house of the Portuguese ambassador, who had connived at this base transaction. The populace surrounded the house, and threatened to set fire to it. Cromwell sent a guard, who seized all the criminals. They were brought to trial: and notwithstanding the opposition of the ambassador, who pleaded the privileges of (q) Without delay, the council of officers prepared what was called the instrument of government, containing the plan of legislature they meant to adopt. So little were these men endowed with the spirit of legislation, that they confessed, or rather boasted, that they had employed only four days in drawing this instrument, by which the whole government of three kingdoms was pretended to be regulated and adjusted to all succeeding generations. There appears no difficulty in believing them; when it is considered how crude a system of civil polity they endeavoured to establish. The chief articles of the instrument are these: A council was appointed, which was not to exceed twenty-one, nor be less than thirteen persons. These were to enjoy their office during life or good behaviour; and in case of a vacancy, the remaining members named three, of whom the protector chose one. The protector was appointed supreme magistrate of the commonwealth: in his name was all justice to be administered; from him were all magistracy and honours derived; he had the power of pardoning all crimes, excepting murder and treason; to him the benefit of all forfeitures devolved. The right of peace, war, and alliance rested in him; but in these particulars he was to act by the advice and with the consent of his council. The power of the sword was vested in the protector jointly with the parliament, while it was sitting, or with the council of state in the intervals. He was obliged to summon a parliament every three years, and allow them to sit five months, without adjourning, prorogation, or dissolution. The bills, which they passed, were to be presented to the protector for his assent; but if within twenty days it were not obtained, they were to become laws by the authority alone of parliament. A standing army for Great Britain and Ireland was established, of twenty thousand foot and ten thousand horse; and funds were assigned for their support. These were not to be diminished without consent of the protector; and in this article alone he assumed a negative. During the intervals of parliament, the protector and council had the power of enacting laws, which were to be valid till the next meeting of parliament. The chancellor, treasurer, admiral, chief governors of Ireland and Scotland, and the chief justices of both the benches, must be chosen with the approbation of parliament; and in the intervals, with the approbation of the council, to be afterwards ratified by parliament. The protector was to enjoy his office during life; and on his death, the place was immediately to be supplied by the council. This was the instrument of government enacted by the council of officers, and which Oliver Cromwell made a solemn oath to observe to the utmost of his power. Cromwell was then conducted to Whitehall with great ceremony, Lambert carrying the sword of state before him; and from that time the title of Highness and Lord Protector were given him. Immediately after he was proclaimed as such in London, and then in the three kingdoms, which formed but one commonwealth. The city of London invited him to a splendid entertainment, where the solemnity of his reception was such as had been at any time performed to the king. The council of state, named by the instrument, were fifteen; men entirely devoted to the protector, and by reason of the opposition among themselves in party and principles, not likely ever to combine against him.

his office, Don Pantaleon was executed on Tower Hill. The crime committed by the Portuguese gentleman was to the last degree atrocious, and ought to have been punished; and the vigorous chastisement of it, suiting so well the undaunted character of Cromwell, was universally approved of at home and admired among foreign nations. The situation of Portugal obliged that court to acquiesce; and the ambassador soon after signed with the protector a treaty of peace and alliance, which was very advantageous to the English commerce.

Another act of severity, but necessary in his situation, was, at the very same time, exercised by the protector, in the capital punishment of Gerard and Vowel, two royalists, who were accused of conspiring against his life. He had erected a high court of justice for their trial.

The protector had occasion to observe the prejudices entertained against his government, by the disposition of the parliament, which he summoned on the third of September, that day of the year on which he gained his two great victories of Dunbar and Worcester, and which he always regarded as fortunate for him. It must be confessed, that, if we are left to gather Cromwell's intentions from his instrument of government, it is such a motley piece, that we cannot easily conjecture, whether he seriously meant to establish a tyranny or a republic. On one hand, a first magistrate, in so extensive a government, seemed necessary both for the dignity and tranquillity of the state; and the authority, which he assumed as protector, was, in some respects, inferior to the prerogatives, which the laws entrusted and still entrust to the king. On the other hand, the legislative power, which he reserved to himself and council, together with so great an army, independent of the parliament, were bad prognostics of his intention to submit to a civil and legal constitution. But if this were not his intention, the method in which he distributed and conducted the elections, being so favourable to liberty, form a trait in his character which deserves applause. He deprived of their right of election all the small boroughs, places the most exposed to influence and corruption. Of four hundred members, which represented England, two hundred and seventy were chosen by the counties. The rest were elected by London, and the more considerable corporations. The lower populace too, so easily guided or deceived, were excluded from the elections: an estate of two hundred pounds value was necessary to entitle any one to a vote. The elections of this parliament were conducted with perfect freedom; and, excepting that such of the royalists as had borne arms against the parliament and all their sons were excluded, a more fair representation of the people could not be desired or expected. Thirty members were returned from Scotland; as many from Ireland.

The protector seems to have been disappointed, when he found that all these precautions had not procured him the full confidence of the public; nor was it reasonable to expect he should so speedily gain the confidence of every man, when there were so many jarring interests in the nation. Though Cromwell's administration was less odious to every party than that of any other party, yet was it entirely acceptable to none. The royalists of course were zealous adversaries to his authority. It was maintained by them, that the pretence of liberty and a popular election was but a new artifice, in order to lay asleep the deluded nation, and give himself leisure to rivet their chains more securely upon them: that in the instrument of government he openly declared his intention of still retaining the same mercenary army, by whose assistance he had subdued the ancient established government, and who would with less scruple obey him, in overturning, whenever he should please to order them, that new system, which he himself had been pleased to model: that being sensible of the danger and uncertainty of all military government, he endeavoured to intermix some appearance, and but an appearance, of civil administration, and to balance the army by a seeming consent of the people: that the absurd trial, which he had made, of a parliament, elected by himself, appointed perpetually to elect their successors, plainly proved, that he aimed at nothing but temporary expedients, was totally averse to a free republican government, and possessed not that mature and deliberate reflection, which could qualify him to act the part of a legislator: that his imperious character, which had betrayed itself in so many incidents, could never seriously submit to legal limitations; nor would the very image of popular government be longer upheld than while conformable to his arbitrary will and pleasure: and that the best policy was to oblige him to take off the mask at once; and either submit entirely to that parliament which he had summoned, or, by totally rejecting its authority, leave himself no resource but in his enthusiastic army.

In prosecution of these views, the parliament, having heard the protector's speech, three hours long, and having chosen Lenthal for their speaker, immediately entered into a discussion of the instrument of government, and of that authority which Cromwell, by the title of protector, had obtained over the nation. The greatest liberty was used in arraigning this new dignity; and even the personal character and conduct of Cromwell escaped not without censure. The utmost that could be obtained by the officers and by the court party, for so they were called, was to protract the debate by arguments and long speeches, and prevent the decision of a question, which, they were sensible, would be carried against them by a great majority. The protector, surprized and enraged at this refractory spirit in the parliament, sent for them to the painted chamber, and with an air of great authority inveighed against their conduct. He told them that nothing could be more absurd than for them to dispute his title; since the same instrument of government which made them a parliament, had invested him with the protectorship; that some points in the new constitution were supposed to be fundamentals, and were not on any pretence to be altered or disputed; that among these were the government of the nation by a single person and a parliament, their joint authority over the army and militia, the succession of new parliaments, and liberty of conscience; and that with regard to these particulars, there was reserved to him a negative voice, to which, in the other circumstances of government, he confessed himself no-wise entitled.

The protector now found the necessity of exacting a security which, had he foreseen the spirit of the house, he would wish better grace have required at their first meeting. He obliged the members to sign a recognition of his authority, and an engagement not to propose or consent to any alteration in the government, as it was settled in a single person and a parliament; and he placed guards at the door of the house, who allowed none but subscribers to enter. Most of the members, after some hesitation, submitted to this condition; but retained the same refractory spirit which they had discovered in their first debates. The instrument of government was taken in pieces, and examined, article by article, with the most scrupulous accuracy: very free topics were advanced with the general approbation of the house: and during the whole course of their proceedings they neither sent up one bill to the protector, nor took any notice of him. Being informed that conspiracies were entered into between the members and some malcontent officers, he hastened to the dissolution of so dangerous an assembly. By the instrument of government, to which he had sworn, no parliament could be dissolved till it had sitten five months; but Cromwell pretended, that a month contained only twenty-eight days, according to the method of computation practised in paying the fleet and army. The full time, therefore, according to this mode of reckoning, being elapsed, the parliament was ordered to attend the protector, who made them a tedious harangue, and dismissed them, on the 22nd of January, 1655.

The electing of a discontented parliament is a proof of a discontented nation: the angry and abrupt dissolution of that parliament is always sure to increase the general discontent. The members of this assembly, returning to their counties, propagated that spirit of mutiny which they had exerted in the house. Sir Harry Vane and the old republicans, who maintained the indissoluble authority of the long parliament, encouraged the murmurs against the present usurpation; though they acted so cautiously as to give the protector no handle against them. Wildman and some others of that party carried still farther their conspiracies against the protector's authority. The royalists, observing this general ill-will towards the establishment, could no longer be retained in subjection; but fancied that every one who was dissatisfied like them, had also embraced the same views and inclinations. They did not consider that the old parliamentary party, though many of them were displeased with Cromwell, who had dispossessed them of their power, were still more apprehensive of any success to the royal cause; whence, besides a certain prospect of the same consequence, they had so much reason to dread the severest vengeance for their past transgressions.

In concert with the king a conspiracy was entered into by the royalists throughout England, and a day of general rising appointed. Information of this design was conveyed to Cromwell. The protector's administration was extremely vigilant. Thurloe, his secretary, had spies every where. Manning, who had access to the king's family, kept a regular correspondence with him. And it was not difficult to obtain intelligence of a confederacy, so generally diffused among a party who valued themselves more on zeal and courage, than on secresy and sobriety. Many of the royalists were thrown into prison. Others, on the approach of the day, were terrified with the danger of the undertaking, and remained at home. In one place alone the conspiracy broke into action. Penruddoc, Groves, Jones, and other gentlemen of the west, entered Salisbury with about two hundred horse on the 11th of March; at the very time when the sheriff and judges were holding the assizes. These they made prisoners; and they proclaimed the king. Contrary to their expectations, they received no accession of force; so prevalent was the terror of the established government. Having in vain wandered about for some time, they were totally discouraged, and one troop of horse was able at last to suppress them. The leaders of the conspiracy, being taken prisoners, were capitally punished. The rest were sold for slaves, and transported to Barbadoes.

The easy subduing of this insurrection, which, by the boldness of the undertaking, struck at first a great terror into the nation, was a singular felicity to the protector. The very insurrection itself he regarded as a fortunate event; since it proved the reality of those conspiracies, which his enemies, on every occasion, represented as mere fictions, invented to colour his severities. He resolved to keep no longer any terms with the royalists, who were those whom he could oppress under the most plausible pretences, and who met with least countenance and protection from his adherents. He issued an edict with the consent of his council, for exacting the tenth penny from that whole party; in order, as he pretended, to make them pay the expences to which their mutinous disposition continually exposed the public. Without regard to compositions, articles of capitulation, or acts of indemnity, all the royalists, however harassed with former oppressions, were obliged afresh to redeem themselves by great sums of money; and many of them were reduced by these multiplied disasters to extreme poverty. Whoever was known to be disaffected, or even lay under any suspicion, though no guilt could be proved against him, was exposed to the new exaction.

In order to raise this imposition, which commonly passed by the name of decimation, the protector instituted twelve major-generals; and divided the whole kingdom of England into so many military jurisdictions. These men, assisted by commissioners, had power to subject whom they pleased to decimation, to levy all the taxes imposed by the protector and his council, and to imprison any person who should be exposed to their jealousy or suspicion, nor was there any appeal from them but to the protector himself and his council. Under colour of these powers, the major-generals exercised an authority still more arbitrary, and acted as if absolute masters of the property and person of every subject. All reasonable men now concluded, that the very masque of liberty was thrown aside, and that the nation was for ever subjected to military and despotic government, exercised not in the legal manner of European nations, but according to the maxims of eastern tyranny.

It seems now proper, after so long an interval, to look abroad to the general state of Europe, and to consider the measures which England at this time embraced in its negociations with the neighbouring princes. The moderate temper and unwarlike genius of the two last princes, the extreme difficulties under which they laboured at home, and the great security which they enjoyed from foreign enemies, had rendered them negligent of the transactions on the continent; and England, during their reigns, had been in a manner overlooked in the general system of Europe. The bold and restless genius of the protector led him to extend his alliances and enterprizes to every part of Christendom; and partly from the ascendant of his magnanimous spirit, partly from the situation of foreign kingdoms, the weight of England, even under its bravest princes, was never more sensibly felt than during the protectorate of Oliver Cromwell.

A war of thirty years, the most signal and most destructive that had appeared in modern annals, was finished in Germany in 1648; and by the treaty of Westphalia, were composed those fatal quarrels which had been excited by the palatine's acceptance of the crown of Bohemia. The young palatine was restored to part of his dignities and of his dominions (r). The rights, privileges, and authority, of the several members of the Germanic body were fixed and ascertained: sovereign princes and free states were in some degree reduced to obedience under laws; and by the valour of the heroic Gustavus, the enterprizes of the active Richelieu, the intrigues of the artful Mazarin, was in part effected, after an infinite expence of blood and treasure, what had been fondly expected and loudly demanded from the feeble efforts of the pacific James, seconded by the scanty supplies of his jealous parliaments.

Sweden, which had acquired by conquest large dominions in the north of Germany, was engaged in enterprizes which promised her, from her success and valour, still more extensive acquisitions on the side both of Poland and of Denmark. Charles X. who had mounted the throne of that kingdom after the voluntary resignation of Christina, being stimulated by the fame of Gustavus as well as by his own martial disposition, carried his conquering arms to the south of the Baltic, and gained the celebrated battle of Warsaw, which had been obstinately disputed during the space of three days. The protector, at the time his allianee was courted by every power in Europe, anxiously courted the alliance of Sweden; and he was fond of forming a confederacy with a protestant power of such renown, even though it threatened the whole north with conquest and subjection.

The transactions of the parliament and protector with France had been various and complicated. The emissaries of Richelieu had furnished fuel to the flame of rebellion, when it first broke out in Scotland; but after the conflagration had diffused itself, the French court, observing the materials to be of themselves sufficiently combustible, found it unnecessary any longer to animate the British malcontents to an opposition of their sovereign. On the contrary, they offered their mediation for composing these intestine disorders; and their ambassadors, from decency, pretended to act in concert with the court of England, and to receive directions from a prince with whom their master was connected with so near an affinity. In the mean time cardinal Richelieu died, and soon after him the French king, Louis XIII. leaving his son an infant four years old, and his widow, Anne of Austria, regent of the kingdom. Cardinal Mazarin succeeded Richelieu in the ministry; and the same general plan of policy, though by men of such opposite characters, was still continued in the French counsels. The establishment of royal authority, the reduction of the Austrian family, were pursued with ardour and success; and every year brought an accession of force and grandeur to the French monarchy. Not only battles were won, towns and fortresses taken; the genius too of the nation seemed gradually to improve, and to compose itself to the spirit of dutiful obedience and steady enterprize. A Condé, a Turenne, were formed, and the troops, animated by their valour, and guided by their discipline, acquired every day a greater ascendant over the Spaniards. On a sudden, from some intrigues of the court, and some discontents in the courts of judicature, intestine commotions were excited, and every thing relapsed into confusion. But these rebellions of the French were conducted with little bloodshed, and made but a small impression on the minds of the people. Though seconded by the force of Spain, and conducted by the prince of Condé, the malcontents, in a little time, were either expelled or subdued; and the French monarchy, having lost a few of its conquests, returned with fresh vigour to the acquisition of new dominion.

During these commotions, Charles and his mother passed most of their time at Paris; and notwithstanding their near connexion of blood, received but few civilities, and still less support, from the French court. Had the queen regent been ever so much inclined to assist the English prince, the disorders of her own affairs would, for a long time, have rendered such intentions impracticable. The banished queen had a moderate pension assigned her; but it was so ill paid, and her credit ran so low, that, one morning, when the cardinal de Retz waited on her, she informed him that her daughter, the princess Henrietta, was obliged to lie a-bed, for want of a fire to warm her. To such a condition was reduced, in the midst of Paris, a queen of England, and daughter of Henry IV. of France!

The English parliament, however, having assumed the sovereignty of the state, resented the countenance, cold as it was, which the French court gave to the unfortunate monarch. On pretence of injuries, of which the English merchants complained, they issued letters of reprisal upon the French; and Blake went so far as to attack and seize a whole squadron of ships, which were carrying supplies to Dunkirk, then closely besieged by the Spaniards. That town, disappointed of these supplies, fell into the hands of the enemy. The French ministers soon found it necessary to change their measures. They treated Charles with such affected indifference, that he thought it more decent to withdraw, and prevent the indignity of being desired to leave the kingdom. He went first to Spa in Germany, thence he retired to Cologne; where he lived two years on a small pension, about six thousand livres a-year, paid him by the court of France, and on some contributions sent him by his friends in England. In the management of his family, he discovered a disposition to order and œconomy; and his temper, cheerful, careless, and sociable, was more than a sufficient compensation for that empire, of which he had been bereaved. Sir Edward Hyde, created lord chancellor, and the marquis of Ormond, were his chief friends and confidents.

If the French ministry had thought it prudent to bend under the English parliament, they deemed it still more necessary to pay deference to the protector, when he possessed the reins of government. Cardinal Mazarin, by whom all the councils of France were directed, was artful and vigilant, supple and patient, false and intriguing; desirous rather to prevail by dexterity than violence, and placing his honour more in the final success of his measures than in the splendour and magnanimity of the means which he employed. Cromwell, by his imperious character, rather than by the advantage of his situation, acquired an ascendant over this man; and every proposal made by the protector, however unreasonable in itself, and urged with whatever insolence, met with a ready compliance from the politic and timid cardinal. Bourdeaux was sent over to England as minister; and all circumstances of respect were paid to the protector, who had been instrumental in beheading a prince so nearly related to the royal family of France. With indefatigable patience did Bourdeaux conduct this negociation, which Cromwell seemed entirely to neglect; and though privateers, with English commissions, committed daily depredations on the French commerce, Mazarin was content, in hopes of a fortunate issue, still to submit to these indignities (s).

The court of Spain, less connected with the unfortunate royal family, and reduced to greater distress than the French monarchy, had been still more forward in her advances to the prosperous parliament and protector. Don Alonzo de Cardenas, the Spanish envoy, was the first public minister who recognized the authority of the new republic; and, in return for this civility, Ascham was sent envoy into Spain by the parliament. No sooner had this minister arrived in Madrid, than some of the banished royalists, inflamed by that inveterate hatred which animated the English factions, broke into his chamber, and murdered him, together with his secretary. Immediately they took sanctuary in the churches; and, assisted by the general favour, which every where attended the royal cause, were enabled, most of them, to make their escape. Only one of the criminals suffered death; and the parliament seemed to rest satisfied with this atonement.

Spain, at this time, assailed every where by vigorous enemies from without, and labouring under many internal disorders, retained nothing of her former grandeur, except the haughty pride of her counsels, and the hatred and jealousy of her neighbours. Portugal had rebelled, and established her monarchy in the house of Braganza: Catalonia, complaining of violated privileges, had revolted to France: Naples was shaken with popular convulsions: the Low Countries were invaded with superior forces, and seemed ready to change their master: the Spanish infantry, anciently so formidable, had been annihilated by Condé in the fields of Rocroy: and though the same prince, banished France, sustained by his activity and valour, the falling fortunes of Spain, he could only hope to protract, not prevent, the ruin with which that monarchy was visibly threatened.

Had Cromwell understood and regarded the interests of his country, he would have supported the declining condition of Spain against the dangerous ambition of France, and preserved that balance of power, on which the greatness and security of England so much depended. Had he studied only his own interests, he would have maintained an exact neutrality between those great monarchies; nor would he have hazarded his power, by provoking foreign enemies, who might lend assistance to domestic faction, and overturn his tottering throne. But his magnanimity undervalued danger: his active disposition, and avidity of extensive glory, made him incapable of repose: and as the policy of men is continually warped by their temper, no sooner was peace made with Holland, than he began to deliberate what new enemy he should invade with his victorious arms.

The extensive empire and yet extreme weakness of Spain in the West Indies; the vigorous courage and great naval power of England; were circumstances which, when compared, excited the ambition of the enterprizing protector, and made him hope that he might, by some gainful conquest, render for ever illustrious that dominion which he had gained over his country. Should he fail of these durable acquisitions, the Indian treasures, which must every year cross the ocean to reach Spain, were, he thought, a sure prey to the English navy, and would support his military force, without his laying new burdens on the people. From France a vigorous resistance must be expected: no plunder, no conquests could be hoped for: the progress of his arms, even if attended with success, must there be slow and gradual: and the advantages acquired, however real, would be less striking to the multitude, whom it was his interest to allure. The royal family, so closely connected with the French monarch, might receive great assistance from that neighbouring kingdom; and an army of French Protestants, landed in England, would be able, he dreaded, to unite the most opposite factions against the present government.

These motives of policy were probably seconded by his religious prejudices. The Swedish alliance, though much contrary to the interests of England, he had contracted, merely from his zeal for Protestantism (t); and Sweden being closely connected with France, he could not hope to maintain that confederacy in which he so much prided himself, should a rupture ensue between England and this latter kingdom. The Hugonots, he expected, would meet with better treatment, while he engaged in a close union with their sovereign. And as the Spaniards were much more Papists than the French, were much more exposed to the old puritanical hatred, and had even erected the bloody tribunal of the inquisition, whose rigours they had refused to mitigate on Cromwell's solicitation (u); he hoped that a holy and meritorious war with such idolaters could not fail of protection from heaven. A preacher likewise, inspired, as was supposed, by a prophetic spirit, bid him "go and prosper;" calling him "a stone cut out of the mountains without hands, that would break the pride of the Spaniard, crush Antichrist, and make way for the purity of the Gospel over the whole world."

Actuated by these motives, the protector equipped two considerable squadrons; and while he was making those preparations, the neighbouring states, ignorant of his intentions, remained in suspense, and looked with anxious expectation on what side the storm should discharge itself. One of these squadrons, consisting of thirty capital ships, was sent into the Mediterranean under Blake, whose fame was now spread over Europe. No English fleet, except during the crusades, had ever before sailed in those seas; and from one extremity to the other, there was no naval force, Christian or Mohammedan, able to resist them. The Roman pontiff, whose weakness and whose pride equally provoke attacks, dreaded invasion from a power which professed the most inveterate enmity against him, and which so little regulated its movements by the usual motives of interest and prudence. Blake, casting anchor before Leghorn, demanded and obtained from the duke of Tuscany reparation for some losses which the English commerce had formerly sustained from him. He next sailed to Algiers, and compelled the dey to make peace, and to restrain his piratical subjects from farther violences on the English. He presented himself before Tunis; and having there made the same demands, the dey of that republic bade him look to the castles of Porto Farino and Goletta, and do his utmost. Blake needed not to be roused by such a bravado: he drew his ships close up to the castles, and tore them in pieces with his artillery. He sent a numerous detachment of sailors in their long-boats into the harbour, and burned every ship which lay there. This bold action, which its very temerity, perhaps, rendered safe, was executed with little loss, and filled all that part of the world with the renown of English valour.

The other squadron was not equally successful. It was commanded by Pen, and carried on board four thousand men, under the command of Venables. About five thousand more joined them from Barbadoes and St. Christopher's. Both these officers were inclined to the king's service; and it is pretended that Cromwell was obliged to hurry the soldiers on board, in order to prevent the execution of a conspiracy which had been formed among them, in favour of the exiled family. The ill success of this enterprize may justly be ascribed, as much to the injudicious schemes of the protector, who planned it, as to the bad execution of the officers, by whom it was conducted. They were indeed tied down to follow the advice of commissioners, who disconcerted them in all their projects (v).

It was agreed by the admiral and general, on the 13th of April, 1655, to attempt St. Domingo, the only place of strength in the island of Hispaniola. On the approach of the English, the Spaniards in a fright deserted their houses, and fled into the woods. Contrary to the opinion of Venables, the soldiers were disembarked without guides ten leagues distant from the town. They wandered four days through the woods without provisions, and, what was still more intolerable in that sultry climate, without water. The Spaniards recovered spirit, and attacked them. The English, discouraged with the bad conduct of their officers, and scarcely alive from hunger, thirst, and fatigue, were unable to resist. An inconsiderable number of the enemy put the whole army to rout, killed six hundred of them, and chased the rest on board their vessels.

The English commanders, in order to atone as much as possible for this unprosperous attempt, bent their course to Jamaica, which was surrendered to them without resistance. Pen and Venables returned to England, and were both of them sent to the Tower by the protector, who, though commonly master of his fiery temper, was thrown into a violent passion at this disappointment. He had made a conquest of greater importance than he was himself at this time aware of; yet was it much inferior to the vast projects which he had formed. He gave orders, however, to support it by men and money; and that island has ever since remained in the possession of the English; a great acquisition which they owe to the enterprizing spirit of Cromwell.

As soon as the news of this expedition, which was an unwarrantable violation of treaty, arrived in Europe, the Spaniards declared war against England, and seized all the ships and goods belonging to the English merchants, of which they could make themselves masters. The commerce with Spain, so profitable to the English, was cut off; and nearly fifteen hundred vessels, it is computed (w), fell in a short period into the hands of the enemy. Blake, to whom Montague was now joined in command, after receiving new orders, prepared himself for hostilities against the Spaniards.

Several naval officers, having entertained scruples of conscience with regard to the justice of the Spanish war, threw up their commissions, and retired (x). No commands, they thought, of their superiors could justify a war, which was contrary to the principles of natural equity, and which the civil magistrate had no right to order. Individuals, they maintained, in resigning to the public their natural liberty, could bestow on it only what they themselves were possessed of, a right of performing lawful actions, and could invest it with no authority of commanding what is contrary to the decrees of heaven. Such maxims, though they seem reasonable, are perhaps too perfect for human nature; and must be regarded as one effect, though of the most innocent and even honourable kind, of that spirit which predominated in England.

Admiral Blake lay some time off Cadiz, in expectation of intercepting the plate fleet, but was at last obliged, for want of water, to sail towards Portugal. Captain Stayner, whom he had left on the Spanish coast with a squadron of seven vessels, came in sight of the galleons, and immediately set sail to pursue them. The Spanish admiral ran his ship ashore: two others followed his example: the English took two ships in September, 1656, valued at near two millions of pieces of eight. Two galleons were set on fire; and the marquis of Badajoz, viceroy of Peru, with his wife and his daughter, betrothed to the young duke of Medina Celi, were destroyed in them. The marquis himself might have escaped; but seeing these unfortunate women, astonished with the danger, fall in a swoon, and perish in the flames, he rather chose to die with them, than drag out a life embittered with the remembrance of such dismal scenes. When the treasures gained by this enterprize arrived at Portsmouth, the protector, from a spirit of ostentation, ordered them to be transported by land to London.

The next action against the Spaniards was less profitable to the nation than that above related. Blake having heard that a Spanish fleet of sixteen ships, much richer than the former, had taken shelter in the Canaries, immediately made sail towards them. He found them in the bay of Santa Cruz, disposed in a formidable posture. The bay was secured with a strong castle, well provided with cannon, besides seven forts in several parts of it, all united by a line of communication, manned with musketeers. Don Diego Diaques, the Spanish admiral, ordered all his smaller vessels to moor close to the shore, and posted the larger galleons farther off, at anchor, with their broadsides to the sea. Blake was rather animated than daunted with this appearance. The wind seconded his courage, and blowing full into the bay, in a short time brought him among the thickest of his enemies. After a resistance of four hours, the Spaniards yielded to English valour, and abandoned their ships, which were set on fire, and consumed with all their treasure. The greatest danger still remained to the English. They lay under the fire of the castles and all the forts, which must in a little time have torn them in pieces. But the wind suddenly shifting, carried them out of the bay; where they left the Spaniards in astonishment at their temerity. This was the last and greatest action of the gallant Blake. He was consumed with a dropsy and scurvy, and hastened home, that he might yield up his breath in his native country, which he had so much adorned by his valour. As he came within sight of land he expired, on the 20th of April, 1657 (y).

The conduct of the protector in foreign affairs was full of vigour and enterprize, and drew a consideration to his country, which, since the reign of Elizabeth, it seemed to have totally lost. His great mind was intent on spreading the renown of the English nation; and while he struck mankind with astonishment at his extraordinary fortune, he seemed to ennoble, instead of debasing, that people whom he had reduced to subjection. It was his boast, that he would render the name of an Englishman as much feared and revered as ever was that of a Roman; and as his countrymen found some reality in these pretensions, their national vanity being gratified, made them more reconciled to the calamities they laboured under.

It must be acknowledged, that the protector, in his civil and domestic administration, displayed as great regard both to justice and clemency, as his authority could possibly permit. All the chief offices in the courts of judicature were filled with men of integrity: amidst the virulence

(y) Never man so zealous for a faction was so much respected and esteemed even by the opposite parties. He was by principle an inflexible republican; and the late transactions, amidst all the trust and caresses which he received from the ruling powers, were thought to be very little grateful to him. "It is still our duty," said he to the seamen, "to fight for our country, into what hands soever the government may fall." Disinterested, generous, liberal; ambitious only of true glory, dreadful only to his avowed enemies; he forms one of the most perfect characters of the age, and the least stained with those errors and violences which were then so predominant. The protector ordered him a pompous funeral at the public charge: but the tears of his countrymen were the most honourable panegyric on his memory.

lence of party, the decrees of the judges were upright and impartial: and to every man but himself, and to himself, except where necessity required the contrary, the law was the great rule of conduct and behaviour. Vane and Lilburn, whose credit with the republicans and levellers he dreaded, were indeed for some time confined to prison: Cony, who refused to pay the taxes, was obliged by menaces to depart from his obstinacy: high courts of justice were erected to try those who had engaged in conspiracies and insurrections against the protector's authority, and whom he could not safely commit to the verdict of juries. But these irregularities were deemed inevitable consequences of his authority. And though often urged by his officers, as is pretended, to attempt a general massacre of the royalists, he always with horror rejected such sanguinary counsels.

In the army was laid the sole basis of the protector's power; and in managing it consisted the chief art and delicacy of his government. The soldiers were held in exact discipline; a policy which both accustomed them to obedience, and made them less hateful and burthensome to the people. He augmented their pay; though the public necessities sometimes obliged him to run in arrears to them. Their interests, they were sensible, were closely connected with those of their general and protector. And he entirely commanded their affectionate regard, by his abilities and success in almost every enterprize which he had hitherto undertaken. The soldiers, often taught, that the office of king was an usurpation upon Christ, were apt to suspect a protector not to be altogether compatible with that divine authority. Harrison, though raised to the highest dignity, and possessed of Cromwell's confidence, became his most inveterate enemy as soon as the authority of a single person was established, against which the protector himself had also made strong protestations. Overton, Rich, Okey, officers of rank in the army, were actuated with like principles, and Cromwell was obliged to deprive them of their commissions. Their influence, which was before thought unbounded among the troops, seemed from that moment to be totally annihilated.

The more effectually to curb the enthusiastic and seditious spirit of the troops, Cromwell established a kind of militia in the several counties. Companies of infantry and cavalry were inlisted under proper officers, regular pay distributed among them, and a resource by that means provided both against the insurrections of the royalists, and mutiny of the army.

Religion can never be deemed a point of small consequence in civil government: but during this period, it may be regarded as the great spring of men's actions and determinations. Though transported, himself, with strange whimsies, Cromwell had adopted a scheme for regulating this principle in others, which was sagacious and political. Being resolved to maintain a national church, yet determined neither to admit episcopacy nor presbytery, he established a number of commissioners, under the name of tryers, partly laymen, partly ecclesiastics, some Presbyterians, some Independents. These presented to all livings, which were formerly in the gift of the crown; they examined and admitted such persons as received holy orders; and they inspected the lives, doctrine, and behaviour of the clergy. Instead of supporting that union between learning and theology, which has so long been attempted in Europe, these tryers embraced the latter principle in its full purity, and made it the sole object of their examination. The candidates were no more perplexed with questions concerning their progress in Greek and Roman erudition; concerning their talent for profane arts and sciences: the chief object of scrutiny regarded their advances in grace, and fixing, if they were able, the time of their conversion.

With the religious of all denominations Cromwell was familiar and easy. Laying aside the state of protector, which, on other occasions, he well knew how to maintain, he insinuated to them, that nothing but necessity could ever oblige him to invest himself with it. He talked spiritually to them; he sighed, he weeped, he prayed. He even entered with them into an emulation of spiritual exercises; and these men were proud that his highness, by his princely example, had dignified those practices in which they themselves were daily occupied (z).

If Cromwell might be said to adhere to any particular form of religion, they were the Independents who could chiefly boast of his favour; and it may be affirmed, that pastors of that sect were principally devoted to him.

The Presbyterian clergy also, saved from the ravages of the Anabaptists and Millenarians, and enjoying their establishments and tythes, were not averse to his government; though he still entertained great jealousy of that restless spirit by which they were actuated. He granted an unbounded liberty of conscience to all but catholics and prelatists; and by that means he both attached the sectaries to his person, and employed them in curbing the domineering spirit of the Presbyterians. "I am the only man," he was often heard to say, "who has known how to subdue that insolent sect, which can suffer none but itself."

The Protestant zeal which possessed the Presbyterians and Independents, was highly gratified by the manner in which the protector so successfully supported the persecuted Protestants throughout all Europe. Even the duke of Savoy, so remote a power, and so little exposed to the naval force of England, was obliged, by the authority of France, to comply with his mediation, and to tolerate the Protestants of the vallies of Piedmont, against whom that prince had commenced a furious persecution. France itself was constrained to bear not only with the religion, but even, in some instances, with the insolence of the Hugonots; and when the French court applied for a reciprocal toleration of the catholic religion in England, the protector, who arrogated in every thing the superiority, would hearken to no such proposal. He had entertained a project of instituting a college in imitation of that at Rome, for the propagation of the faith; and his apostles, in zeal, though not in unanimity, had certainly been a full match for the catholics.

The protector retained the church of England in constraint; though he permitted its clergy a little more liberty than the republican parliament had formerly allowed. He was pleased that the superior lenity of his administration should in every thing be remarked. He bridled the royalists, both by the army which he retained, and by those secret spies which he found means to intermix in all their counsels. Manning being detected and punished with death, he corrupted sir Richard Willis, who was much trusted by chancellor Hyde and all the royalists; and by means of this man he was made acquainted with every design and conspiracy of the party. He could disconcert any project, by confining the persons who were to be the actors in it; and as he restored them afterwards to liberty, his severity passed only for the result of general jealousy and suspicion. The secret source of his intelligence remained still unknown and unsuspected.

Conspiracies for an assassination he was chiefly afraid of; these being designs which no prudence or vigilance could evade. Colonel Titus, under the name of Allen, had written a spirited discourse, exhorting every one to embrace this method of vengeance; and Cromwell knew that the inflamed minds of the royal party were sufficiently disposed to put the doctrine in practice against him. He openly told them, that assassinations were base and odious, and he never would commence hostilities by so shameful an expedient; but if the first attempt or provocation came from them, he would retaliate to the uttermost. He had instruments, he said, whom he could employ; and he never would desist till he had totally exterminated the royal family. This menace, more than all his guards, contributed to the security of his person.

There was no point about which the protector was more solicitous than to procure intelligence. This article alone, it is said, cost him sixty thousand pounds a-year. Postmasters, both at home and abroad, were in his pay: carriers were searched or bribed: secretaries and clerks were corrupted: the greatest zealots in all parties were often those who conveyed private information to him: and nothing could escape his vigilant enquiry. Such at least is the representation made by historians of Cromwell's administration: but it must be confessed that, if we may judge by those volumes of Thurloe's papers, which have been lately published, this affair, like many others, has been been greatly magnified. We scarcely find by that collection, that any secret counsels of foreign states, except those of Holland, were known to the protector.

(z) Cromwell followed, though but in part, the advice which he received from general Harrison, at the time when the intimacy and endearment most strongly subsisted betwixt them. "Let the waiting upon Jehovah," said that military religionist, "be the greatest and most considerable business you have every day: reckon it so, more than to eat, sleep, and council together. Run aside sometimes from your company, and get a word with the Lord. Why should not you have three or four precious souls always standing at your elbow, with whom you might now and then turn into a corner; I have found refreshment and mercy in such a way." Milton's State Papers, p. 12.

The general behaviour and deportment of Cromwell was such as might befit the greatest monarch. He maintained a dignity without either affectation or ostentation; and supported with all strangers that high idea with which his great exploits and prodigious fortune had impressed them. Among his ancient friends he could relax himself; and by trifling and amusement, jesting and making verses, he feared not exposing himself to their most familiar approaches. With others, he sometimes pushed matters to the length of rustic frolic and buffoonery.

That vein of frolic and pleasantry which made a part of Cromwell's character, was apt sometimes to betray him into other inconsistencies, and to discover itself even where religion might seem to be a little concerned. It is a tradition, that, one day, sitting at table, the protector had a bottle of wine brought him, of a kind which he valued so highly, that he must needs open the bottle himself: but in attempting it, the cork-screw dropt from his hand. Immediately his courtiers and generals flung themselves on the floor to recover it. Cromwell burst out a-laughing. "Should any fool," said he, "put in his head at the door, he would fancy, from your posture, that you were seeking the Lord; and you are only seeking a cork-screw."

But amidst all the unguarded play and buffoonery of this singular personage, he took the opportunity of remarking the characters, designs, and weaknesses of men; and he would sometimes push them, by an indulgence in wine, to open to him the most secret recesses of their bosom. Great regularity, however, and even austerity of manners, were always maintained in his court; and he was careful never by any liberties to give offence to the most rigid of the godly. Some state was upheld; but with little expence, and without any splendour. The nobility, though courted by him, kept at a distance, and were not fond of mixing with those persons who were the instruments of his government. Without departing from œconomy, he was generous to those who served him; and he knew how to find out and engage in his interests every man possessed of those talents which any particular employment demanded. His generals, his admirals, his judges, his ambassadors, were persons who contributed, all of them, in their several spheres, to the security of the protector, and to the honour and interest of the nation.

Under pretence of uniting Scotland and Ireland in one commonwealth with England, Cromwell had reduced those kingdoms to a total subjection; and he treated them entirely as conquered provinces. The civil administration of Scotland was placed in a council consisting mostly of English, of which lord Broghil was president. Justice was administered by seven judges, four of whom were English. In order to curb the tyrannical nobility, he both abolished all vassalage, and revived the office of justice of peace, which king James had introduced, but was not able to support. A long line of forts and garrisons was maintained throughout the kingdom. An army of ten thousand men kept every thing in peace and obedience; and neither the banditti of the mountains, nor the bigots of the low countries, could indulge their inclination to turbulence and disorder. He courted the Presbyterian clergy; though he nourished that intestine enmity which prevailed between the resolutioners and protesters; and he found that very little policy was requisite to foment quarrels among theologians. He permitted no church assemblies; being sensible that from thence had proceeded many of the past disorders. And, in the main, the Scots were obliged to acknowledge, that never before had they attained so much happiness as at present, when reduced to subjection under the protectorate.

The protector's administration of Ireland was more severe and violent. The government of that island was first entrusted to Fleetwood, who had married Ireton's widow; then to Henry Cromwell, second son of the protector, a young man of an amiable, mild disposition, and not destitute of vigour and capacity. About five millions of acres, forfeited either by the popish rebels or by the adherents of the king, were divided, partly among the adventurers, who had advanced money to the parliament, partly among the English soldiers, who had arrears due to them. Examples of a more sudden and violent change of property are scarcely to be found in any history. An order was even issued to confine all the native Irish to the province of Connaught, where they would be shut up by rivers, lakes, and mountains; and could not, it was hoped, be any longer dangerous to the English government: but this absurd policy, which, from an impatience of attaining immediate security, must have depopulated all the other provinces, and rendered the English estates of no value, was soon abandoned as impracticable.

Cromwell began to hope that, by his administration, attended with so much lustre and success abroad, so much order and tranquillity at home, he had now acquired such authority as would enable him to meet the representatives of the nation, and would assure him of their dutiful compliance with his government. He summoned a parliament; but not trusting altogether to the good-will of the people, he used every art which his new model of representation allowed him to employ, in order to influence the elections, and fill the house with his own creatures. Ireland, being entirely in the hands of the army, chose few but such officers as were most acceptable to him. Scotland showed a like compliance; and as the nobility and gentry of that kingdom regarded their attendance on English parliaments as an ignominious badge of slavery, it was, on that account, more easy for the officers to prevail in the elections. Notwithstanding all these precautions, the protector still found that the majority would not be favourable to him. He set guards, therefore, on the 17th of September, 1656, at the door, who permitted none to enter but such as produced a warrant from his council; and the council rejected about a hundred, who either refused a recognition of the protector's government, or were on other accounts noxious to him. These protested against so egregious a violence, subversive of all liberty; but every application for redress was neglected both by the council and the parliament.

The majority of the parliament, by means of these arts and violences, was now at last either friendly to the protector, or resolved, by their compliance, to adjust, if possible, this military government to their laws and liberties. They voted a renunciation of all title in Charles Stuart, or any of his family; and this was the first act, dignified with the appearance of national consent, which had ever had that tendency. Colonel Jephson, in order to sound the inclinations of the house, ventured to move, that the parliament should bestow the crown on Cromwell; and no surprize or reluctance was discovered on the occasion. When Cromwell afterwards asked Jephson what induced him to make such a motion, "As long," said Jephson, "as I have the honour to sit in parliament, I must follow the dictates of my own conscience, whatever offence I may be so unfortunate as to give you." "Get thee gone," said Cromwell, giving him a gentle blow on the shoulder, "get thee gone, for a mad fellow, as thou art."

In order to pave the way to this advancement, for which he so ardently longed, Cromwell resolved to sacrifice his major-generals, whom he knew to be extremely odious to the nation. That measure was also become necessary for his own security. All government, purely military, fluctuates perpetually between despotic monarchy and a despotic aristocracy, according as the authority of the chief commander prevails, or that of the officers next him in rank and dignity. The major-generals, being possessed of so much distinct jurisdiction, began to establish a separate title to power, and had rendered themselves formidable to the protector himself; and for this inconvenience he well knew, before it was too late, how to provide a proper remedy. Claypole, his son-in-law, who possessed his confidence, abandoned them to the pleasure of the house; and though the name was still retained, it was agreed to abridge, or rather entirely annihilate, the power of the major-generals.

At length, a motion in form was made by alderman Pack, one of the city members, for investing the protector with the dignity of King. This motion, at first, excited great disorder, and divided the whole house into parties. The chief opposition came from the usual adherents of the protector, the major-generals, and such officers as depended on them. Lambert, a man of deep intrigue, and of great interest in the army, had long entertained the ambition of succeeding Cromwell in the protectorship; and he foresaw, that, if the monarchy were restored, hereditary right would also be established, and the crown be transmitted to the posterity of the prince first elected. He pleaded, therefore, conscience; and rousing all those civil and religious jealousies against kingly government, which had been so industriously encouraged couraged among the soldiers, he raised a numerous, and still more formidable, party against the motion.

On the other hand, the motion was supported by every one who was more particularly devoted to the protector, and who hoped, by so acceptable a measure, to pay court to the prevailing authority. Many persons also, attached to their country, despaired of ever being able to subvert the present establishment; and were desirous, by fixing it on ancient foundations, to induce the protector, from views of his own safety, to pay a regard to the ancient laws and liberties of the kingdom. Even many of the royalists joined in the measure; and hoped that, when the question regarded only persons, not forms of government, no one would any longer balance between the ancient royal family and another person who had got possession of the throne. The bill was voted by a considerable majority; and a committee was appointed to reason with the protector, and to overcome those scruples which he pretended against accepting so liberal an offer. The conference lasted for several days: and on the 9th of April, 1657, the committee urged, that all the statutes and customs of England were founded on the supposition of regal authority, and could not, without extreme violence, be adjusted to any other form of government: that a protector, except during the minority of a king, was a name utterly unknown to the laws; and no man was acquainted with the extent or limits of his authority: that if it were attempted to define every part of his jurisdiction, many years, if not ages, would be required for the execution of so complicated a work; if the whole power of the king were at once transferred to him, the question was plainly about a name, and the preference was indisputably due to the ancient title: that the English constitution was more anxious concerning the form of government than concerning the birthright of the first magistrate, and had provided, by an express law of Henry VII, for the security of those who act in defence of the king in being, by whatever means he might have acquired possession: that it was extremely the interest of all his highness's friends to seek the shelter of this statute; and even the people in general were desirous of such a settlement, and all juries were with great difficulty induced to give their verdict in favour of a protector: that the great source of all the late commotions had been the jealousy of liberty; and that a republic, together with a protector, had been established, in order to provide farther securities for the freedom of the constitution; but that by experience the remedy had been found insufficient, even dangerous and pernicious; since every undeterminate power, such as that of a protector, must be arbitrary; and the more arbitrary, as it was contrary to the genius and inclination of the people.

The difficulty consisted not in persuading Cromwell. He was sufficiently convinced of the solidity of these reasons; and his inclination, as well as judgement, was entirely on the side of the committee. But how to bring over the soldiers to the same way of thinking, was the question. The office of king had been painted to them in such horrible colours, that there were no hopes of reconciling them suddenly to it, even though bestowed upon their general, to whom they were so much devoted. A contradiction, open and direct, to all past professions, would make them pass, in the eyes of the whole nation, for the most consummate hypocrites, enlisted, by no other than mercenary motives, in the cause of an usurper. Cromwell, therefore, actuated by political motives, protracted the time, and seemed still to oppose the reasonings of the committee; in hopes that by artifice he might be able to reconcile the refractory minds of the soldiers to the new dignity which was offered him.

While the protector argued so much in contradiction both to his judgement and inclination, it is no wonder that his elocution should be involved in darkness. An exact account of this conference remains, and may be regarded as a great curiosity. The members of the committee, in their reasonings, discover judgement, knowledge, elocution: Lord Broghill, in particular, exerts himself on this memorable occasion. But what a contrast, when we pass to the protector's replies! After so singular a manner does Nature distribute her talents, that, in a nation abounding with sense and learning, a man who, by superior personal merit alone, had made his way to supreme dignity, and had even found the parliament so complaisant as to make him a tender of the crown, was yet incapable of expressing himself on this occasion, but in a manner which a peasant of the most ordinary capacity would justly be ashamed of (a).

The opposition which Cromwell dreaded, was not that which came from Lambert and his adherents, whom he now regarded as capital enemies, and whom he was resolved, on the first occasion, to deprive of all power and authority: it was that which he met with in his own family, and from men, who, by interest as well as inclination, were the most devoted to him. Fleetwood had married his daughter: Desborough his sister: yet these men, actuated by principle alone, could by no persuasion be induced to consent that their friend and patron should be invested with regal dignity. They told him, that if he accepted of the crown, they would instantly throw up their commissions, and never afterwards should have it in their power to serve him. Colonel Pride procured a petition against the office of king, signed by a majority of the officers, who were in London and the neighbourhood. Several persons, it is said, had entered into an engagement to murder the protector within a few hours after he should have accepted the offer of the parliament. Some sudden mutiny in the army was dreaded. And upon the whole, Cromwell was at last obliged to refuse that crown, which the representatives of the nation, in the most solemn manner, had tendered to him. Most historians are inclined to blame his choice; but he must be allowed the best judge of his own situation.

The parliament, when the regal dignity was rejected by Cromwell, retained the name of a commonwealth and protector; and it was thought proper to sanctify the government by a seeming choice of the people and their representatives. Instead of the instrument of government, which was the work of the council of officers alone, an humble petition and advice was framed, and offered to the protector by the parliament. This was represented as the great basis of the republican establishment, regulating and limiting the powers of each member of the constitution, and securing the liberty of the people to the most remote posterity. By this deed the authority of protector was in some particulars enlarged: in others, it was considerably diminished. He had the power of nominating his successor; he had a perpetual revenue assigned him, a million a-year for the pay of the fleet and army, three hundred thousand pounds for the support of civil government; and he had authority to name another house, who should enjoy their seats during life, and exercise some functions of the former house of peers. But he abandoned the power assumed in the intervals of parliament, of framing laws with the consent of his council; and he agreed, that no members of either house should be excluded but by the consent of that house of which they were members. The other articles were in the main the same as in the instrument of government. The instrument of government Cromwell had formerly extolled as the most perfect work of human invention: he now represented it as a rotten plank, upon which no man could trust himself without (a) We shall produce any passage at random: for this discourse is all of a piece. "I confess, for it behoves me to deal plainly with you, I must confess, I would say, I hope, I may be understood in this, for indeed I must be tender what I say to such an audience as this; I say, I would be understood, that in this argument I do not make parallel betwixt men of a different mind, and a parliament, which shall have their desires. I know there is no comparison, nor can it be urged upon me, that my words have the least colour that way, because the parliament seems to give liberty to me to say any thing to you; as that, that is a tender of my humble reasons and judgement and opinion to them; and if I think they are such, and will be such to them, and are faithful servants, and will be so to the supreme authority, and the legislative wheresoever it is: If, I say, I should not tell you, knowing their minds to be so, I should not be faithful, if I should not tell you so, to the end you may report it to the parliament: I shall say something for myself, for my own mind, I do profess it, I am not a man scrupulous about words or names of such things I have not: but as I have the word of God, and I hope I shall ever have it, for the rule of my conscience, for my informations; so truly men that have been led in dark paths, through the providence and dispensation of God; why surely it is not to be objected to a man; for who can love to walk in the dark? but providence does so dispose. And though a man may impute his own folly and blindness to providence sinfully, yet it must be at my peril; the case may be that it is the providence of God that doth lead men in darkness; I must need say, that I have had a great deal of experience of providence, and though it is no rule without or against the word, yet it is a very good expositor of the word in many cases." Conference in Whitehall. The great defect in Oliver's speeches consists not in his want of elocution, but in his want of ideas. The sagacity of his actions, and the absurdity of his discourse, form the most prodigious contrast that ever was known. The collection of all his speeches, letters, sermons (for he also wrote sermons), would make a great curiosity, and, with a few exceptions, might justly pass for one of the most nonsensical books in the world. Hume. It should be recollected, however, that Cromwell was not a man of elocution; and that, on such an occasion as this, he spake under an impulse of trepidation.

without sinking. Even the humble petition and advice, which he extolled in its turn, appeared so lame and imperfect, that it was found requisite, this very session, to mend it by a supplement; and after all, it may be regarded as a crude and undigested model of government. It was, however, accepted as the voluntary deed of the whole people in the three united nations; and Cromwell, as if his power had just commenced from this popular consent, was again inaugurated in Westminster Hall, after the most solemn and pompous manner.

The parliament having adjourned itself, on the 26th of June, 1657, the protector deprived Lambert of all his commissions; but still allowed him a pension of two thousand pounds a year, as a bribe for his future peaceable deportment. Lambert's authority in the army, to the surprize of every body, was found immediately to expire with the loss of his commission. Packer and some other officers, whom Cromwell suspected, were also displaced.

Richard, eldest son of the protector, was brought to court, introduced into public business, and thenceforth regarded by many as his heir in the protectorate; though Cromwell sometimes employed the artifice of flattering others with hopes of the succession. Richard was a person possessed of the most peaceable, inoffensive, unambitious character; and had hitherto lived contentedly in the country on a small estate which his wife had brought him. All the activity which he discovered, and which was never great, was however exerted to beneficent purposes: at the time of the king's trial, he had fallen on his knees before his father, and had conjured him, by every tie of duty and humanity, to spare the life of that monarch. Cromwell had two daughters unmarried: one of them he now gave in marriage to the grandson and heir of his great friend, the earl of Warwick, with whom he had, in every fortune, preserved an uninterrupted intimacy and good correspondence. The other he married to the viscount Fauconberg, for he was ambitious of forming connexions with the nobility.

The parliament was again assembled, on the 20th of January, 1658; consisting, as in times of monarchy, of two houses, the commons and the other house. Cromwell, during the interval, had sent writs to his house of peers, which consisted of sixty members. They were composed of five or six ancient peers, of several gentlemen of fortune and distinction, and of some officers who had risen in the army. None of the ancient peers, however, though summoned by writ, accepted of a seat, which they must share with such companions as were assigned them. The protector endeavoured at first to maintain the appearance of a legal magistrate. He placed no guard at the door of either house: but soon found how incompatible liberty is with military usurpations. By bringing so great a number of his friends and adherents into the other house, he had lost the majority among the national representatives. In consequence of a clause in the humble petition and advice, the commons assumed a power of re-admitting those members whom the council had formerly excluded. Sir Arthur Hazelrig and some others, whom Cromwell had created lords, rather chose to take their seat with the commons. An incontestable majority now declared themselves against the protector; and they refused to acknowledge the jurisdiction of that other house which he had established. Even the validity of the humble petition and advice was questioned; as being voted by a parliament which lay under force, and which was deprived, by military violence, of a considerable number of its members. The protector, dreading combinations between the parliament and the malcontents in the army, resolved to allow no leisure for forming any conspiracy against him; and, with expressions of great displeasure, he dissolved the parliament on the 4th of February. When urged by Fleetwood and others of his friends, not to precipitate himself into this rash measure, he swore, by the living God, that they should not sit a moment longer.

But these distractions at home were not able to take off the protector's attention from foreign affairs; and in all his measures he proceeded with the same vigour, as if secure of the duty and attachment of the three kingdoms. His alliance with Sweden he still supported; and he endeavoured to assist that crown in its successful enterprizes, for reducing all its neighbours to subjection, and rendering itself absolute master of the Baltic. As soon as Spain declared war against him, he concluded a peace and an alliance with France, and united himself in all his counsels with that potent and ambitious kingdom. Spain, having long courted in vain the friendship of the protector, was reduced at last to apply to the unfortunate prince. Charles formed a league with Philip, removed his small court to Bruges in the Low Countries, and raised four regiments of his own subjects, whom he employed in the Spanish service. The duke of York, who had, with applause, served some campaigns in the French army, and who had merited the particular esteem of marshal Turenne, now joined his brother, and continued to seek military experience under don John of Austria, and the prince of Condé.

The scheme of foreign politics, adopted by the protector, was highly imprudent, but was suitable to that magnanimity and enterprize, with which he was so signally endowed. He was particularly desirous of conquest and dominion on the continent (b); and he sent over into Flanders six thousand men under Reynolds, who joined the French army commanded by Turenne. In the former campaign, Maardyke was taken, and put into the hands of the English. Early this campaign, siege was laid to Dunkirk; and when the Spanish army advanced to relieve it, the combined armies of France and England marched out of their trenches, and fought the battle of the Dunes, where the Spaniards were totally defeated (c). The valour of the English was much remarked on this occasion. Dunkirk, being soon after surrendered, was by agreement delivered to Cromwell. He committed the government of that important place to Lockhart, a Scotchman of abilities, who had married his niece, and was his ambassador at the court of France.

This acquisition was regarded by the protector as the means only of obtaining farther advantages. He was resolved to concert measures with the French court for the final conquest and partition of the Low Countries. Had he lived much longer, and maintained his authority in England, this project would certainly have been carried into execution. And this first and principal step towards more extensive conquest, would doubtless have been accomplished by the enterprizing politics of Cromwell.

During these transactions, great demonstrations of mutual friendship and regard passed between the French king and the protector. Lord Fauconberg, Cromwell's son-in-law, was dispatched to Louis, then in the camp before Dunkirk; and was received with the regard usually paid to foreign princes by the French court. Mazarin sent to London his nephew Mancini, along with the duke of Crequi; and expressed his regret, that his urgent affairs should deprive him of the honour which he had long wished for, of paying, in person, his respects to the greatest man in the world.

The protector reaped little satisfaction from the success of his arms abroad: the situation in which he stood at home, kept him in perpetual uneasiness and inquietude. His administration, so expensive both by military enterprizes and secret intelligence, had exhausted his revenue, and involved him in a considerable debt. The royalists, he heard, had renewed their conspiracies for a general insurrection; and Ormond was secretly come over with a view of concerting measures for the execution of this project. Lord Fairfax, sir William Waller, and many heads of the Presbyterians, had secretly entered into the engagement. Even the army was infected with the general spirit of discontent; and some sudden and dangerous eruption was dreaded from it. But however zealous the royalists, their conspiracy took not effect: Willis discovered the whole to the protector. Ormond was obliged to (b) He aspired to get possession of Elsinore and the passage of the Sound. See "World's Mistake in Oliver Cromwell." He also endeavoured to get possession of Bremen. Thurloe, vol. vi. p. 478.

(c) It was remarked by the saints of that time, that the battle was fought on a day which was held for a fast in London, so that as Fleetwood said (Thurloe, vol. vii. p. 159.), while we were praying, they were fighting, and the Lord hath given a signal answer. The Lord has not only owned us in our work there, but in our waiting upon him in a way of prayer, which is indeed our old experienced approved way in all streights and difficulties. Cromwell's Letter to Blake and Montague, his brave admirals, is remarkable for the same spirit. Thurloe, vol. iv. p. 744. You have, says he, as I verily believe and am persuaded, a plentiful stock of prayers going for you daily, sent up by the soberest and best approved ministers and Christians in this nation, and, notwithstanding some discouragements, very much wrestling of faith for you, which are to us, and I trust will be to you, matter of great encouragement. But notwithstanding all this, it will be good for you and us to deliver up ourselves and all our affairs to the disposition of our all-wise Father, who not only out of prerogative, but because of his goodness, wisdom, and truth, ought to be resigned unto by his creatures, especially those who are children of his begetting through the spirit, &c.

fly,

fly, and he deemed himself fortunate to have escaped so vigilant an administration. Great numbers were thrown into prison. A high court of justice was again erected for the trial of those criminals whose guilt was most apparent. Notwithstanding the recognition of his authority by the last parliament, the protector could not as yet trust to an unbiassed jury. Sir Henry Slingby, and Dr. Huet, were condemned and beheaded. Mordaunt, brother to the earl of Peterborough, narrowly escaped. The numbers for his condemnation and acquittal were equal; and just as the sentence was pronounced in his favour, colonel Pride, who was resolved to condemn him, came into court. Ashton, Storey, and Bestley, were hanged in different streets of the city.

The conspiracy of the Millenarians in the army struck Cromwell with still greater apprehensions. Harrison and the other discarded officers of that party could not remain at rest. Stimulated equally by revenge, by ambition, and by conscience, they still harboured in their breast some desperate project; and there wanted not officers in the army who, from like motives, were disposed to second their undertakings. The levellers and agitators had been encouraged by Cromwell to interpose with their advice in all political deliberations; and he had even pretended to honour many of them with his intimate friendship, while he conducted his daring enterprizes against the king and the parliament. Among those who were dissatisfied with Cromwell was Sexby; an active agitator, who now employed against him all that restless industry which he had formerly exerted in his favour. He even went so far as to enter into a correspondence with Spain; and Cromwell, who knew the distempers of the army, was justly afraid of some mutiny, to which a day, an hour, an instant, might provide leaders.

Of assassinations likewise he was apprehensive, from the zealous spirit which actuated the soldiers. Sindercome had undertaken to murder him; and, by the most unaccountable accidents, had often been prevented from executing his bloody purpose. His design was discovered; but the protector could never find the bottom of the enterprize, nor detect any of his accomplices. He was tried by a jury; and notwithstanding the general odium attending that crime, notwithstanding the clear and full proof of his guilt, so little conviction prevailed of the protector's right to the supreme government, it was with the utmost difficulty that this conspirator was condemned. When every thing was prepared for his execution, he was found dead in prison the day on which he was to be executed; from poison, as is supposed, which he had voluntarily taken.

The protector might better have supported those fears and apprehensions which the public distempers occasioned, had he enjoyed any domestic satisfaction, or possessed any cordial friend of his own family, in whose bosom he could safely have unloaded his anxious and corroding cares. But Fleetwood, his son-in-law, actuated by the wildest zeal, began to estrange himself from him; and was enraged to discover that Cromwell, in all his enterprizes, had entertained views of promoting his own grandeur, more than of encouraging piety and religion, of which he made such fervent professions. His eldest daughter, married to Fleetwood, had adopted republican principles so vehement, that she could not with patience behold power lodged in a single person, even in her indulgent father. His other daughters were no less prejudiced in favour of the royal cause, and regretted the violences and iniquities into which, they thought, their family had so unhappily been transported. Above all, the sickness of Mrs. Claypole, his peculiar favourite, a lady endued with many humane virtues and amiable accomplishments, depressed his anxious mind, and poisoned all his enjoyments. She had entertained a high regard for Dr. Huet, lately executed; and being refused his pardon, the melancholy of her temper, increased by her distempered body, had prompted her to lament to her father all his sanguinary measures, and urge him to compunction for those heinous crimes into which his fatal ambition had betrayed him. Her death, which followed soon after, gave new edge to every word which she had uttered.

All composure of mind was now for ever fled from the protector: he felt that the grandeur which he had attained with so much guilt and courage, could not ensure him that tranquillity which it belongs to virtue alone, and moderation, fully to ascertain. Overwhelmed with the load of public affairs, dreading perpetually some fatal accident in his distempered government, seeing nothing around him but treacherous friends or enraged enemies, possessing the confidence of no party, resting his title on no principle, civil or religious, he found his power to depend on so delicate a poise of faction and interests, as the smallest event was able, without any preparation, in a moment to overturn. Death too, which, with such signal intrepidity he had braved in the field, being incessantly threatened by the poignards of fanatical or interested assassins, was ever present to his terrified apprehension, and haunted him in every scene of business or repose. Each action of his life betrayed the terrors under which he laboured. The aspect of strangers was uneasy to him: with a piercing and anxious eye he surveyed every face to which he was not daily accustomed. He never moved a step without strong guards attending him: he wore armour under his clothes, and farther secured himself by offensive weapons, a sword, falchion, and pistols, which he always carried about him. He returned from no place by the direct road, or by the same way which he went. Every journey he performed with hurry and precipitation. Seldom he slept above three nights together in the same chamber: and he never let it be known beforehand what chamber he intended to choose, nor entrusted himself in any which was not provided with back doors, at which centinels were carefully placed (d). Society terrified him, while he reflected on his numerous, unknown, and implacable enemies: solitude astonished him, by withdrawing that protection which he found so necessary for his security.

His body also, from the contagion of his anxious mind, began to be affected; and his health seemed sensibly to decline. He was seized with a slow fever, which changed into a tertian ague. For the space of a week, no dangerous symptoms appeared; and in the intervals of the fits he was able to walk abroad. At length the fever increased, and he himself began to entertain some thoughts of death, and to cast his eye towards that future existence, whose idea had once been intimately present to him; though since, in the hurry of affairs, and in the shock of wars and factions, it had, no doubt, been considerably obliterated. He asked Goodwin, one of his preachers, if the doctrine were true, that the elect could never fall or suffer a final reprobation. "Nothing more certain," replied the preacher. "Then am I safe," said the protector: "For I am sure that once I was in a state of grace."

His physicians were sensible of the perilous condition to which his distemper had reduced him: but his chaplains, by their prayers, visions, and revelations, so buoyed up his hopes, that he began to believe his life out of all danger. A favourable answer, it was pretended, had been returned from Heaven to the petitions of all the godly; and he relied on their asseverations much more than on the opinion of the most experienced physicians. "I tell you," he cried with confidence to the latter, "I tell you, I shall not die of this distemper: I am well assured of my recovery. It is promised by the Lord, not only to my supplications, but to those men who hold a stricter commerce and more intimate correspondence with him. Ye may have skill in your profession; but nature can do more than all the physicians in the world, and God is far above nature (e)." Nay, to such a degree of extravagance did their enthusiastic assurances mount, that, upon a fast day, which was observed on his account both at Hampton Court and at Whitehall, they did not so much pray for his health, as give thanks for the undoubted pledges which they had received of his recovery.

Meanwhile all the symptoms began to wear a more fatal aspect; and the physicians were obliged to break silence, and to declare, that the protector could not survive the next fit with which he was threatened. The council was alarmed. A deputation was sent to know his will with regard to his successor. His senses were gone, and he could not now express his intentions. They asked him whether he did not mean that his eldest son, Richard, should succeed him in the protectorship. A simple affirmative was, or seemed to be, extorted from him. Soon after, on the 3d of September, 1658, in the sixtieth year of his age, that very day which he had always considered as the most fortunate for him, he expired (f).

(d) Oliver Cromwell's house at Whitehall, lately pulled down, was a sufficient evidence of this.

(e) Bates: See also Thurloe, vol. vii. p. 355, 416.

(f) On the 3d of September, 1650, he gained the great battle of Dunbar in Scotland; and on the same day in 1651, he overcame Charles at the battle of Worcester.

The writers attached to the memory of this wonderful person, make his character, with regard to abilities, bear the air of the most extravagant panegyric: his enemies form such a representation of his moral qualities as resembles the most virulent invective. Both of them, it must be confessed, are supported by such striking circumstances in his conduct and fortune as bestow on their representation a great air of probability. "What can be more extraordinary," it is said (g), "than that a person of private birth and education, no fortune, no eminent qualities of body, which have sometimes, nor shining talents of mind, which have often, raised men to the highest dignities, should have the courage to attempt, and the abilities to execute, so great a design as the subverting one of the most ancient and best established monarchies in the world? That he should have the power and boldness to put his prince and master to an open and infamous death? Should banish that numerous and strongly allied family? Cover all these temerities under a seeming obedience to a parliament, in whose service he pretended to be retained? Trample too upon that parliament in their turn, and scornfully expel them as soon as they gave him ground of dissatisfaction? Erect in their place the dominion of the saints, and give reality to the most visionary idea, which the heated imagination of any fanatic was ever able to entertain? Suppress again that monster in its infancy, and openly set up himself above all things that ever were called sovereign in England? Overcome first all his enemies by arms, and all his friends afterwards by artifice? Serve all parties patiently for a while, and command them victoriously at last? Overrun each corner of the three nations, and subdue with equal facility, both the riches of the south, and the poverty of the north? Be feared and courted by all foreign princes, and be adopted a brother to the gods of the earth? Call together parliaments with a word of his pen, and scatter them again with the breath of his mouth? Reduce to subjection a warlike and discontented nation, by means of a mutinous army? Command a mutinous army by means of seditious and factious officers? be humbly and daily petitioned, that he would be pleased, at the rate of millions a-year, to be hired as master of those who had hired him before to be their servant? Have the estates and lives of three nations as much at his disposal as was once the little inheritance of his father, and be as noble and liberal in the spending of them? And lastly (for there is no end of enumerating every particular of his glory), with one word bequeath all this power and splendour to his posterity? Die possessed of peace at home, and triumph abroad? Be buried among kings, and with more than regal solemnity; and leave a name behind him not to be extinguished but with the whole world; which as it was too little for his praise, so might it have been for his conquests, if the short line of his mortal life could have stretched out to the extent of his immortal designs?"

"My intention, says Hume, is not to disfigure this picture, drawn by so masterly a hand: I shall only endeavour to remove from it somewhat of the marvellous; a circumstance which, on all occasions, gives much ground for doubt and suspicion. It seems to me, that the circumstance of Cromwell's life, in which his abilities are principally discovered, is his rising from a private station, in opposition to so many rivals, so much advanced before him, to a high command and authority in the army. His great courage, his signal military talents, his eminent dexterity and address, were all requisite for this important acquisition. Yet will not this promotion appear the effect of supernatural abilities, when we consider, that Fairfax himself, a private gentleman, who had not the advantage of a seat in parliament, had, through the same steps, attained even a superior rank, and, if endued with common capacity and penetration, had been able to retain it. To incite such an army to rebellion against the parliament, required no uncommon art or industry: to have kept them in obedience had been the more difficult enterprize. When the breach was once formed between the military and civil powers, a supreme and absolute authority, from that moment, is devolved on the general; and if he be afterwards pleased to employ artifice or policy, it may be regarded, on most occasions, as great condescension, if not superfluous caution. That Cromwell was ever able really to blind or over-reach either the king or the republicans, does not appear: as they possessed no means of resisting the force under his command, they were glad to temporize with him, and, by seeming to be deceived, wait for opportunities of freeing themselves from his dominion. If he seduced the military fanatics, it is to be considered, that their interests and his evidently concurred, that their ignorance and low education exposed them to the grossest imposition, and that he himself was at bottom as frantic an enthusiast as the worst of them, and, in order to obtain their confidence, needed but to display those vulgar and ridiculous habits, which he had early acquired, and on which he set so high a value. An army is so forcible, and at the same time so coarse a weapon, that any hand, which wields it, may, without much dexterity, perform any operation, and attain any ascendant, in human society.

"The domestic administration of Cromwell, though it discovers great abilities, was conducted without any plan either of liberty or arbitrary power: perhaps, his difficult situation admitted of neither. His foreign enterprizes, though full of intrepidity, were pernicious to national interest, and seem more the result of impetuous fury or narrow prejudices, than of cool foresight and deliberation. An eminent personage, however, he was in many respects, and even a superior genius; but unequal and irregular in his operations. And though not defective in any talent, except that of elocution, the abilities, which in him were most admirable, and which most contributed to his marvellous success, were the magnanimous resolution of his enterprizes, and his peculiar dexterity in discovering the characters, and practising on the weaknesses of mankind.

"If we survey the moral character of Cromwell with that indulgence which is due to the blindness and infirmities of the human species, we shall not be inclined to load his memory with such violent reproaches as those which his enemies usually throw upon it. Amidst the passions and prejudices of that period, that he should prefer the parliamentary to the royal cause, will not appear extraordinary; since, even at present, some men of sense and knowledge are disposed to think that the question, with regard to the justice of the quarrel, may be regarded as doubtful and uncertain. The murder of the king, the most atrocious of all his actions, was to him covered under a mighty cloud of republican and fanatical illusions; and it is not impossible, but he might believe it, as many others did, the most meritorious action that he could perform. His subsequent usurpation was the effect of necessity, as well as of ambition; nor is it easy to see, how the various factions could at that time have been restrained, without a mixture of military and arbitrary authority. The private deportment of Cromwell, as a son, a husband, a father, a friend, is exposed to no considerable censure, if it does not rather merit praise. And, upon the whole, his character does not appear more extraordinary and unusual by the mixture of so much absurdity with so much penetration, than by his tempering such violent ambition and such enraged fanaticism with so much regard to justice and humanity."

Cromwell was of a robust frame of body, and of a manly, though not of an agreeable aspect. He left only two sons, Richard and Henry; and three daughters; one married to general Fleetwood, another to lord Fauconberg, a third to lord Rich. His father died when he was young. His mother lived till after he was protector; and, contrary to her orders, he buried her with great pomp in Westminster Abbey. She was of a good family, of the name of Stuart; remotely allied, as is by some supposed, to the royal family (h).

(h) We shall here give some account of Oliver Cromwell and his family. Oliver Cromwell, who has been reproached with being meanly descended, was born on the 25th of April, 1599. His great-great-grandfather was Morgan Williams, who married the sister of Thomas baron Cromwell, of Oakham, earl of Essex, beheaded 32 Henry VIII. July 28, 1540. His great-grandfather sir Richard Williams, knight, took the name of Cromwell: this gentleman married Frances, daughter and coheir of sir Thomas Murfyn, lord mayor of London in 1518. His grandfather was sir Henry Cromwell of Hinchinbrook, knighted 6 Elizabeth, 1563, who died in 1603: he married Joan, daughter and at length heir of sir Ralph Warren, lord mayor of London in 1536; she died October 12, 1584. His father was Robert Cromwell of Huntingdon, (second son of sir Henry Cromwell,) who died about 1617: he married Elizabeth, daughter of sir Thomas Steward of Ely; she died November 18, 1654. Oliver Cromwell (the Protector) was the fourth child of his father: he married Elizabeth, daughter of sir James Bourchier, of Felsted, in the county of Essex; she was buried at Wicken September 18, 1672. His son Richard, who succeeded him in the Protectorate, was born October 4, 1626, and died at Cheshunt, in Hertfordshire, July 13, 1712, aged eighty-five: he married in May 1649, Dorothy, daughter and coheiress

CHAP. VI.

RICHARD CROMWELL, PROTECTOR.

ON the death of Oliver Cromwell, the council recognized the succession of his son Richard (i). Fleetwood, in whose favour, it was asserted, Cromwell had formerly made a will, renounced all claim or pretension to the protectorship (k): Henry, Richard's brother, who governed Ireland with popularity, ensured him the obedience of that kingdom: Monk, whose authority was well established in Scotland, apparently much attached to the family of Cromwell, immediately proclaimed the new protector: the army and the fleet, in all parts, acknowledged his title: above ninety addresses, from the counties and most considerable corporations, congratulated him on his accession, in all the terms of dutiful allegiance: foreign ministers were forward in paying him the usual compliments: and Richard, whose moderate, unambitious character never would have led him to contend for empire, was tempted to accept of so rich an inheritance, which seemed to be tendered to him by the consent of the nation.

A parliament was now called, in order to obtain supplies, both for the ordinary administration, and for fulfilling those engagements with foreign princes, particularly Sweden, into which the late protector had entered. The house of peers consisted of the same persons that had been appointed by Oliver. On the 7th of January, 1659, all the members of the house of commons, at first, signed, without hesitation, an engagement not to alter the present government. They next proceeded to examine The humble Petition and Advice; and after great opposition and vehement debates, it was carried by the court-party heiress of Richard Major, of Hursley, in Hampshire, esq. she died January 5, 1675, aged forty-nine.

Oliver Cromwell was born in the most ancient or back part of the priory house at Huntingdon, which had been granted to his grandfather sir Henry Cromwell, and was then in the occupation of his father Robert, now (or lately) in that of the reverend Mr. Trollop. It has a brick casemated front, probably of the fifteenth century; but two or three rooms remain behind nearly in their original state; and part of the old walls are incorporated with the newer body. In the yard are old stone walls with arched doors and windows. The Protector's birth is thus entered in the register of St. John Baptist's church in Huntingdon: "Anno Domini 1599. Oliverus filius Roberti Cromwell gener. et Elizabeth ux. ejus, natus vicesimo quinto die Aprilis, et baptisatus vicesimo nono ejusdem mensis."

He died September 3, 1658, and was buried November 23 following. The following passage is taken from the "Public Intelligencer," No. 141. From Monday, August 30, to Monday, September 6, 1658.

"Whitehall, September 3.

"His most serene and renowned highness Oliver Lord Protector, being after a sickness of about fourteen days (which appeared an ague in the beginning) reduced to a very low condition of body, began early this morning to draw near the gate of death; and it pleased God, about three o'clock this afternoon, to put a period to his life. I would willingly express, upon this sad occasion, the deep sorrow which hath possessed the minds of his most noble son and successor, and other dearest relations, had I language sufficient. But all that I can use will fall short of the merits of that most excellent prince. His first undertakings for the public interest, his working things all along, as it were, out of the rock, his founding a military discipline in these nations, such as is not to be found in any example of preceding times; and whereby the noble soldiery of these nations may (without flattery) be commended for piety, moderation, and obedience, as a pattern to be imitated, but hardly to be equaled, by succeeding generations: his wisdom and piety in things divine, his prudence in management of the civil affairs, and conduct of the military, and admirable successes in all, made him a prince indeed among the people of God; by whose prayers being lifted up to the supreme dignity, he became more highly seated in their hearts, because in all his actings it was evident, that the main design was to make his own interest one and the same with theirs, that it might be subserving to the great interest of Jesus Christ.

"And in the promoting of this his spirit knew no bounds, his affection could not be confined at home, but brake forth into foreign parts, where he was by good men universally admired as an extraordinary person raised up of God, and by them owned as the great protector and patron of the Evangelical profession. This being said, and the world itself witness of it, I can only add, that God gave him blessings proportionable to all those virtues, and made him a blessing to us, by his wisdom and valour to secure our peace and liberty, and to revive the ancient renown and reputation of our native country.

"After all this, it is remarkable, how it pleased the Lord on this day to take him to rest, it having formerly been a day of labours to him; for which both himself and the day (September 3,) will be most renowned to posterity, it having been to him a day of triumphs and thanksgiving for the memorable victories of Dunbar and Worcester; a day, which after so many strange revolutions of Providence, high contradictions, and wicked conspiracies of unreasonable men, he lived once again to see, and then to die, with great assurances and serenity of mind, peaceably in his bed.

"Thus it hath been proved to him to be a day of triumph indeed, there being much of Providence in it, that after so glorious crowns of victory placed on his head by God on this day, having neglected an earthly crown, he should now go to receive the crown of everlasting life."

The "Public Intelligencer," No. 144. From Monday, September 20, to Monday, September 27, 1658, contains the following:

Whitehall, September 20.

"This night, the corpse of his late Highness was removed hence in a private manner, being attended only by his own servants, viz. the lord chamberlain, and the comptroller of his Highness's household, the gentlemen of his bed chamber, the gentlemen of the household, the gentlemen of the life-guard, the guard of halberdiers, and many other officers and servants of his Highness. Two heralds, or officers of arms, went next before the body, which, being placed in a hearse drawn by six horses, was conveyed to Somerset House, where it rests some daies more private, but afterwards will be exposed in state to public view."

The "Public Intelligencer," No 148. From Monday, October 18, to Monday, October 25, 1658, contains, "A particular and exact relation how Somerset House is prepared for the effigies, or representation of his late Highness, by particular order of the lords of the council, which was first shewed publicly on Monday last," that is, October 18.

The "Public Intelligencer," No. 152. From Monday, November 22, to Monday, November 29, 1658, contains an exact account of the funeral of the Protector, which took place on the 23rd of November, in Westminster Abbey.

Notwithstanding the positive declaration of the "Public Intelligencer," the fate of the Protector's corpse after his decease is variously reported. The Thames, Naseby Field, and Westminster Abbey, are all severally assigned as its repository. Dr. Cromwell Mortimer had the mason's receipt for taking it up at the Restoration; and the "Gesta Britannorum," at the end of Warton's Almanac for 1663, records the event, as does Seymour's Survey of London, 1735. Gent. Mag. 1783, p. 846. Whether Cromwell had the vanity to rank among kings in his death, no apology can be made for the mean revenge taken on his putrid carcase five years after its commitment to its peaceful mansion.

The following inscription was taken from the impression of a copper plate, gilt, found in a leaden canister, lying on the breast of the corpse, when the grave and coffin of Oliver Cromwell was broken open by order of government, after the Restoration, in order to have his body hanged at Tyburn, viz.

"Oliverius, Protector Reipublicæ
Angliæ, Scotiæ, et Hiberniæ,
Natus 25to Aprilis, Anno 1599.
Inauguratus 16° Decembris,
1653.
Mortuus 3° Septembris,
Anno 1658°, hic situs est."

The following is the mason's receipt for taking up the body of Oliver Cromwell, copied from the original, by Dr. Cromwell Mortimer:

"May the 4th day, 1661. Received then in full of the worshipful Serjeant Norfolke, fifteen shillings, for taking up the bodies of Cromwell, and Ireton, and Bradshaw."

Near Oliver Cromwell's tomb was found the body of his daughter Elizabeth, who married John Claypole, of Narborough, in the county of Northampton, esquire, master of the horse to Oliver Cromwell: she died at Hampton Court, and was buried with great pomp in Westminster Abbey, Aug. 7, 1658, where was a silver plate, containing her name, titles, &c. The inscription was in Latin; and this lady's body was the only one not taken up at the Restoration: so far did the littleness of party carry men in those days! The bodies were discovered in the north transept of Westminster Abbey, near where the duke of Newcastle's monument stands, not far from the steps of Henry the Seventh's tomb. The plate and canister containing the above inscription were preserved by serjeant Norfolk, then serjeant at arms to the house of commons, who left it to his daughter Mary, the wife of Hope Gifford, esq. at Colchester, whose daughter Mary married sir Anthony Abdy, of Felix Hall, Essex, bart. who left it to his third wife, by whose permission Dr. Cromwell Mortimer, secretary to the Royal Society, obtained the impression in the year 1739, from the original plate, which was in 1773 in possession of the honourable George Hobart, of Nocton, in the county of Lincoln, and which was shewn to the Society of Antiquaries by Mr. Willes, Fellow of the Antiquary Society, in March, 1787-8.—The above facts incontestably prove, that Oliver Cromwell was really buried in Westminster Abbey, notwithstanding the assertions of several historians to the contrary.

"A bill of sundry particulars for funerall of His Serene Highness Oliver Lord Protector," dated 6 September, 1658, amounted to one thousand and seventy-four pounds nineteen shillings and six pence.

"Worke bespoke, provided, and done, for the standing hearse at Westminster Abbey, &c. agreed for—between Mr. Barrington, clarke of the Greene Cloth, Mr. Maydstone, cofferer, and Mr. Waterhouse, steward, Mr. Kinardsley, wardrobe-keeper-assistant," amounted to seven hundred and thirty-nine pounds six shillings.

"Account and expences attending the paynting worke prepared and done for the right worshipfull company of the Cloth-workers in October, 1658, for the ceremonial or funeral of his Highness Oliver Cromwell," (Ireton, Mayor, and free thereof,) amounted to one hundred and sixty-four pounds eight shillings.

The above are extracted from copies of the bills at length penes the Editor.

(i) Richard Cromwell was a young man of no experience, was educated in the country, accustomed to a retired life, unacquainted with the officers, recommended by no military exploits, and endeared by no familiarities, therefore it was supposed he could not long maintain that authority, which his father had acquired by so many valorous atchievements and such signal successes. He possessed the virtues of private life in an eminent degree; but indolence and irresolution attended his facility and good nature; so that the hopes of the various parties which had divided the nation were excited by the expectation of some great event or revolution.

(k) This was, however, the assertion only of some interested persons; for it doth not appear, from any authentic document, that Oliver Cromwell even made such a promise to Fleetwood.

to confirm it. An acknowledgement too of the authority of the other house was obtained; though it was resolved not to treat this house of peers with any greater respect than they should return to the commons. A declaration was also made, that the establishment of the other house should not in any wise prejudice the right of such of the ancient peers as had, from the beginning of the war, adhered to the parliament. But in all these proceedings, by the opposition among the commons, the debates were prolonged, business was retarded, and alarm given to the partizans of the young protector.

There was yet another quarter from which greater dangers were apprehended. The most considerable officers of the army, and even Fleetwood, brother-in-law to the protector, who had married Oliver Cromwell's daughter, were entering into cabals against him. The whole republican party in the army, which was still considerable, Fitz, Mason, Moss, Farley, united themselves to general Fleetwood. The officers too of the same party, whom Cromwell had discarded, Overton, Ludlow, Rich, Okey, Alured, began to appear, and to recover that authority which had been only for a time suspended. A party likewise, who found themselves eclipsed in Richard's favour, Sydenham, Kelsey, Berry, Haines, joined the cabal of the others. Even Desborough, the protector's uncle, lent his authority to that faction. But, above all, the intrigues of Lambert inflamed all those humours, and threatened the nation with some great convulsion. The discontented officers established their meetings in Fleetwood's apartments; and because he dwelt in Wallingford House, the party received a denomination from that place.

Richard, who was a good-natured inoffensive person, and who possessed neither resolution nor penetration, was prevailed on to give a consent for calling a general council of officers, who might make him proposals, as they pretended, for the good of the army. No sooner were they assembled than they voted a remonstrance; in which they lamented, that "the good old cause," as they termed it, was entirely neglected; and they proposed as a remedy, that the whole military power should be entrusted to some person, in whom they might all confide. The city militia, influenced by two aldermen, Tichburn and Ireton, expressed the same resolution of adhering to "the good old cause."

The protector now began to take alarm at these movements among the officers, but he possessed none of those arts which were proper to gain an enthusiastic army. Murmurs being thrown out against some promotions which he had made, "Would you have me," said he, "prefer none but the godly? Here is Dick Ingoldsby," continued he, "who can neither pray nor preach; yet will I trust him before ye all." This imprudence gave great offence to the officers; and when some of his party offered to put an end to those intrigues by the death of Lambert, he declared, that he would not purchase power or dominion by such sanguinary means.

The parliament was no less alarmed at the military cabals. They voted that there should be no meeting or general council of officers, except with the protector's consent, or by his orders. This vote brought affairs immediately to a rupture. The officers hastened to Richard, and demanded of him the dissolution of the parliament. The protector wanted the resolution to deny, and possessed little ability to resist. The parliament was dissolved; and by the same act, the protector was, by every one, considered as effectually dethroned. Soon after, on the 22nd of April, 1659, he signed his demission in form. His brother Henry, deputy of Ireland, likewise resigned his command, and retired to England (l).

The council of officers, now possessed of supreme authority, deliberated what form of government they should establish. They applied to Lenthal, the speaker, and proposed to him, that the parliament should resume their seats. Lenthal being uncertain what issue might attend these measures, was desirous of evading the proposal; and replied, that he could by no means comply with the desire of the officers; being engaged in a business of far greater importance to himself, which he could not omit on any account, because it concerned the salvation of his own soul. The officers pressed him to tell what that business was. He was preparing, he said, to participate of the Lord's supper, which he resolved to take next Sabbath. They insisted, that mercy was preferable to sacrifice, and that he could not better prepare himself for that great duty, than by contributing to the public service. All their remonstrances were in vain. However, on the appointed day, the speaker, being informed that a quorum of the house was likely to meet, thought proper to join them; and the house immediately proceeded upon business. The secluded members attempted, but in vain, to resume their seats among them.

The numbers of this parliament were small, little exceeding seventy members: their authority in the nation, ever since they had been purged by the army, was extremely diminished; and after their expulsion, had been totally annihilated: but they were resolved not to act a subordinate part to those who acknowledged themselves their servants. They chose a council, in which they took care that the officers of Wallingford House should not be the majority: they appointed Fleetwood lieutenant-general, but inserted in his commission, that it should only continue during the pleasure of the house: they chose seven persons, who should nominate to such commands as became vacant: and they voted, that all commissions should be received from the speaker, and be assigned by him in the name of the house. These precautions gave great disgust to the general officers.

The majority of the nation now consisted of royalists and Presbyterians; and to both these parties the dominion of the parliament had generally been odious. When that assembly was expelled by Cromwell, contempt had succeeded to hatred; and no reserve had been used in expressing the utmost derision against the impotent ambition of these usurpers. A secret reconciliation was made between the rival parties; and it was agreed, that all efforts should be used for the overthrow of the rump; so they called the parliament, in allusion to that part of the animal body. The Presbyterians, sensible that their passion for liberty had carried them into unwarrantable excesses, were willing to lay aside former jealousies, and, at all hazards, to restore the royal family. The nobility and the gentry bent their endeavours to the same purport, by which alone they apprehended they could be redeemed from slavery. And no man was so remote from party as not to wish for the dissolution of that tyranny which, whether the civil or the military part of it were considered, appeared equally oppressive and ruinous to the nation.

Mordaunt, who had so narrowly escaped on his trial before the high court of justice, seemed rather animated than daunted with past danger; and having obtained the confidence of the royal party, he was now become the centre of their conspiracies. In many counties, a resolution was taken to rise in arms. Lord Willoughby of Parham and sir Horatio Townshend undertook to secure Lynne; general Massey engaged to seize Gloucester: lord Newport, Littleton, and others, conspired to take possession of Shrewsbury; sir George Booth of Chester; sir Thomas Middleton of North Wales; Arundel, Pollar, Granville, Trelawney, of Plymouth and Exeter. A day was appointed for the execution of all these enterprizes. And the king, attended by the duke of York, had secretly arrived at Calais, with a resolution of putting himself at the head of their partizans. The French court had promised to supply him with a small body of forces, to countenance the insurrections of the English.

This combination was disconcerted by sir Richard Willis. He continued with the parliament the same correspondence which he had begun with Cromwell. He had engaged to reveal all conspiracies, so far as to destroy their effect; but reserved to himself the power of concealing the conspirators. He therefore betrayed only the new converts among the Presbyterians, or such lukewarm royalists, as were resolved to expose themselves to no more hazards.

Many of the conspirators in the different counties were (l) Thus fell suddenly, and from an enormous height, but by a rare fortune, without any hurt or injury, the family of the Cromwells. Richard continued to possess an estate, which was moderate, and burthened too with a large debt, which he had contracted for the interment of his father. After the restoration, though he remained unmolested, he thought proper to travel for some years; and at Pezenas, in Languedoc, he was introduced, under a borrowed name, to the prince of Conti. That prince, talking of English affairs, broke out into admiration of Cromwell's courage and capacity. "But as for that poor pitiful fellow, Richard," said he, "what has become of him? How could he be such a blockhead as to reap no greater benefit from all his father's crimes and successes?" Richard extended his peaceful and quiet life to an extreme old age, and died not till the latter end of queen Anne's reign. His social virtues, more valuable than the greatest capacity, met with a recompense, more precious than noisy fame, and more suitable, contentment and tranquillity.

thrown into prison, in July: others, astonished at such symptoms of secret treachery, left their houses, or remained quiet: very stormy weather prevailed during the whole time appointed for the rendezvouses; so that some found it impossible to join their friends, and others were dismayed with fear and superstition at an incident so unusual during the summer season. Of all the projects, the only one which took effect was that of sir George Booth for the seizing of Chester. The earl of Derby, lord Herbert of Cherbury, Mr. Lee, colonel Morgan, entered into this enterprize. Sir William Middleton joined Booth with some troops from North Wales; and the malcontents were powerful enough to subdue all who ventured to oppose them in that neighbourhood. In their declaration they made no mention of the king: they only demanded a free and full parliament.

Booth was of a family eminently Presbyterian; and his conjunction with the royalists they regarded as a dangerous symptom. They had many officers whose fidelity they could more depend on than that of Lambert; but there was no one in whose vigilance and capacity they reposed such confidence. Booth imprudently ventured out of the walls of Chester, and was soon routed and taken prisoner. His whole army was dispersed.

This success hastened the ruin of the parliament. Lambert, at the head of a body of troops, was no less dangerous to them than Booth. A thousand pounds, which they sent him to buy a jewel, were employed by him in liberalities to his officers. At his instigation they drew up a petition, and transmitted it to Fleetwood (m).

The parliament, alarmed at the danger, cashiered Lambert, Desborough, Berry, Clarke, Barrow, Kelsey, and Cobbet. Sir Arthur Hazelrig proposed the impeachment of Lambert for high treason. Fleetwood's commission was vacated, and the command of the army was vested in seven persons, of whom that general was one. The parliament voted, that they would have no more general officers. And they declared it high treason to levy any money without consent of parliament.

Lambert immediately drew some troops together, in order to decide the controversy. Okey, who was leading his regiment to the assistance of the parliament, was deserted by them. Morley and Moss brought their regiments into Palace Yard, resolute to oppose the violence of Lambert. But that general knew an easy way of disappointing them. He placed his soldiers in the streets which lead to Westminster Hall, on the 13th of October. When the speaker came in his coach, he ordered the horses to be turned, and very civilly conducted him home. The other members were in like manner intercepted. And the two regiments in Palace Yard, observing that they were exposed to derision, peaceably retired to their quarters.

The officers found themselves again invested with supreme authority, of which they intended for ever to retain the substance, however they might bestow on others the empty shadow. They elected, on the 26th of the same month, a committee of twenty-three persons, of whom seven were officers. These they pretended to invest with sovereign authority; and they called them a Committee of Safety. They spoke every where of summoning a parliament chosen by the people; but they really took some steps towards assembling a military parliament, composed of officers elected from every regiment in the service.

While England continued in this distracted condition, the other kingdoms of Europe were hastening towards a composure of those differences by which they had so long been agitated. The parliament, while it preserved authority, instead of following the politics of Cromwell, and lending assistance to the conquering Swede, embraced the maxims of the Dutch commonwealth, and resolved to mediate by force and accommodation between the northern crowns. Montague was sent with a squadron to the Baltic, and carried with him as ambassador Algernon Sidney, the celebrated republican. Sidney found the Swedish monarch employed in the siege of Copenhagen, the capital of his enemy; and was highly pleased, that, with a Roman arrogance, he could check the progress of royal victories, and display in so signal a manner the superiority of freedom above tyranny. With the highest indignation, the ambitious prince was obliged to submit to the imperious mediation of England and Holland. "It is cruel," said he, "that laws should be prescribed me by parricides and pedlars." But his whole army being enclosed in an island by the combined squadrons of England and Holland, he was obliged to quit his prey; and having agreed to a pacification with Denmark, he retired into his own country, where he soon after expired.

The affairs of England were in great disorder, and the king, reduced to despair by the failure of all enterprizes for his restoration, was resolved to try the weak resource of foreign succours; but in this experiment he was disappointed. Yet fortune, by a surprising revolution, was now paving the way for the king to ascend the throne of his ancestors. It was by the machinations of general Monk (n), that this change was at last accomplished.

It was well known that a rivalship had long subsisted between Monk and Lambert; and but little friendship had ever subsisted between him and the parliamentary leaders. How early he entertained designs for the king's restoration, we know not with certainty: it is likely, that as soon as Richard was deposed, he thought that without such an expedient, it would be impossible to bring the nation to a regular settlement. His elder and younger brothers were devoted to the royal cause: the Granvilles, his near relations, and all the rest of his kindred, were in the same interests. His early engagements had been with the king, and he had left that service without receiving any disgust from the royal family. Since he had inlisted himself with the opposite party, he had been guilty of no violence or rigour, which might render him an object of their hatred. His return, therefore, to loyalty was easy; and nothing could be supposed to counterbalance his natural propensity to that measure, except the views of his own elevation, and the prospect of usurping the same grandeur and authority which had been assumed by Cromwell. But from such projects, the moderation of his temper seemed to have set him at a distance. Cromwell himself, he always asserted, could not long have maintained his usurpation; and any other person, even equal to him in genius, would now find it difficult to practise arts, of which every one, from experience, was sufficiently aware. It is more agreeable, therefore, to suppose that Monk had entertained views of effecting the king's restoration; nor ought any objections, derived from his profound silence even to Charles himself, be regarded as considerable. His temper was naturally reserved; so that upon the (m) The import of this petition was, that Fleetwood should be made commander in chief, Lambert major-general, Desborough lieutenant-general of the horse, Monk major-general of the foot. To which a demand was added, that no officer should be dismissed from his command but by a court-martial.

(n) George Monk, to whom the fate was reserved of re-establishing monarchy, and finishing the dissensions of three kingdoms, was the second son of a family in Devonshire, ancient and honourable, but lately fallen to decay. He betook himself, in early youth, to the profession of arms; and was engaged in the unfortunate expeditions to Cadiz and the isle of Rhé. After England had concluded peace with all her neighbours, he sought military experience in the Low Countries, the great school of war to all the European nations; and he rose to the command of a company under lord Goring. When the sound of war was first heard in this island, Monk returned to England, partly desirous of promotion in his native country, partly disgusted with some ill usage from the States. Upon the Scottish pacification, he was employed by the earl of Leicester against the Irish rebels; and having obtained a regiment, was soon taken notice of, for his military skill, and for his calm and deliberate valour. Without ostentation, expence, or caresses, merely by his humane and equal temper, he gained the good-will of the soldiery. When the Irish army was called over into England he had even been suspended from his command, and ordered to Oxford, that he might answer the charges laid against him. Upon his earnest protestations and declarations, he was restored to his regiment, which he joined at the siege of Nantwich. The day after his arrival, Fairfax attacked and defeated the royalists, commanded by Biron; and took colonel Monk prisoner. He was sent to the Tower, where he endured, about two years, all the rigours of poverty and confinement, and it was not till after the royalists were totally subdued, that he recovered his liberty. Monk, however distressed, had always refused the most inviting offers from the parliament; but Cromwell, having solicited him to engage in the wars against the Irish, he was not unwilling to repair his broken fortunes by accepting a command which, he flattered himself, was reconcilable to the strictest principles of honour. Having once engaged with the parliament, he was obliged to obey orders; and found himself necessitated to fight, both against the marquis of Ormond in Ireland, and against the king himself in Scotland. Upon the reduction of the latter kingdom, Monk was left with the supreme command. No less acceptable was his authority to the officers and soldiers; and foreseeing, that the good will of the army under his command might some time be of great service to him, he had, with much care and success, cultivated their friendship. The connexions which he had formed with Cromwell, his benefactor, preserved him faithful to Richard, who had been enjoined by his father to follow in every thing the directions of general Monk. When the long parliament was restored, Monk, who was not prepared for opposition, acknowledged their authority, and was continued in his command, from which it would not have been safe to attempt dislodging him. After the army had expelled the parliament, he protested against the violence, and resolved, as he pretended, to vindicate their invaded privileges. Deeper designs, either in the king's favour or his own, were, from the beginning, suspected to be the motive of his actions.

whole, it seems hard to interpret that conduct, which was a disparagement of his probity.

Sir John Granville, hoping that the general would engage in the king's service, sent into Scotland his younger brother, a clergyman, Dr. Monk, who carried him a letter and invitation from the king. When the doctor arrived, he found that his brother was then holding a council of officers, and was not to be seen for some hours. In the mean time, he was received and entertained by Price, the general's chaplain, a strong partizan of the king's. The doctor, having an entire confidence in the chaplain, talked freely to him about the object of his journey, and engaged him, if there should be occasion, to second his applications. At last, the general arrives; the brothers embrace; and after some preliminary conversation, the doctor opens his business. Monk interrupted him, to know whether he had ever before to any body mentioned the subject. "To no body," replied his brother, "but to Price, whom I know to be entirely in your confidence." The general, altering his countenance, turned the discourse; and would enter into no farther confidence with him, but sent him away with the first opportunity. He would not trust his own brother, the moment he knew that he had disclosed the secret; though to a man whom he himself could have trusted.

Hearing that Lambert was advancing northward with his army, Monk sent Clobery, and two other commissioners to London, with professions of his inclination to peace, and with offers of terms for an accommodation. A treaty was signed by Monk's commissioners; but he refused to ratify it, and complained that they had exceeded their powers. He desired, however, to enter into a new negociation at Newcastle. The committee willingly accepted this fallacious offer.

In November, these military sovereigns found themselves surrounded on all hands with inextricable difficulties. The nation had fallen into total anarchy; and by refusing the payment of all taxes, reduced the army to the greatest necessities. While Lambert's forces were assembling at Newcastle, Hazelrig, Morley, and Walton took possession of Portsmouth, and declared for the parliament. A party, sent to suppress them, was persuaded by their commander to join in the same declaration. Admiral Lawson with his squadron came into the river, and declared for the parliament. Hazelrig and Morley, hearing of this important event, left Portsmouth, and advanced towards London. The regiments near that city being solicited by their old officers, who had been cashiered by the committee of safety, revolted again to the parliament. Desborough's regiment, being sent by Lambert to support his friends, no sooner arrived at St. Albans, than it declared for the same assembly.

When Fleetwood, who was not vigorous enough to support his authority, received intelligence of any murmurs among the soldiers, he would prostrate himself in prayer, and could hardly be prevailed with to join the troops. Even when among them, he would, in the midst of any discourse, invite them all to prayer, and put himself on his knees before them. If any of his friends exhorted him to more vigour, they could get no other answer, than that God had spitten in his face, and would not hear him. Men now ceased to wonder, why Lambert had promoted him to the office of general, and had contented himself with the second command in the army.

On the 26th of December, Lenthal, the speaker, being invited by the officers, again assumed authority, and summoned the parliament, which twice before had been expelled with so much reproach and ignominy. As soon as assembled, they repealed their act against the payment of excise and customs; they appointed commissioners for assigning quarters to the army; and, without taking any notice of Lambert, they sent orders to the forces under his command immediately to repair to those quarters which were appointed them.

Lambert, on the 1st of January, 1660, was in a very disconsolate condition. Monk, he saw, had passed the Tweed at Coldstream, and was advancing upon him. His own soldiers deserted him in multitudes, and joined the enemy. Lord Fairfax too, he heard, had raised forces behind him, and had possessed himself of York, without declaring his purpose. The last orders of the parliament so entirely stripped him of his army, that there remained not with him above a hundred horse: all the rest went to their quarters; and he himself was, some time after, committed to the Tower. The other officers, who had formerly been cashiered by the parliament, were again cashiered and confined to their houses. Sir Harry Vane and some members, who had concurred with the committee of safety, were ordered into a like confinement. And the parliament now seemed to be again possessed of more absolute authority than ever, and to be without any danger of opposition or control. The republican party was at this time guided by Hazelrig and Vane, who were of opposite characters, and strenuously hated each other.

Monk, though informed of the restoration of the parliament, from whom he received no orders, still advanced with his army, which was nearly six thousand men: the scattered forces in England were above five times more numerous. Fairfax, who had resolved to declare for the king, not being able to make the general open his intentions, retired to his own house in Yorkshire. In all counties through which Monk passed, the prime gentry flocked to him with addresses; expressing their desire, that he would be instrumental in restoring the nation to peace and tranquillity, and to the enjoyment of those liberties which, during so many years, they had been fatally deprived of. Monk pretended not to favour these addresses; but the anarchy, which now prevailed; the experience of past distractions, the dread of future convulsions, and the indignation against military usurpation, had united every party, except the most desperate, into a desire for the king's restoration.

Scot and Robinson were sent as deputies by the parliament, under pretence of congratulating the general, but in reality to serve as spies upon him. The city dispatched four of their principal citizens to perform like compliments, and at the same time to confirm the general in his inclination to a free parliament. The parliamentary deputies received several insults, which the general pretended to disapprove.

Monk continued his march with few interruptions to St. Albans. He there sent a message to the parliament; desiring them to remove from London those regiments which had so lately offered violence to that assembly. This message was unexpected, and exceedingly perplexed the house; however, they found it necessary to comply. But one regiment quartered in Somerset House, expressly refused to yield their place to the northern army, though they were at last obliged to submit, and Monk with his army took quarters in Wesminster, on the 3rd of February, 1660.

The general was introduced to the house on the 6th; and thanks were given him by Lenthal for the eminent services which he had done his country. Monk told the house, that the services, which he had been enabled to perform, were no more than his duty, and merited not such praises as those with which they were pleased to honour him. That among many persons of greater worth, who bore their commission, he had been employed as the instrument of providence for affecting their restoration; but he considered this service as a step only to more important services, which it was their part to render to the nation: that while on his march, he observed all ranks of men, in all places, to be in earnest expectation of a settlement, after the violent convulsions to which they had been exposed; and to have no prospect of that blessing but from the dissolution of the present parliament, and from the summoning of a new one, free and full, who, meeting without oaths or engagements, might finally give contentment to the nation: that applications had been made to him for that purpose; but that he, sensible of his duty, had still told the petitioners, that the parliament itself, which was now free and would soon be full, was the best judge of all these measures, and that the whole community ought to acquiesce in their determination: that though he expressed himself in this manner to the people, he must now freely inform the house, that the fewer engagements were exacted, the more comprehensive would their plan prove, and the more satisfaction would it give to the nation: and that it was sufficient for public security, if the fanatical party and the royalists were excluded; since the principles of these factions were destructive either of government or of liberty.

This hypocritical speech kept every one in suspense, and upheld that uncertainty, in which it seemed the general's interest to retain the public. But it was impossible for the kingdom to remain long in doubt: the people, as well as the parliament, pushed matters to a decision. During the late convulsions, the payment of taxes had been interrupted; and so little reverence did the people now pay to the parliament, that they gave slow and unwilling obedience to their commands. The common-council of London positively refused to submit to an assessment required of them; and declared that, till a free and lawful parliament imposed taxes, they never should deem it their duty to make any payment. This resolution, if yielded to, would immediately have put an end to the dominion of the parliament: they were determined, therefore, upon this occasion to make at once a full experiment of their own power and of their general's obedience.

Monk received orders, on the 9th of February, to march into the city; to seize twelve persons, the most hateful to the parliament; to remove the posts and chains from all the streets; and to take down and break the portcullises and gates of the city; and very few hours were allowed him to deliberate upon the execution of these orders. To the great surprize and consternation of all men, Monk prepared himself for obedience. Neglecting the entreaties of his friends, and the remonstrances of his officers, he entered the city in a military manner; he apprehended as many as he could of the proscribed persons, whom he sent to the Tower; with all the circumstances of contempt he broke the gates and portcullises; and having exposed the city to the scorn and derision of all who hated it, he returned in triumph to his quarters in Westminster.

Perceiving that by this measure he was likely to do harm, he resolved, before it were too late, to repair the dangerous mistake into which he had been betrayed, and to shew that he meant no longer to be the minister of violence and usurpation. After complaining of the odious service in which he had been employed, he wrote a letter of reproach to the house on the 11th, requiring them, in the name of the citizens, soldiers, and the whole commonwealth, to issue writs, within a week, for the filling of their house, and to fix the time for their own dissolution and the assembling of a new parliament. Having dispatched this letter, he marched with his army into the city, and desired Allen, the mayor, to summon a common-council at Guild-hall. He there made many apologies for the indignity which, two days before, he had put upon them; assured them of his perseverance in the measures which he had adopted; and desired that they might mutually plight their faith for a strict union between the city and army, in every enterprize for the happiness and settlement of the commonwealth.

The parliament, though greatly in despair, made still one effort for the recovery of their dominion. They sent a committee with offers to gain the general. He refused to hear them, except in the presence of some of the secluded members. Though several persons promised to invest him with the dignity of supreme magistrate, and to support his government, he would not hearken to their proposals. Having fixed a close correspondence with the city, and established its militia in hands whose fidelity he could rely on, he returned with his army to Westminster, and pursued every measure for the settlement of the nation.

The secluded members, upon the general's invitation, went to the house, on the 21st of February, and finding no longer any obstruction, they entered, and immediately appeared to be the majority: most of the Independents left the place. The restored members first repealed all ordinances by which they had been excluded: they gave sir George Booth and his party their liberty and estates: they renewed the general's commission, and enlarged his powers: they fixed an assessment for the support of the fleet and army: and having passed these votes for the present composure of the kingdom, they dissolved themselves, on the 16th of March, and issued writs for the immediate assembling of a new parliament. This last measure had been previously concerted with the general.

A council of state was established, consisting of men whom Monk knew to be favourable to his scheme of restoring royalty. The militia was put into such hands as he knew would promote his designs. These, conjoined with Monk's army, which lay united at London, were esteemed a sufficient check on the dispersed army, of whose inclinations he had reason to be diffident. Monk, however, was every day removing the officers who were not so well affected to his plan, and bringing the troops to a state of obedience under his command.

Overton, governor of Hull, declared his resolution to keep possession of that fortress till the coming of King Jesus: but when Alured produced the authority of parliament for his delivering the place to colonel Fairfax, he thought proper to comply.

Montague, who commanded the fleet in the Baltic, had entered into the conspiracy with sir George Booth; and pretending want of provisions, had sailed from the Sound towards the coast of England, with an intention of supporting that insurrection of the royalists. On his arrival he received the news of Booth's defeat, and the total failure of the enterprize. The great difficulties, to which the parliament was then reduced, allowed them no leisure to examine strictly the reasons which he gave for quitting his station; and they allowed him to retire peaceably to his country-house. The council of state now conferred on him, in conjunction with Monk, the command of the fleet; and secured the naval, as well as military force, in hands favourable to the royal cause.

Notwithstanding all these steps which were taking towards the re-establishment of monarchy, Monk still hypocritically maintained the appearance of zeal for a commonwealth, and hitherto allowed no canal of correspondence between himself and the king to be opened. His silence, in the commencement of his enterprize, has by many been considered at an objection to his sincerity. There was, however, one Morrice, a gentleman of Devonshire, of a sedentary, studious disposition, nearly related to Monk, and one who had always maintained the strictest intimacy with him. With this person alone did Monk deliberate concerning that great enterprize, which he had projected. Sir John Granville, who had a commission from the king, applied to Morrice for access to the general; but received for answer, that the general desired him to communicate his business to Morrice. Granville, though importunately urged, twice refused to deliver his message to any but Monk himself; and this cautious politician, finding him now a person, whose secresy could be safely trusted, admitted him to his presence, and opened to him his whole intentions. Still he scrupled to commit any thing to writing: he delivered only a verbal message by Granville; assuring the king of his services, giving advice for his conduct, and exhorting him instantly to leave the Spanish territories, and retire into Holland. Charles followed these directions, and very narrowly escaped to Breda; for it was supposed, that if he had protracted his journey but a few hours, he would certainly, under pretence of honour and respect, have been arrested by the Spaniards.

Lockhart, who was governor of Dunkirk, and by no means averse to the king's service, was applied to on this occasion. The state of England was set before him, the certainty of the restoration represented, and the prospect of great favour displayed, if he would enter into the views of the general and his partizans, and receive the king into his fortress. Lockhart still dissembling the matter, replied, that his commission was derived from an English parliament, and he would not open his gates but in obedience to the same authority.

It being easy to the discerning part of the community to perceive what was going on, the elections for the new parliament went every where in favour of the king's party. The enthusiasts themselves seemed to be disarmed of their fury; and between despair and astonishment gave way to those measures, which, they found, it would be impossible for them, by their utmost efforts, to withstand. The Presbyterians and the royalists, being united, formed a strong party in the nation, which, without noise, but with infinite ardour, called for the king's restoration. The kingdom was almost entirely in the hands of the former party; and some zealous leaders among them began to renew the demand of those conditions, which had been required of the late king in the treaty of Newport: but the general was averse to the mention of conditions; and resolved that the crown, which he intended to restore, should be conferred on the king entirely free and unencumbered; and although the parliament had voted, that no one should be elected, who had himself, or whose father had borne arms for the late king; little regard was paid to this ordinance. The leaders of the Presbyterians, the earl of Manchester, lord Fairfax, lord Robarts, Hollis, sir Anthony Ashley Cooper, Annesley, Lewis, were determined to atone for past transgressions by their present zeal for the royal interests; and from former merits, successes, and sufferings, they had acquired with their party the highest credit and authority.

The affairs of Ireland were in a condition no less favourable to the king. As soon as Monk declared against the English army, he dispatched emissaries into Ireland, and engaged the officers in that kingdom to concur with him him in the same measures. Lord Broghill, president of Munster, and sir Charles Coote, president of Connaught, entered into a correspondence with the king, and promised their assistance for his restoration. But all these promising views had almost been blasted by an untoward accident. Upon the admission of the secluded members, the republican party, particularly the late king's judges, were seized with despair, and endeavoured to infuse the same sentiments into the army.

In the mean time Lambert suddenly made his escape from the Tower, and threw Monk and the council of state into great consternation. They knew Lambert's vigour and activity; they were acquainted with his popularity in the army; they were sensible, that, though the soldiers had lately deserted him, they sufficiently expressed their remorse and their detestation of those, who, by false professions, they found, had so egregiously deceived them. It seemed necessary, therefore, to employ the greatest celerity in suppressing so dangerous a foe: colonel Ingoldsby, who had been one of the late king's judges, but who was now entirely engaged in the royal cause, was dispatched after him. He overtook him at Daventry, on the 22nd of April, while he had yet assembled but four troops of horse. One of them deserted him. Another quickly followed the example. He himself, endeavouring to make his escape, was seized by Ingoldsby, to whom he made submissions not suitable to his former character of spirit and valour. Okey, Axtel, Cobbet, Crede, and other officers of that party, were taken prisoners with him. All the roads were full of soldiers hastening to join them, and in a few days, they would have been formidable.

The parliament met on the 25th of April, and chose sir Harbottle Grimstone speaker, who had long been esteemed affectionate to the king's service. The members exerted themselves chiefly in bitter invectives against the memory of Cromwell, and in execrations against the inhuman murder of their late sovereign. At last, on the 1st of May, the general, having sufficiently sounded their inclinations, gave directions to Annesley, president of the council, to inform them, that one sir George Granville (o), a servant of the king's, had been sent over by his majesty, and was now at the door with a letter to the commons. The loudest acclamations were excited by this intelligence. Granville was called in: the letter, accompanied with a declaration, greedily read: a committee was immediately appointed to prepare an answer; and in order to spread the same satisfaction throughout the kingdom, it was voted that the letter and declaration should be instantly published.

The king's declaration was well calculated to uphold the satisfaction inspired by the prospect of public settlement. It offered a general amnesty to all persons whatsoever; and that without any exceptions but such as should afterwards be made by parliament: it promised liberty of conscience; and a concurrence in any act of parliament, which, upon mature deliberation, should be offered, for insuring that indulgence: it submitted to the arbitration of the same assembly the inquiry into all grants, purchases, and alienations; and it assured the soldiers of all their arrears, and promised them, for the future, the pay which they then enjoyed.

The lords, perceiving the spirit by which the commons was animated, hastened to reinstate themselves in their ancient authority, and to take their share in the settlement of the nation. They found the doors of their house open; and all were admitted; even such as had formerly been excluded on account of their pretended delinquency.

The two houses attended on the 8th of May; while the king was proclaimed with great solemnity, in Palace Yard, at Whitehall, and at Temple Bar. The commons voted five hundred pounds to buy a jewel for Granville, who had brought them the king's gracious messages: a present of fifty thousand pounds was conferred on the king, ten thousand pounds on the duke of York, five thousand pounds on the duke of Gloucester. A committee of lords and commons was dispatched to invite his majesty to return and take possession of the government. Such an impatience appeared, and such an emulation, in lords and commons, and even among some of the citizens, who should make the most lively expressions of their joy and duty; that the king himself said, that it must surely have been his own fault that he had not sooner taken possession of the throne; since he found people so zealous in promoting his restoration.

(o) By the hands of sir John Granville, general Monk received a commission from the king, constituting him general of the forces of the kingdoms of England, Scotland, and Ireland.

The English fleet came in sight of Scheveling. Montague had not waited for orders from the parliament; but had persuaded the officers, of themselves, to tender their duty to his majesty. The duke of York immediately went on board, and took the command of the fleet as high admiral.

When the king disembarked at Dover, he was met by general Monk, whom he cordially embraced. Never subject in fact, probably in his intentions, had deserved better of his king and country. In the space of a few months, without effusion of blood, by his cautious conduct alone, he had bestowed settlement on three kingdoms, which had long been torn with the most violent convulsions; and having obstinately refused the most inviting conditions, offered him by the king as well as by every party in the kingdom, he freely restored Charles to the vacant throne. The king entered London on the 29th of May, the day on which he completed the thirtieth year of his age.

CHAP. VII.

CHARLES II.

WHEN Charles the Second ascended the throne of his ancestors, he was in that period of life, when there remains enough of youth to render the person amiable, without preventing that authority and regard which attend the years of experience and maturity; and as the sudden and surprizing revolution, which restored him to his regal rights, had also restored the nation to peace, no prince ever obtained the crown in more favourable circumstances. The popularity which the king had acquired by his whole demeanour and behaviour, he was well qualified to support. To a lively wit and quick comprehension, he united a good understanding, and a general observation both of men and things. The easiest manners, the most unaffected politeness, the most engaging gaiety, accompanied his conversation and address. Accustomed, during his exile, to live among his courtiers rather like a companion than a monarch, he retained, even while on the throne, that open affability, which was capable of reconciling the most determined republicans to his royal dignity.

Into his council were admitted many eminent men, without regard to former distinctions: the Presbyterians, equally with the royalists, shared his honour. Annesley was also created earl of Anglesey; Ashley Cooper, lord Ashley; Denzil Hollis, lord Hollis. The earl of Manchester was appointed lord chamberlain, and lord Say, privy seal. Calamy and Baxter, Presbyterian clergymen, were even made chaplains to the king.

Admiral Montague, created earl of Sandwich, was entitled, from his recent services, to great favour; and he obtained it. Monk, created duke of Albermarle, had performed such signal services for the king, by effecting his restoration, notwithstanding his former friendship with Cromwell, that he was ever treated by Charles with great marks of distinction, who settled seven thousand pounds per annum on him out of the royal demesnes. Sir William Morrice, his friend, was created secretary of state, and was supported more by his patron's credit than by his own abilities or experience. Sir Edward Hyde, created earl of Clarendon, was chancellor and prime minister: the marquis, created duke of Ormond, was steward of the household; the earl of Southampton, high treasurer; sir Edward Nicholas, secretary of state. It required some time, however, before the several parts of the state, disfigured by war and faction, could recover their former arrangement: but the parliament immediately fell into good correspondence with the king; and treated him with the same dutiful regard which had usually been paid to his predecessors. Being summoned without the king's consent, they received, at first, only the title of a convention; and it was not till he passed an act for that purpose, that they were called by the appellation of parliament. All judicial proceedings, transacted in the name of the commonwealth or protector, were ratified by a new law: and both houses received his majesty's pardon and indemnity.

The king, before his restoration, being afraid of reducing any of his enemies to despair, and at the same time unwilling that such enormous crimes as had been committed, should receive a total impunity, had expressed himself very very cautiously in his declaration of Breda, and had promised an indemnity to all criminals but such as should be excepted by parliament. He now issued a proclamation, declaring that such of the late king's judges as did not yield themselves prisoners within fourteen days should receive no pardon. Nineteen surrendered themselves: some were taken in their flight: others escaped beyond sea.

The commons seem to have been more inclined to lenity than the lords. The upper house were resolved, besides the late king's judges, to except every one who had sitten in any high court of justice. But the king soon dissipated these fears. He came to the house of peers, and passed the act of general indemnity. This measure of the king's was received with great applause and satisfaction. Those, however, who had an immediate hand in the late king's death, were there excepted: even Cromwell, Ireton, Bradshaw, and others now dead, were attainted, and their estates forfeited. Vane and Lambert, though not among the regicides, were also excepted. St. John and seventeen other persons were deprived of all benefit from this act, if they ever accepted any public employment. All who had sitten in any high court of justice during the commonwealth were disabled from bearing offices.

The next business was the settlement of the king's revenue. The tenures of wards and liveries had long been regarded as grievous; a hundred thousand pounds a-year was offered in lieu of them; and half of the excise was settled in perpetuity upon the crown as the fund whence this revenue should be levied. Tonnage and poundage and the other half of the excise were granted to the king during life. The parliament even voted that the settled revenue of the crown should be one million two hundred thousand pounds a-year.

In all the temporary supplies which they voted, they discovered great caution and frugality. To answer the king's present demands, an assessment of seventy thousand pounds a-month was imposed; but it was at first voted to continue only three months: and all the other sums, which they levied for that purpose, were granted by parcels; as if they were not, as yet, well assured of the fidelity of the hand to which the money was entrusted. Having proceeded thus far, the parliament adjourned itself for some weeks on the 13th of September.

During the recess of parliament, the object, which chiefly interested the public, was the trial and condemnation of the regicides: but in the peculiar circumstances of that action, in the prejudices of the times, as well as in the behaviour of the criminals, a humane mind will find a plentiful source of compassion and indulgence. Can any one, without concern, consider the demeanour of general Harrison, who was first brought to his trial? With great courage and elevation of sentiment, he told the court, "that the pretended crime, of which he stood accused, was not a deed performed in a corner: the sound of it hath gone forth to most nations; and in the singular and marvellous conduct of it had chiefly appeared the sovereign power of Heaven. That he himself, agitated by doubts, had often, with passionate tears, offered up his addresses to the divine Majesty, and earnestly sought for light and conviction: he had still received assurance of a heavenly sanction, and returned from these devout supplications with more serene tranquillity and satisfaction. That all the nations of the earth were, in the eyes of their Creator, less than a drop of water in the bucket; nor were their erroneous judgement aught but darkness, compared with divine illuminations. That these frequent illapses of the Divine Spirit he could not suspect to be interested illusions; since he was conscious, that, for no temporal advantage, would he offer injury to the poorest man or woman that trod upon the earth. That all the allurements of ambition, all the terrors of imprisonment, had not been able, during the usurpation of Cromwell, to shake his steady resolution, or bend him to a compliance with that deceitful tyrant. And that when invited by him to sit on the right hand of the throne, when offered riches and splendour and dominion, he had disdainfully rejected all temptations; and neglecting the tears of his friends and family, had still, through every danger, held fast his principles and his integrity."

Scott, who was more a republican than a puritan, had said in the house of commons, a little before the restoration, that he desired no other epitaph to be inscribed on his tomb-stone than this; "Here lies Thomas Scott, who adjudged the king to death." He supported the same spirit upon his trial.

Carew, a Millenarian, submitted to his trial, "saving to our Lord Jesus Christ his right to the government of these kingdoms." Some scrupled to say, according to form, that they would be tried by God and their country; because God was not visibly present to judge them. Others said, that they would be tried by the word of God.

Six of the late king's judges, Harrison, Scott, Carew, Clement, Jones, and Scrope, were executed: Scrope alone, of all those who came in upon the king's proclamation; Axtel, who had guarded the high court of justice, Hacker, who commanded on the day of the king's execution, Coke, the solicitor for the people of England, and Hugh Peters, the famous puritanical preacher: all these were tried, and condemned, and suffered with the king's judges (p). The rest of the king's judges were reprieved, and dispersed into several prisons.

This punishment of these persons interrupted not the rejoicings of the court: but the death of the duke of Gloucester, a young prince of promising hopes, on the 13th of September, threw a great cloud upon them; and the king, by no incident in his life, was ever so deeply affected. The young duke was believed to be affectionate to the religion and constitution of his country. He was but twenty years of age, when the small-pox put an end to his life.

The princess of Orange, having come to England, in order to partake of the rejoicings upon the restoration of her family, with whom she lived in great friendship, soon after sickened and died. The queen-mother paid a visit to her son; and obtained his consent to the marriage of the princess Henrietta, with the duke of Orleans, brother to the king of France.

After a recess of near two months, the parliament met on the 6th of November, and proceeded in the great work of the national settlement. They established the post-office, wine licences, and some articles of the revenue. They granted more assessments, and some arrears, for paying the disbanding army. After they had sitten near two months, the king, thinking that they might not be quite so pliant in every thing if they were permitted to sit much longer, in a speech full of the most gracious expressions, thought proper to dissolve them, on the 29th of December.

This house of commons consisted chiefly of Presbyterians, who had not yet entirely laid aside their old jealousies and principles, and royalists, who were inveterate against the republican party. Lenthal, a member, having said, that those who first took arms against the king, were as guilty as those who afterwards brought him to the scaffold, was, however, severely reprimanded by order of the house; and the most violent efforts of the long parliament, to secure the constitution, and bring delinquents to justice, were in effect vindicated and applauded (q). The claim of the two houses to the militia, the first ground of the quarrel, was never expressly resigned by this parliament. They made all grants of money with a sparing hand. Great arrears being due by the protector, to the fleet, the army, the navy-office, and every branch of service; this whole debt they threw upon the crown, without establishing funds sufficient for its payment (r).

The chancellor now hastened to disband the army. No more troops were retained than a few guards and garrisons, about one thousand horse, and four thousand foot. This was the first appearance, under the monarchy, of a regular standing army in this island. The fortifications of Gloucester, Taunton, and other towns, which had made resistance to the king during the civil wars, were demolished.

(r) Notwithstanding this jealous care, expressed by the parliament, there prevails a story, that Popham, having sounded the disposition of the members, undertook to the earl of Southampton to procure, during the king's life, a grant of two millions a-year, land tax; a sum which, added to the customs and excise, would have rendered this prince completely independent of his people. Southampton, it is said, merely from his affection to the king, had unwarily embraced the offer; and it was not till he communicated the matter to the chancellor, that he was made sensible of its pernicious tendency. It is not improbable, that such an offer might have been made, and been hearkened to; but it is no-wise probable that all the interest of the court would ever, with this house of commons, have been able to make it effectual. Clarendon, however, showed his prudence by rejecting it.

The earl of Clarendon, it must be admitted, behaved with wisdom and justice in the office of chancellor; and the counsels, which he gave the king, tended equally to promote the interest of prince and people. Charles, accustomed in his exile to pay entire deference to the judgement of this nobleman, continued still to submit to his direction. He moderated the forward zeal of the royalists, and tempered their appetite for revenge. With the opposite party, he endeavoured to preserve inviolate all the king's engagements: he kept an exact register of the promises which had been made for any service, and employed all his industry to fulfil them. This good minister was now nearly allied to the royal family. His daughter, Ann Hyde, a woman of spirit and fine accomplishments, had hearkened, while abroad, to the addresses of the duke of York, and, under promise of marriage, had secretly admitted him to her bed. Her pregnancy appeared soon after the restoration; and though many endeavoured to dissuade the king from consenting to so unequal an alliance, Charles permitted his brother to marry her. The earl, however, expressed great uneasiness at the honour which he had obtained; and said, that by being elevated so much above his rank, he thence dreaded a more sudden reverse of fortune.

The earl of Clarendon's maxims in the conduct of ecclesiastical politics have by many been deemed the effect of prejudices narrow and bigotted; and to the Presbyterian they seem to have that tendency. But as the impatience of the high-churchmen, the danger of delay, and the authority of Monk, had prevailed over the Presbyterians, the full settlement of the hierarchy, together with the monarchy, was a necessary consequence. All the royalists were zealous for that mode of religion; the laws which established bishops and the liturgy were as yet unrepealed by royal authority; and any attempt of the parliament, by new acts, to give the superiority to Presbyterianism, might have been sufficient to involve the nation again in blood and confusion. Moved by these views, the commons had postponed the examination of all religious controversy, and had left the settlement of the church to the king and to the ancient laws.

Nine bishops still remained alive; and these were immediately restored to their sees: all the ejected clergy recovered their livings: the liturgy was again admitted into the churches; but, at the same time, a declaration was issued, in order to give contentment to the Presbyterians, and preserve an air of moderation and neutrality. Though these appearances of neutrality were maintained, and a mitigated episcopacy only seemed to be insisted on, it was far from the intention of ministry always to preserve like regard to the Presbyterians. The madness of the fifth-monarchy-men afforded them a pretence for departing from it. A short time after the dissolution of parliament, Venner, a desperate enthusiast, who had often conspired against Cromwell, having, by his zealous lectures, inflamed his own imagination and that of his followers, issued forth at their head into the streets of London, on the 6th of January, 1661. They were to the number of sixty, completely armed, believed themselves invincible, and expected the same success which had attended Gideon and other heroes of the Old Testament. Every one at first fled before them. One unhappy man, who, being questioned, said, "He was for God and king Charles," was instantly murdered by them. At length the magistrates, having assembled some train-bands, made an attack upon them. They defended themselves with order, as well as valour; and, after killing many of the assailants, made a regular retreat into Cane Wood, near Hampstead. Next morning they were chased thence by a detachment of the guards; but they ventured again to invade the city, where they committed great disorder, traversing many streets of that capital; they then retired into a house, which they defended to the last extremity. Being surrounded, and the house untiled, they were fired upon from every side; and still refused quarter. The few who remained alive were tried, condemned, and executed; and to the last they persisted in affirming, that if they were deceived, it was the Lord that had deceived them.

In Scotland affairs hastened with still quicker steps than those in England towards a settlement and a compliance with the king. It was deliberated in the English council, whether that nation should be restored to its liberty, or whether the forts erected by Cromwell should not still be upheld, in order to curb the mutinous spirit by which the Scots in all ages had been so much governed. The king was induced to disband all the forces in Scotland, and to raze all the forts which had been erected. General Middleton, created earl of that name, was sent commissioner to the parliament, which was summoned on the 1st of January, 1661. The commissioner had sufficient influence to obtain an act, annulling all laws which had passed since the year 1633, on pretext of the violence which, during that time, had been employed against the king and his father, in order to procure their assent to these statutes. The tide was now running strongly towards monarchy; the lords of articles were restored, with some other branches of prerogative; and royal authority was, in its full extent, re-established in that kingdom. The prelacy likewise, by the abrogating of every statute enacted in favour of presbytery, was thereby tacitly restored; and the king deliberated what use he should make of this concession. Lauderdale, who in his heart was a passionate zealot against episcopacy, endeavoured to persuade him, that the Scots, if gratified in their favourite point of ecclesiastical government, would, in every other demand, be entirely compliant with the king. Charles, though he had no such attachment to prelacy as had influenced his father and grandfather, had suffered such indignities from the Scottish Presbyterians, that he ever after bore them a strong aversion. He said to Lauderdale, that Presbyterianism, he thought, was not a religion for a gentleman; and he could not consent to its farther continuance in Scotland. The resolution was therefore taken to restore prelacy; a measure afterwards attended with many and great inconveniencies. Sharp, who had been commissioned by the Presbyterians in Scotland to manage their interests with the king, was persuaded to abandon that party; and, as a reward for his compliance, was created archbishop of St. Andrews. The conduct of ecclesiastical affairs was chiefly entrusted to him; and as he was esteemed a traitor and a renegade by his old friends, he became on that account, as well as from the violence of his conduct, extremely hateful to the Presbyterians.

The king had not promised to Scotland any such indemnity as he had ensured to England by the declaration of Breda: and it was deemed more political for him to hold over men's heads, for some time, the terror of punishment, till they should have made the requisite compliances with the new government. Accordingly, the marquis of Argyle, and one Guthry, were pitched on as the victims. Two acts of indemnity, one passed by the late king in 1641, another by the present in 1651, formed, it was thought, invincible obstacles to the punishment of Argyle; and barred all inquiry into that part of his conduct which might be regarded as the most exceptionable. Nothing remained but to try him for his compliance with the usurpation; and letters were produced in court which he had written to Albermarle, while that general commanded in Scotland, and which contained expressions of the most cordial attachment to the established government. But besides the general indignation excited by Albermarle's discovery of this private correspondence, every one thought, that even the highest demonstrations of affection might, during jealous times, be exacted as a necessary mark of compliance from a person of such distinction as Argyle, and could not, by any equitable construction, imply the crime of treason. The parliament, however, passed sentence upon him; and he died with great constancy and courage. Lord Lorne, son of Argyle, having preserved his loyalty, obtained a gift of the forfeiture. Guthry was a preacher, and had personally affronted the king: he was therefore executed. Sir Archibald Johnstone of Warriston, was attainted and fled; but was treacherously seized in France about two years after, brought over and executed. He had been active during the late disorders, and was suspected of a secret correspondence with the English regicides.

Besides these instances of compliances in the Scottish parliament, they voted an additional revenue to the king of forty thousand pounds a-year, to be levied by way of excise. A small force was purposed to be maintained by this revenue, in order to prevent like confusions from happening again. An act was also passed, declaring the covenant unlawful, and its obligation null and void.

In England, the civil distinctions seemed to be abolished; and all men seemed to concur in submitting to the king's prerogatives, and in cherishing the privileges of the people and of parliament. A conference was held in the Savoy on the 25th of March, between twelve bishops and twelve leaders among the Presbyterian ministers, with a pretence pretence of bringing about an accommodation between the parties. The surplice, the cross in baptism, the kneeling at the sacrament, the bowing at the name of Jesus, were canvassed afresh; and the ignorant multitude were in hopes that so many men of gravity and learning could not fail, after deliberate argumentation, to agree in all points of controversy: but, instead of coming to an agreement, they separated more inflamed than ever, and more confirmed in their several prejudices. To enter into particulars would be superfluous.

Charles's declaration had promised, that some endeavours should be used to effect a comprehension of both parties; and his own indifference with regard to all such questions seemed a favourable circumstance for the execution of that project. The partizans of a comprehension said, that the Presbyterians, as well as the prelatists, were well disposed towards an amicable agreement: that the bishops, by relinquishing some part of their authority, and dispensing with the most exceptionable ceremonies, would gratify their adversaries, and unite the whole nation in one faith and one worship: but the ministry were inclined to give the preference to the arguments in favour of high church principles; and were more confirmed in that idea by the disposition, which appeared in the parliament lately assembled. The royalists and zealous churchmen were at present the popular party in the nation, and, seconded by the efforts of the court, had prevailed in most elections. Not more than fifty-six members of the Presbyterian party had obtained seats in the lower house, in the parliament which met on the 8th of May, 1661; and these were not sufficient to oppose or retard the measures of the majority. Monarchy, therefore, and episcopacy, were now exalted to as great power as they had lately suffered depression. Sir Edward Turner was chosen speaker (s).

Through fear that too many names might be affixed to petitions, it was enacted, that no more than twenty signatures should appear to any petition, unless with the sanction of three justices, or the major part of the grand jury; and that no petition should be presented to the king or either house by above ten persons. The penalty annexed to a transgression of this law was a fine of a hundred pounds and three months imprisonment.

The bishops, though restored to their spiritual authority, were still excluded from parliament by the law which the late king had passed immediately before the commencement of the civil disorders; but Charles expressed much satisfaction, when he gave his assent to the act for repealing it. The authority of the crown, as well as that of the church, was interested in restoring the prelates to their former dignity; but those, who deemed every acquisition of the prince a detriment to the people, complained of this instance of complaisance in the parliament.

After an adjournment of some months, the parliament was again assembled on the 20th of November, and proceeded in the same spirit as before. They discovered no design to restore in its full extent, the ancient prerogative of the crown: they were only anxious to repair all those breaches, which had been made, not by the love of liberty, but by the fury of faction and civil war. The power of the sword had, hitherto, been allowed to be vested in the crown; but it was now thought proper to acknowledge, that neither one house, nor both houses, independent of the king, were possessed of any military authority. The preamble to this statute went so far as to renounce all right even of defensive arms against the king; and much observation has been made with regard to a concession esteemed so singular; which imply a total renunciation of limitations to monarchy, and of all privileges in the subject, independent of the will of the sovereign.

The care of the church was no less attended to by this parliament, than that of monarchy; and the bill of uniformity, passed in 1662, was a pledge of their attachment to the episcopal hierarchy, and of their antipathy to Presbyterianism. Different parties, however, concurred in promoting this bill, which contained many severe clauses. The Independents and other sectaries, enraged to find their schemes subverted by the Presbyterians, who had once been their associates, exerted themselves to disappoint that party of the favour and indulgence, to which they thought themselves entitled. By the Presbyterians, said they, the war was raised: by them was the populace first incited to tumults: by their zeal, interest, and riches, were the armies supported: by their force was the king subdued: and if, in the sequel, they protested against those violences, committed on his person by the military leaders, their opposition came too late, after having supplied these men with the power and the pretences, by which they maintained their measures. They had indeed concurred with the royalists in recalling the king; but ought they to be esteemed, on that account, more affectionate to the royal cause? Rage and animosity were their sole motives; and if the king should now be so imprudent as to distinguish them by any particular indulgences, he would soon experience from them the same opposition which had proved so fatal to Charles the First.

The Catholics, though they had little interest in the nation, were a considerable party at court; and they used, therefore, all their interest to push matters to extremity against the Presbyterians, who had formerly been their most severe oppressors, and whom they now expected for their companions in affliction. The earl of Bristol, who had changed his religion during the king's exile, was regarded as the head of this party.

The church party had, during so many years, suffered such injuries and indignities from the sectaries of every denomination, that no moderation, much less deference, was on this occasion to be expected in the ecclesiastics. Even the laity of that communion seemed now disposed to retaliate upon their enemies, according to the usual measures of party prejudice. This sect or faction (for it partook of the nature of both) encouraged the rumours of plots and conspiracies against the government; crimes which, without any apparent reason, they imputed to their adversaries: they therefore laid hold of the prejudices, which prevailed among the Presbyterians, in order to eject them from their livings. By the bill of uniformity it was required that every clergyman should be re-ordained, if he had not before received episcopal ordination; should declare his assent to every thing contained in the Book of Common Prayer; should take the oath of canonical obedience; should abjure the solemn league and covenant; and should renounce the principle of taking arms, on any pretence whatsoever, against the king (t).

The royalists, who now predominated, were ready to signalize their victory, by establishing those high principles of monarchy which their antagonists had controverted; but when any real power or revenue was demanded for the crown, they were neither so forward nor so liberal in their concessions as the king wished. Though the parliament passed laws for regulating the navy, they took no notice of the army; and declined giving their sanction to this innovation. The king's debts were become intolerable; and the commons at last voted him an extraordinary supply of one million two hundred thousand pounds, to be levied by eighteen monthly assessments. But finding that the several branches of revenue fell short of the sums expected, after much delay, they voted a new imposition of two shillings on each hearth; and this tax they settled on the king during life. After all business was dispatched, the parliament was prorogued on the 19th of May, 1662.

Previous to the rising of parliament, the court was employed in making preparations for the reception of the new queen, Catherine of Portugal, to whom the king was betrothed, and who had just landed at Portsmouth. During the time that the protector carried on the war with Spain, he was naturally led to support the Portuguese in their revolt; and he himself engaged by treaty to supply them with ten thousand men for their defence against the Spaniards. On the king's restoration, advances were made by Portugal for the renewal of the alliance; and in order

(s) An act was passed in this session, for the security of the king's person and government. To intend or devise the king's imprisonment, or bodily harm, or deposition, or levying war against him, was declared, during the lifetime of his present majesty, to be high treason. To affirm him to be a papist or heretic, or to endeavour by speech or writing to alienate his subjects' affections from him; these offences were made sufficient to incapacitate the person guilty from holding any employment in church or state. To maintain that the long parliament is not dissolved, or that either or both houses, without the king, are possessed of legislative authority, or that the covenant is binding, was made punishable by the penalty of premunire. The covenant itself, together with the act for erecting the high court of justice, that for subscribing the engagement, and that for declaring England a commonwealth, were ordered to be burnt by the hands of the common hangman. The people assisted with great alacrity on this occasion.

(t) This bill reinstated the church in the same condition in which it stood before the commencement of the civil wars; and as the old persecuting laws of Elizabeth still subsisted in their full rigour, and new clauses of a like nature were now enacted, all the king's promises of toleration and of indulgence to tender consciences were thereby eluded and broken.

to

to bind the friendship closer, an offer was made of the Portuguese princess, and a portion of five hundred thousand pounds, together with two fortresses, Tangiers in Africa, and Bombay in the East Indies. Spain, who, after the peace of the Pyrenees, bent all her force to recover Portugal, now in appearance abandoned by France, took the alarm, and endeavoured to fix Charles in an opposite interest. The Catholic king offered to adopt any other princess as a daughter of Spain, either the princess of Parma, or, what he thought more popular, some Protestant princess, the daughter of Denmark, Saxony, or Orange: and on any of these, he promised to confer a dowry equal to that which was offered by Portugal. But many reasons inclined Charles rather to accept of the Portuguese proposals; for, besides political views, Charles was strongly inclined to give the preference to a Catholic alliance. When the matter was laid before the council, all voices concurred in approving the resolution; and the parliament expressed the same complaisance. And thus was concluded, seemingly with universal consent, the inauspicious marriage with Catherine, on the 21st of May, a princess of virtue, but who was never able, either by the graces of her person or humour, to make herself agreeable to the king. The report, however, of her natural incapacity to have children, seems to have been groundless; since she was twice declared to be pregnant.

The festivity of these espousals was clouded by the trial and execution of criminals. Berkstead, Corbet, and Okey, three persons who had signed the warrant for the execution of Charles the First, had escaped beyond sea; and after wandering some time concealed in Germany, came privately to Delft, having appointed their families to meet them in that place. They were discovered by Downing, the king's resident in Holland, who had formerly served the protector and commonwealth in the same station, and who once had even been chaplain to Okey's regiment. He applied for a warrant to arrest them. It had been usual for the States to grant these warrants; though, at the same time, they had ever been careful secretly to advertise the persons, that they might be enabled to make their escape. This precaution was eluded by Downing. He quickly seized the criminals, hurried them on board a frigate which lay off the coast, and sent them to England (t).

The public attention was much engaged by the trial of Lambert and Vane. These men, though not among the late king's judges, had been excepted from the bill of indemnity, and committed to prison. The convention parliament, however, petitioned the king, if they should be found guilty, to suspend their execution: but this new parliament, more zealous for monarchy, applied for their trial and condemnation. The indictment of Vane did not comprehend any of his actions during the war between the king and parliament: it extended only to his behaviour after the late king's death, as member of the council of state, and secretary of the navy, where fidelity to the trust reposed in him required his opposition to monarchy (u).

Notwithstanding the able defence, which Vane made, his efforts were fruitless. The court took advantage of the letter of the law, and brought him in guilty, on the 11th of June, 1662. His courage deserted him not upon his condemnation. Though timid by nature, the persuasion of a just cause supported him against the terrors of death; while his enthusiasm, excited by the prospect of glory, embellished the conclusion of his life (v). Lambert, though condemned, was reprieved at the bar; and the judges declared, that, if Vane's behaviour had been equally dutiful and submissive, he would have experienced like lenity in the king. Lambert survived his condemnation nearly thirty years. He was confined to the isle of Guernsey; where he lived contented the remainder of his days.

The fatal St. Bartholomew now approached; the day, (August the 24th, 1662,) when the clergy were obliged by the late law, either to relinquish their livings, or to sign the articles required of them. A combination had been entered into by the most zealous of the Presbyterian ecclesiastics to refuse the subscription; in hopes that the bishops would not venture at once to expel so great a number of the most popular preachers. The Catholic party at court, who desired a great rent among the Protestants, encouraged them in this obstinacy, and gave them hopes that the king would protect them in their refusal; and the king himself contributed, either from design or accident, to increase this opinion. Above all, the terms of subscription had been made strict and rigid, on purpose to disgust all the zealous and scrupulous among the Presbyterians, and deprive them of their livings. About two thousand of the clergy, in one day, relinquished their cures; and to the astonishment of the court, sacrificed their interest to their religious tenets. Fortified by society in their sufferings, they were resolved to undergo any hardships, rather than renounce those principles which they professed. The church enjoyed the pleasure of retaliation; and even pushed, as usual, the vengeance farther than the offence. During the dominion of the parliamentary party, a fifth of each living had been left to the ejected clergyman; but this indulgence, though at first insisted on by the house of peers, was now refused to the Presbyterians. Bishoprics were offered to Calamy, Baxter, and Reynolds, leaders among the Presbyterians; the last only could be prevailed on to accept. Deaneries and other preferments were refused by many.

Notwithstanding the supplies which the king had received, he was still in a necessitous condition, from the pressure of his old debts, and his want of œconomy. He therefore made a sale of Dunkirk to the French (w). He had secretly received the sum of two hundred thousand crowns from France for the support of Portugal; but the forces sent over to that country, and the fleets maintained in order to defend it, had already cost the king that sum; and together with it, near double the money, which had been paid as the queen's portion. The time fixed for payment of his sister's portion to the duke of Orleans was approaching. Tangiers, a fortress from which great benefit was expected, was become an additional burden to the crown; and Rutherford, who now commanded in Dunkirk, had increased the charge of that garrison to a hundred and twenty thou-

(t) These three men behaved with more moderation and submission than any of the other regicides, who had suffered. Okey in particular, at the place of execution, prayed for the king, and expressed his intention, had he lived, of submitting peaceably to the established government. He had risen during the wars from being a chandler in London to a high rank in the army; and in all his conduct appeared to be a man of humanity and honour. In consideration of his good character and of his dutiful behaviour, his body was given to his friends for interment.

(u) Vane wanted neither courage nor capacity to avail himself of this advantage. He urged, that, if a compliance with the government, at that time established in England, and the acknowledging of its authority, were to be regarded as criminal, the whole nation had incurred equal guilt, and none would remain, whose innocence could entitle them to try or condemn him for his pretended treasons: that, according to these maxims, wherever an illegal authority was established by force, a total and universal destruction must ensue; while the usurpers proscribed one part of the nation for disobedience, the lawful prince punished the other for compliance: that the legislature of England, foreseeing this violent situation, had provided for public security by the famous statute of Henry VII.; in which it was enacted, that no man, in case of any revolution, should ever be questioned for his obedience to the king in being: that whether the established government were a monarchy or a commonwealth, the reason of the thing was still the same; nor ought the expelled prince to think himself entitled to allegiance, so long as he could not afford protection: that it belonged not to private persons, possessed of no power, to discuss the title of their governors; and every usurpation, even the most flagrant, would equally require obedience with the most legal establishment: that the controversy between the late king and his parliament was of the most delicate nature; and men of the greatest probity had been divided in their choice of the party which they should embrace: that the parliament, being rendered indissoluble but by its own consent, was become a kind of co-ordinate power with the king; and as the case was thus entirely new and unknown to the constitution, it ought not to be tried rigidly by the letter of the ancient laws: that for his part, all the violences, which had been put upon the parliament, and upon the person of the sovereign, he had ever condemned; nor had he once appeared in the house for some time before and after the execution of the king: that finding the whole government thrown into disorder, he was still resolved, in every revolution, to adhere to the commons, the root, the foundation of all lawful authority: that in prosecution of this principle, he had cheerfully undergone all the violence of Cromwell's tyranny; and would now, with equal alacrity, expose himself to the rigours of perverted law and justice: that though it was in his power, on the king's restoration, to have escaped from his enemies, he was determined, in imitation of the most illustrious names of antiquity, to perish in defence of liberty, and to give testimony with his blood for that honourable cause, in which he had been inlisted: and that, besides the ties, by which God and nature had bound him to his native country, he was voluntarily engaged by the most sacred covenant, whose obligation no earthly power should ever be able to make him relinquish.

(v) Lest pity for a courageous sufferer should make impression on the populace, drummers were placed under the scaffold, whose noise, as he began to launch out in reflections on the government, drowned his voice, and admonished him to temper the ardour of his zeal. He was not astonished at this unexpected and illiberal incident. In all his behaviour, there appeared a firm and animated intrepidity; and he considered death but as a passage to that eternal felicity, which he believed to be prepared for him. He was executed on the 14th of June.

(w) By the terms of the agreement, Louis consented to pay seven millions of livres, for the surrender of the town and citadel of Dunkirk, and the fortress of Mardyke, and of all the artillery and military stores, which they contained. This sum, at ten pence halfpenny per livre, amounted to three hundred and six thousand two hundred and fifty pounds.

sand

sand pounds a-year. These considerations had such influence, not only on the king, but even on Clarendon, that this minister advised the accepting a sum of money in lieu of a place which he thought the king was no longer able to retain. By the treaty with Portugal it was stipulated that Dunkirk should never be yielded to the Spaniards: France was therefore the only purchaser that remained. Nine hundred thousand pounds were demanded. One hundred thousand were offered. The English by degrees lowered their demand: the French raised their offer: and the bargain was concluded at seven million of livres (x).

The king next issued a declaration, on pretence of mitigating the rigours contained in the act of uniformity. After expressing his firm resolution to observe the general indemnity, and to trust entirely to the affections of his subjects for the support of his throne, he mentioned the promises of liberty of conscience, contained in his declaration of Breda. And he subjoined, that, "as in the first place he had been zealous to settle the uniformity of the church of England, in discipline, ceremony, and government, and shall ever constantly maintain it: so as for what concerns the penalties upon those who, living peaceably, do not conform themselves thereunto, through scruple and tenderness of misguided conscience, but modestly and without scandal perform their devotions in their own way, he should make it his special care, so far as in him lay, without invading the freedom of parliament, to incline their wisdom next approaching sessions to concur with him in making some such act for that purpose, as may enable him to exercise, with a more universal satisfaction, that power of dispensing which he conceived to be inherent in him." Here a most important prerogative was exercised by the king; but under such artful reserves and limitations as might prevent the full discussion of the claim, and obviate a breach between him and his parliament. The foundation of this measure lay much deeper, and was of the utmost consequence.

During his exile, the king had imbibed strong prejudices in favour of the Catholic religion; and according to the most probable accounts, had been secretly reconciled in form to the church of Rome. The great zeal, expressed by the parliamentary party against papists, had always, from a spirit of opposition, inclined the court, and the royalists, to adopt more favourable sentiments towards that sect, which, through the whole course of the civil wars, had strenuously supported the prerogatives of the crown. The solicitations and importunities of the queen-mother, the contagion of the company which he frequented, the view of a more splendid and courtly mode of worship, the hopes of indulgence in pleasure; all these causes operated powerfully on Charles, whose careless and dissolute temper made him incapable of adhering to the principles of his early education. But though the king fluctuated, during his whole reign, between irreligion and popery, his brother, the duke of York, had zealously adopted all the principles of that theological party. He became a thorough convert, without any reserve from interest, or doubts from reasoning and inquiry. He had acquired a great ascendant over the king; and under pretence of easing the protestant dissenters, they agreed upon a plan for introducing a general toleration, and giving the Catholics the free exercise of their religion; at least, the exercise of it in private houses. The two brothers saw with pleasure so numerous and popular a body of the clergy refuse conformity; and it was hoped that, under shelter of their name, the hated sect of the Catholics might meet with favour and protection.

While the king pleaded his early promises of toleration, and insisted on many other plausible topics, the parliament, who sat a little after the declaration was issued, on the 18th of February, 1663, could by no means be satisfied with this measure. The house of commons represented to the king, that his declaration of Breda contained no promise to the Presbyterians and other dissenters, but only an expression of his intentions, upon supposition of the concurrence of parliament; and among other things that the indulgence intended would prove most pernicious both to church and state, would open the door to schism, encourage faction, disturb the public peace, and discredit the wisdom of the legislature. After such a remonstrance as this, the king did not think proper to insist any farther on the project of indulgence, at least for the present.

That the Catholics might be deprived of all hopes, the two houses concurred in a remonstrance against them. The king gave a gracious answer; though he scrupled not to profess his gratitude towards many of that persuasion. A proclamation, however, for form's sake, was soon after issued against Jesuits and Romish priests; but care was taken, by the very terms of it, to render it ineffectual (y). That the king might reap some advantage from his compliances, however fallacious, he engaged the commons anew into an examination of his revenue, which, chiefly by the negligence in levying it, had proved, he said, much inferior to the public charges; and the commons, without entering into too nice an examination, voted him four subsidies; and this was the last time that taxes were levied in that form.

Several laws were made this session with regard to trade. The militia also came under consideration, and some rules were established for ordering and arming it. It was enacted, that the king should have no power of keeping the militia under arms above fourteen days in the year. The situation of this island, together with its great naval power, has always occasioned other means of security to be neglected; and the parliament showed here a jealousy of the king's strictness in disciplining the militia.

The friendship which had subsisted with great intimacy between the earl of Bristol and Clarendon during their exile and the distresses of the royal party, had been considerably impaired since the restoration, by the chancellor's refusing his assent to some grants, which Bristol had applied for to a court lady: and a little after, the latter nobleman, agreeably to the impetuosity of his temper, entered a charge of treason against him before the house of peers; but had concerted his measures so imprudently, that the judges, when consulted, declared, that, neither for its matter nor its form, could the charge be legally received. The earl of Bristol himself was so ashamed of his conduct and defeat, that he absconded during some time, and could never regain the character which he lost by this hasty transaction.

Although Clarendon was able to elude this assault, his credit at court was declining; and in proportion as the king found himself established on the throne, he began to alienate himself from a minister, whose character was so little suited to his own. Charles's favour for the Catholics was always opposed by Clarendon, public liberty was secured against all attempts of the over-zealous royalists, prodigal grants of the king were checked or refused, and the dignity of his own character was so much consulted by the chancellor, that he made it an inviolable rule, as did also his friend, Southampton, never to enter into any connexion with the royal mistresses (z). Mrs. Palmer failed not in her turn to undermine Clarendon's credit with his master; and her success was made apparent to the whole nation. Secretary Nicholas, the chancellor's great friend, was removed from his place; and sir Harry Bennet, his avowed enemy, was advanced to that office. Bennet was soon after created lord Arlington.

The king's good understanding lost much of its influence by his want of application; his bounty was more the result of a facility of disposition, than any generosity of character; his social humour led him frequently to neglect his dignity; his love of pleasure was not attended with proper sentiment and decency; and while he seemed to bear a good will to every one that approached him, he had a heart not very capable of friendship, and he had secretly entertained a very bad opinion and distrust of mankind. But above all, what sullied his character in the eyes of good judges, was his negligent ingratitude towards the unfortunate cavaliers, whose zeal and sufferings in the royal cause had known no bounds. It should, however, be recollected, that the king's revenues were far from being large, or even equal to his necessary expences; and his mistresses, and the companions of his mirth and pleasures, gained, by solicitation, every request from his easy temper. The very poverty, to which the more zealous royalists had reduced themselves, by rendering them insignificant, made them unfit to support the (x) That is to say, three hundred and six thousand two hundred and fifty pounds sterling.

(y) The parliament had allowed, that all foreign priests, belonging to the two queens, should be excepted, and that a permission for them to remain in England should still be granted. In the proclamation, the word foreign was purposely omitted; and the queens were thereby authorized to give protection to as many English priests as they should think proper.

(z) The king's favourite was Mrs. Palmer, afterwards created duchess of Cleveland; a woman prodigal, rapacious, dissolute, violent, revengeful.

king's measures, and caused him to deem them an useless incumbrance. The parliament took some notice of the poor cavaliers. Sixty thousand pounds were at one time distributed among them: Mrs. Lane also, and the Penderells, had handsome presents and pensions from the king. But the greater part of the royalists still remained in poverty and distress; and with regard to the act of indemnity and oblivion, they universally said, that it was an act of indemnity to the king's enemies, and of oblivion to his friends.

The next session of parliament, which met on the 16th of March, 1664, discovered a continuance of the same principles which had prevailed in all the foregoing. Monarchy and the church were still the objects of regard. Indeed, during no period of Charles's reign did this spirit more evidently pass the bounds of reason and moderation. The king, in his speech to the parliament, had ventured openly to demand a repeal of the trennial act; and he even declared that, notwithstanding the law, he never would allow any parliament to be assembled by the methods prescribed in that statute. The parliament, without taking offence at this declaration, repealed the law; and, in lieu of all the securities formerly provided, satisfied themselves with a general clause, "that parliaments should not be interrupted above three years at most." As the English parliament had now raised itself to be a regular check and control upon royal power, it is evident that they ought still to have preserved a regular security for their meeting; but before the end of Charles's reign, the nation had occasion to feel the effects of this repeal.

By the act of uniformity, every clergyman, who should officiate without being properly qualified, was punishable by fine and imprisonment: but this security was not thought sufficient for the church. It was now enacted, that wherever five persons above those of the same household should assemble in a religious congregation, every one of them was liable, for the first offence, to be imprisoned three months, or pay five pounds; for the second, to be imprisoned six months, or pay ten pounds; and for the third, to be transported seven years, or pay a hundred pounds.

The commons likewise passed a vote, that the wrongs, dishonours, and indignities, offered to the English by the subjects of the United Provinces, were the greatest obstructions to all foreign trade; and they promised to assist him with their lives and fortunes in asserting the rights of his crown against all opposition whatsoever. This was the first open step towards a Dutch war. But though Charles was not inclined to this war, his narrow revenues made it still requisite for him to study the humours of his people, which now ran towards hostile measures; and it has been suspected, that the hopes of diverting some of the supplies to his own private use were not overlooked by this necessitous monarch. The duke of York also eagerly pushed the war with Holland. But Clarendon and Southampton, observing that the nation was not supported by any foreign alliance, were averse to hostilities; but their credit was now on the decline. The court and parliament were both of them inclined to a Dutch war. The parliament was prorogued, on the 17th of May, without voting supplies: but as they had been induced to pass a vote against the Dutch encroachments, it was considered as sufficient sanction for the vigorous measures which were resolved on. Downing, the English minister at the Hague, a man of an insolent impetuous temper, presented a memorial to the States, containing a list of those depredations, of which the English complained (a). But Charles confined not himself to memorials and remonstrances. Sir Robert Holmes was secretly dispatched with a squadron of twenty-two ships to the coast of Africa. He not only expelled the Dutch from Cape Corse, to which the English had some pretensions; but he seized the Dutch settlements of Cape de Verde and the Isle of Goree, together with several ships trading on that coast. Having sailed to North America, he possessed himself of Nova Belgia, since called New York; a territory which James the First had given by patent to the earl of Stirling, but which had never been planted but by the Hollanders. When the States complained of these hostile measures, the king pretended to be totally ignorant of Holmes's enterprize. He likewise confined that admiral to the Tower; but some time after released him.

The Dutch perceiving that their applications for redress were likely to be eluded, and that a ground of quarrel was industriously sought for by the English, began to arm with diligence. Sir John Lawson and de Ruyter had been sent with combined squadrons into the Mediterranean, to chastise the piratical states on the coast of Barbary; and the time of their separation and return was now approaching. The States secretly dispatched orders to de Ruyter, that he should take in provisions at Cadiz; and sailing towards the coast of Guinea, should retaliate on the English, and put the Dutch in possession of those settlements whence Holmes had expelled them. De Ruyter, having a considerable force on board, met with no opposition in Guinea. All the new acquisitions of the English, except Cape Corse, were recovered from them. They were even dispossessed of some old settlements. Such of their ships as fell into his hands were seized by de Ruyter. That admiral sailed next to America. He attacked Barbadoes, but was repulsed. He afterwards committed hostilities on Long Island.

In the mean time, the English preparations for war advanced with vigour. The king had received no supplies from parliament; but by his own funds and credit was enabled to equip a fleet: the city of London lent him one hundred thousand pounds: the spirit of the nation seconded his armaments: he himself went from port to port, inspecting and encouraging the work; and in a little time the English navy was put in a formidable condition. Eight hundred thousand pounds are said to have been expended on this armament. When Lawson arrived, and communicated his suspicion of de Ruyter's enterprize, orders were issued for seizing all Dutch ships; and one hundred and thirty-five fell into the hands of the English. These were not declared prizes, till afterwards, when war was proclaimed.

The parliament, when it met, on the 24th of November, granted a supply, the largest that had ever been given to a king of England, yet scarcely sufficient for the present undertaking. Near two millions and a half were voted to be levied by quarterly payments in three years. A great alteration was likewise made in the method of taxing the clergy. A convocation, however, had usually sitten at the same time with the parliament; and assumed no other temporal power than that of imposing taxes on the clergy. But as the king's influence over the church was more considerable than over the laity, the church was not displeased to depart tacitly from the right of taxing herself, and allow the commons to lay impositions on ecclesiastical revenues, as on the rest of the kingdom. In recompence, two subsidies, which the convocation had formerly granted, were remitted, and the parochial clergy were allowed to vote at elections. Thus the church of England made a barter of power for profit. Their convocations, having become insignificant to the crown, have been much disused of late years.

The Dutch saw a war approaching, whence they might dread the most fatal consequences, but which afforded no prospect of advantage. They tried every art of negociation, before they would come to extremities. Their measures were at that time directed by John de Wit, a minister equally eminent for greatness of mind, for capacity, and for integrity. Though moderate in his private deportment, he knew how to adopt in his public counsels that magnanimity, which suits the minister of a great state. By his management a spirit of union was preserved in all the provinces; great sums were levied; and a navy was equipped, composed of larger ships than the Dutch had ever built before, and able to cope with the fleet of England.

When certain intelligence arrived of de Ruyter's enterprizes, Charles declared war against the States, on the 22nd of February, 1665. His fleet, consisting of one hundred and fourteen sail, besides fire-ships and ketches, was commanded by the duke of York, and under him by prince Rupert and the earl of Sandwich. It had about twenty-two thousand men on board. Opdam, who was admiral of the Dutch navy, of nearly equal force, declined not the combat, which took place on the 3rd of June. In the heat of action, when engaged in close fight with the duke of York, Opdam's ship blew up. This accident much discouraged the Dutch, who fled towards their own coast. Van Tromp alone, son of the famous admiral killed during the former war, bravely sustained with his squadron the efforts of the English, and protected the rear of his countrymen. The vanquished had nineteen ships sunk and taken. The victors lost only one. Sir John Lawson died soon after of his wounds.

(a) It is remarkable, that all the pretended depredations preceded the year 1662, when a treaty of league and alliance had been renewed with the Dutch; and these complaints were then thought either so ill grounded or so frivolous, that they had not been mentioned in the treaty. Two ships alone, the Bonaventure and the Good-hope, had been claimed by the English; and it was agreed that the claim should be prosecuted by the ordinary course of justice. The States had consigned a sum of money, in case the cause should be decided against them; but the matter was still in dependance. Cary, who was entrusted by the proprietors with the management of the law-suit for the Bonaventure, had resolved to accept of thirty thousand pounds, which were offered him; but was hindered by Downing, who told him, that the claim was a matter of state between the two nations, not a concern of private persons. These circumstances give us no favourable idea of the justice of the English pretensions.

It is affirmed, that this victory might have been rendered more complete, had not orders been issued to slacken sail by Brounker, one of the duke's bedchamber, who pretended authority from his master. The duke disclaimed the orders; but Brounker never was sufficiently punished for his temerity (b). It is allowed, however, that the duke behaved with great bravery during the action. He was long in the thickest of the fire. The earl of Falmouth, lord Muskerry, and Mr. Boyle, were killed by one shot at his side, and covered him all over with their brains and gore.

This disaster threw the Dutch into consternation, and determined de Wit to exert his military capacity, in order to support the declining courage of his countrymen. He went on board the fleet, which he took under his command; and soon remedied all those disorders which had been occasioned by the late misfortune.

The misfortunes of the Dutch determined their allies to act for their assistance and support. The king of France was engaged in a defensive alliance with the States. He long tried to mediate a peace between the States, and for that purpose sent an embassy to London, which returned without effecting any thing. Lord Hollis, the English ambassador at Paris, endeavoured to draw over Louis to the side of England; and, in his master's name, made him tempting offers. Charles was content to abandon the Spanish Low Countries to the French, without pretending to a foot of ground for himself; provided Louis would allow him to pursue his advantages against the Dutch. But the French monarch rejected the offer with disdain. When de Lionne, the French secretary, assured Van Beuninghen, ambassador of the States, that this offer had been pressed on his master during six months; "I can readily believe it," replied the Dutchman; "I am sensible that it is the interest of England."

The king of France, however, was resolved to support the Hollanders; yet he protracted his declaration, and employed the time in naval preparations, both in the ocean and the Mediterranean. The king of Denmark in the mean time acted a most extraordinary part: he made a secret agreement with Charles to seize all the Dutch ships in his harbours, and to share the spoils with the English, provided they would assist him in executing the measure. In order to increase his prey, he perfidiously invited the Dutch to take shelter in his ports; and accordingly the East India fleet, very richly laden, had put into Bergen. Sandwich, who now commanded the English navy (the duke having gone ashore), dispatched sir Thomas Tiddiman with a squadron to attack them; but the English admiral failed of his purpose. The Danish governor fired upon him on the 3rd of August, and the Dutch, having had leisure to fortify themselves, made a gallant resistance.

The king of Denmark, however, concluded with sir Gilbert Talbot, the English envoy, an offensive alliance against the States; at the same time, his resident at the Hague, by his orders, concluded an offensive alliance against England; and he seized and confiscated all the English ships in his harbours. That prince stipulated to assist his ally with a fleet of thirty sail; and he received in return a yearly subsidy of one million five hundred thousand crowns, of which three hundred thousand were paid by France.

Charles endeavoured to counterbalance these confederacies by sending sir Richard Fanshaw to Spain, but he met with a cold reception. No motive could prevail with Philip to enter into cordial friendship with England. The bishop of Munster was the only ally that Charles could acquire. This prelate had entertained a violent animosity against the States; and was easily engaged, by the promise of subsidies from England, to make an incursion on that republic. With a tumultuary army of near twenty thousand men, he invaded her territories, and met with weak resistance. But after committing great ravages in several of the provinces, a stop was put to the progress of this warlike prelate. The king of France sent a body of six thousand men to oppose him: subsidies were not regularly remitted him from England; and many of his troops deserted for want of pay: the elector of Brandenburgh threatened him with an invasion in his own state; and he was glad to conclude a peace under the mediation of France. On the first surmise of his intentions, sir William Temple was sent from London with money to fix him in his former alliance; but he arrived too late.

The Dutch continued to exert themselves in their own defence. De Ruyter, their great admiral, was arrived from his expedition to Guinea: their Indian fleet was come home in safety: their harbours were crowded with merchant ships: faction at home was appeased: the young prince of Orange had put himself under the tuition of the States of Holland, and of de Wit, their pensionary, who executed his trust with honour and fidelity: and the animosity, which the Hollanders entertained against the attack of the English, made them thirst for revenge, and hope for better success in their next enterprize. Such vigour was exerted in the common cause, that, in order to man the fleet, all merchant ships were prohibited to sail, and even the fisheries were suspended.

The English likewise continued in the same disposition, though another more grievous calamity had joined itself to that of war. The plague had broken out in London; and that with such violence as to cut off, in a year, near ninety thousand inhabitants. The king was obliged to summon the parliament at Oxford, on the 10th of October. The parliament, being on a good understanding with the king, unanimously voted him twelve hundred and fifty thousand pounds, to be levied in two years by monthly assessments. And he, to gratify their wishes, passed the five-mile-act, which has given occasion to grievous and not unjust complaints (c). The parliament, after a short session, was prorogued, on the 31st of the same month, having sat only twenty-one days.

After France had declared war, England was evidently overmatched in force. Louis had given orders, in May, 1666, to the duke of Beaufort, his admiral, to sail from Toulon; and the French squadron, under his command, consisting of above forty sail, was now supposed to be entering the channel. The Dutch fleet, to the number of seventy-six sail, was at sea, under de Ruyter and Van Tromp, in order to join him. The duke of Albemarle, and prince Rupert commanded the English fleet, which exceeded not seventy-four sail. Albemarle, who, from his successes under the protector, had too much learned to despise the enemy, proposed to detach prince Rupert with twenty ships, in order to oppose the duke of Beaufort. Sir George Ayscue, well acquainted with the bravery and conduct of de Ruyter, protested against the rashness of this resolution: but Albemarle's authority pre-

(b) King James, in his Memoirs, gives an account of this affair different from what we meet with in any historian. He says, that, while he was asleep, Brounker brought orders to sir John Harman, captain of the ship to slacken sail. Sir John remonstrated, but obeyed. After some time, finding that his falling back was likely to produce confusion in the fleet, he hoisted the sail as before: so that the prince coming soon after on the quarter-deck, and finding all things as he left them, knew nothing of what had passed during his repose. No body gave him the least intimation of it. It was long after, that he heard of it by a kind of accident; and he intended to have punished Brounker by martial law; but just about that time, the house of commons took up the question and impeached him, which made it impossible for the duke to punish him otherwise than by dismissing him his service. Brounker, before the house, never pretended that he had received any orders from the duke.

(c) The episcopal church, under pretence of guarding monarchy, persevered in the project of wreaking her own enmity against the non-conformists. It was by this bill enacted, that no dissenting teacher who took not the non-resistance oath, should, except upon the road, come within five miles of any corporation, or of any place, where he had preached after the act of oblivion. The penalty was a fine of fifty pounds, and six months imprisonment. By ejecting the non-conforming clergy from their churches, and prohibiting all separate congregations, they had been rendered incapable of gaining any livelihood by their spiritual profession. And now, under colour of removing them from places where it was supposed their influence might be dangerous, an expedient was fallen upon to deprive them of all means of subsistence. Had not the spirit of the nation undergone a change, these violent proceedings were preludes to the most furious persecution. But however prevalent the hierarchy, this law did not pass without opposition. Besides several peers, attached to the old parliamentary party, Southampton himself, though Clarendon's great friend, expressed his disapprobation of these rigorous measures. But the church party, not discouraged with this opposition, introduced into the house of commons a bill for opposing the oath of non-resistance on the whole nation. It was rejected only by three voices.

vailed. The remainder of the English set sail to give battle to the Dutch; who, seeing the enemy advance quickly upon them, cut their cables, and prepared for the combat. The battle that ensued, is one of the most memorable that we read of in history; whether we consider its long duration, or the desperate courage with which it was fought. Albemarle made here some atonement by his valour for the rashness of the attempt. No person, animated by glory and ambitious hopes, could exert himself more than did this nobleman, who was now in the decline of life, and who had reached the summit of honours.

In the first day of the battle, June the first, 1666, sir William Berkeley, vice-admiral, leading the van, fell into the thickest of the enemy, was overpowered, and his ship taken. He himself was found dead in his cabin, covered with blood. The English had the weather-gage of the enemy; but as the wind blew hard, they could not use their lower tire, and derived but small advantage from this circumstance. The Dutch shot, however, fell chiefly on their sails and rigging; and few ships were sunk or much damaged. Chain-shot was at that time a new invention; commonly attributed to de Wit. Sir John Harman exerted himself extremely on this day. The Dutch admiral, Evertz, was killed in engaging him. Darkness parted the combatants.

The second day, the wind was somewhat fallen, and the combat became more steady and terrible. The English now found, that the greatest valour cannot compensate the superiority of numbers, against an enemy who is well conducted, and who is not defective in courage. De Ruyter and Van Tromp exerted themselves in emulation of each other; and de Ruyter had the advantage of disengaging and saving Van Tromp, who had been surrounded by the English, and was in the most imminent danger. Sixteen fresh ships joined the Dutch fleet during the action: and the English were so shattered, that their fighting ships were reduced to twenty-eight, and they found themselves obliged to retreat towards their own coast. The Dutch followed them, and were on the point of renewing the combat; when a calm, which came a little before night, prevented the engagement.

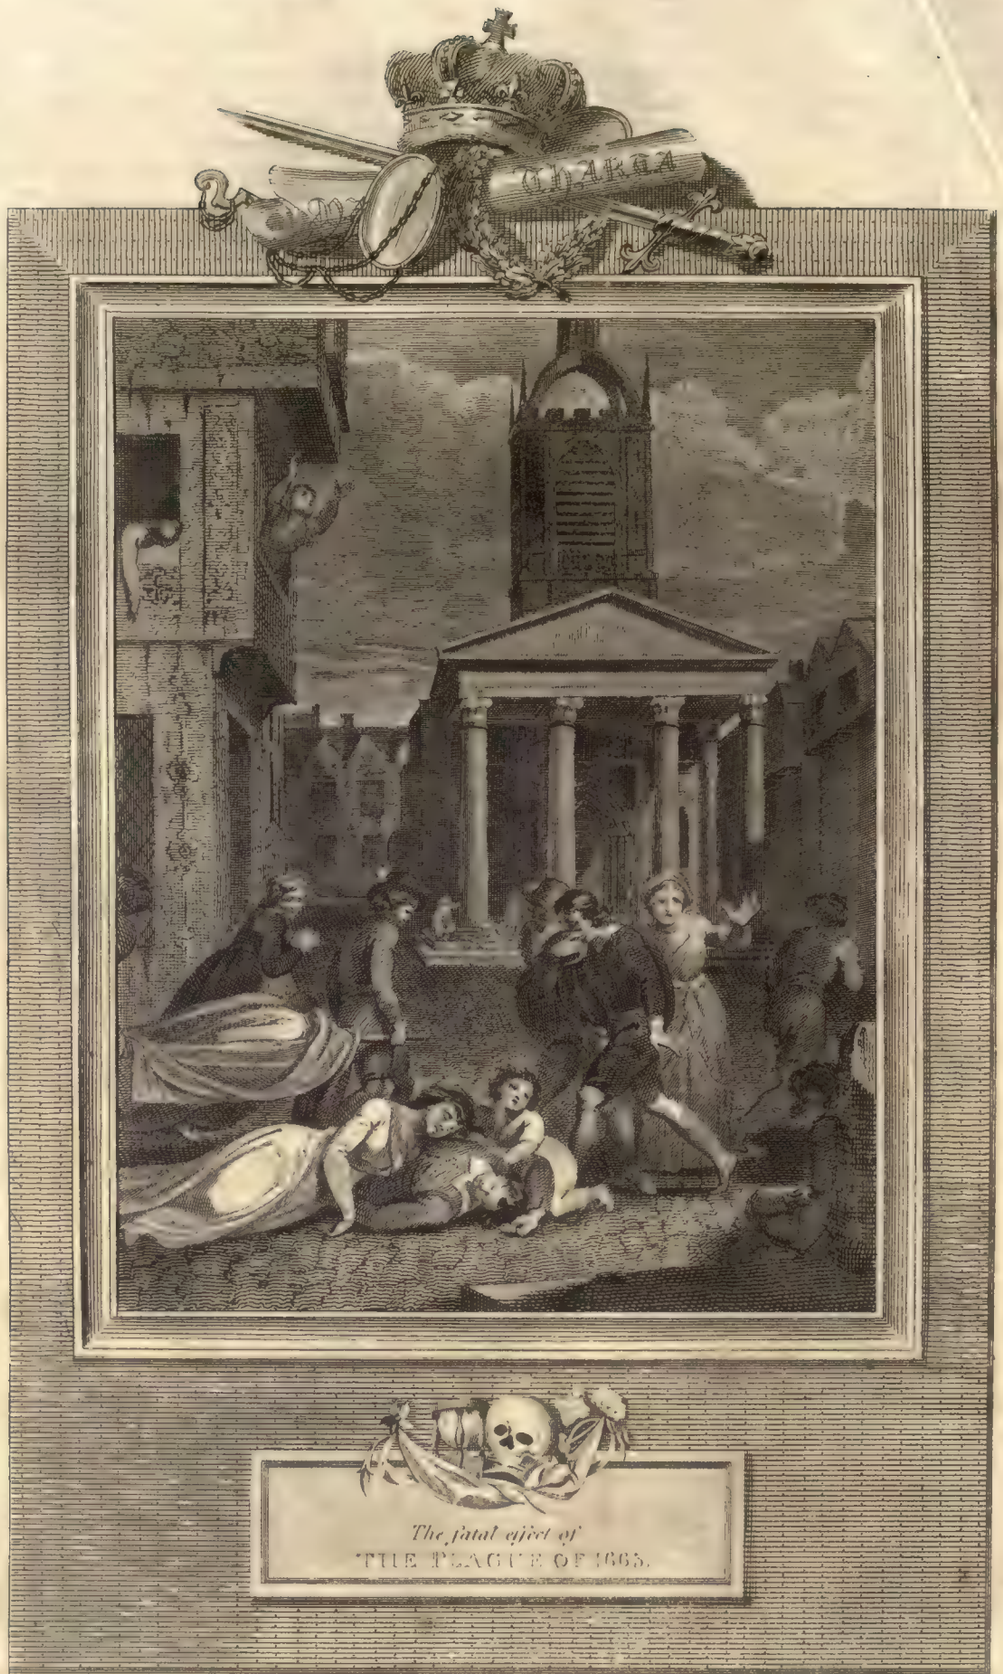
Next morning, the English continued their retreat; and a proper disposition was made for that purpose. The shattered ships were ordered to stretch a-head; and sixteen of the least disabled followed them in good order, and kept the enemy in awe. Albemarle himself closed the rear, and presented an undaunted countenance to his victorious foes. The earl of Ossory, son of the duke of Ormond, a gallant youth, who sought honour and experience in every action throughout Europe, was then on board the admiral. Albemarle confessed to him his intention rather to blow up his ship and perish gloriously, than yield to the enemy. Ossory applauded the desperate resolution. About two o'clock, the Dutch had come up with their enemy, and were ready to renew the fight; when a new fleet was descried from the south, crowding all their sail to reach the scene of action. The Dutch flattered themselves that Beaufort was arrived, to cut off the retreat of the vanquished: the English hoped that prince Rupert had come, to turn the scale of action. Albemarle, who had received intelligence of the prince's approach, bent his course towards him. Unhappily, sir George Ayscue, in a ship of a hundred guns, the largest in the fleet, struck on the Galloper sands, and could receive no assistance from his friends, who were hastening to join the reinforcement. He could not even reap the consolation of perishing with honour, and revenging his death on his enemies. They were preparing fireships to attack him, and he was obliged to strike. The English sailors, seeing the necessity, with the utmost indignation surrendered themselves prisoners. Albemarle and prince Rupert were now determined to face the enemy; and next morning the battle began afresh, with more equal force than ever, and with equal valour. After long cannonading, the fleets came to a close combat; which was continued with great violence, till parted by a mist. The English retired first into their harbours.

Although the English, by their obstinate courage, reaped great honour in this engagement, it is uncertain who obtained the victory. The Hollanders took a few ships; and having some appearances of advantage, expressed their satisfaction by all the signs of triumph and rejoicing. The English fleet was repaired in a little time and put to sea more formidable than ever, together with some of those ships which the Dutch had boasted to have burned or destroyed.

The conjunction of the French gave a decisive superiority to the Dutch. In order to facilitate this conjunction, de Ruyter, having repaired his fleet, posted himself at the mouth of the Thames. The English, under prince Rupert and Albemarle, were not long in coming to the attack. The numbers of each fleet amounted to about eighty sail; and the valour and experience of the commanders, as well as of the seamen, rendered the engagement, which was fought on the 25th of July, fierce and obstinate. Sir Thomas Allen, who commanded the white squadron of the English, attacked the Dutch van, which he entirely routed; and killed the three admirals who commanded it. Van Tromp engaged sir Jeremy Smith; and during the heat of action, he was separated from de Ruyter and the main body. De Ruyter maintained the combat against the main body of the English; and though overpowered by numbers, kept his station, till night ended the engagement. Next day, finding the Dutch fleet scattered and discouraged, his high spirit submitted to a retreat, which yet he conducted with such skill, as to render it equally honourable to himself as the greatest victory. Full of indignation however at yielding the superiority to the enemy, he frequently exclaimed, "My God! what a wretch am I? among so many thousand bullets, is there not one to put an end to my miserable life?" One de Wit, his son-in-law, who stood near, exhorted him, since he sought death, to turn upon the English, and render his life a dear purchase to the victors. But de Ruyter esteemed it more worthy a brave man to persevere to the uttermost, and, as long as possible, to render service to his country. All that night and next day, the English pressed upon the rear of the Dutch; and it was chiefly by the redoubled efforts of de Ruyter, that the latter saved themselves in their harbours (d).

The English now rode masters of the sea, and insulted the Dutch in their harbours. A detachment under Holmes was sent into the road of Vlie, and burned a hundred and forty merchantmen, two men of war, together with Brandaris, a large and rich village on the coast. The Dutch merchants, who lost by this enterprize, uniting themselves to the Orange faction, exclaimed against an administration, which, they pretended, had brought such disgrace and ruin on their country. None but the firm and intrepid mind of de Wit could have supported itself under such a complication of calamities.

The king of France, apprehensive that the Dutch would sink under their misfortunes, hastened the advance of the duke of Beaufort. The Dutch fleet was again equipped; and under the command of de Ruyter, cruised near the straits of Dover. Prince Rupert with the English navy, now stronger than ever, came upon them. The Dutch admiral declined the combat, and retired into St. John's road, near Bulloigne. Here he sheltered himself, both from the English, and from a furious storm, which arose. Prince Rupert too was obliged to retire into St. Helens; where he staid some time, to repair the damages which he had sustained. Meanwhile the duke of Beaufort proceeded up the channel, and passed the English fleet unperceived; but did not find the Dutch, as he expected. De Ruyter had been seized with a fever: many of the chief officers had fallen into sickness: a contagious distemper was spread through the fleet; and the States thought it necessary to recall them into their harbours, before the enemy could be refitted. The French king, anxious for his navy, which, with so much care and industry, he had lately built, dispatched orders to Beaufort, to make the best of his way to Brest. That admiral had again the good fortune to pass the English. One ship alone, the Ruby, fell into the hands of the enemy.



While the war continued without any decisive success on either side, a calamity happened in London, which threw the people into great consternation. Fire, breaking out, on the 3rd of September, in a baker's house near London Bridge, spread itself on all sides with such rapidity, that no efforts could extinguish it, till it laid in ashes a considerable part of the city. The inhabitants, without being able to provide effectually for their relief, were reduced to be spectators of their own ruin; and were pursued from street to street by the devouring flames, which unexpectedly gathered round them. Three days and nights did the fire advance; and it was only by the blowing up of houses, that it was at last extinguished. The king and the duke of York used their utmost endeavours to stop the progress of the flames; but all their industry was unsuccessful. By this dreadful conflagration thirteen thousand houses were burnt down, the city gates, Guildhall, &c. eighty-six churches, amongst which were St. Paul's cathedral, and four hundred streets. The ruins of this city covered four hundred and thirty-six acres, extending from the Tower in the east to the Temple Church in the west; and from the north-east gate to Holborn Bridge and Fleet Ditch. It was a remark made, that the fire began at Pudding Lane near the Monument, (which was erected in commemoration of this dreadful fire,) and ended at Pye Corner, West Smithfield (e).

(d) The loss sustained by the Hollanders in this action was not very considerable; but as violent animosities had broken out between the two admirals, who engaged all the officers on one side or other, the consternation, which took place, was great among the provinces. Tromp's commission was at last taken from him; but though several captains had misbehaved, they were so effectually protected by their friends in the magistracy of towns, that most of them escaped punishment, and many were still continued in their commands.

The fire of London, though at that time a great calamity, has in the issue proved beneficial both to the city and the kingdom. The city was rebuilt in a very little time; and care was taken to make the streets wider and more regular than before. A discretionary power was assumed by the king to regulate the distribution of the buildings, and to forbid the use of lath and timber, the materials of which the houses were formerly composed. The necessity was so urgent, and the occasion so extraordinary, that no exceptions were taken at an exercise of authority, which otherwise might have been deemed illegal. Great advantages have resulted from the alterations; though not carried to the full length. London became much more healthy after the fire. The plague, which used to break out with great fury twice or thrice in a century, and indeed was always lurking in some corner or other of the city, has scarcely ever appeared since that calamity.

The parliament met soon after, and gave the sanction of law to those regulations made by royal authority; as well as appointed commissioners for deciding all such questions of property, as might arise from the fire. They likewise voted a supply of one million eight hundred thousand pounds to be levied, partly by a poll-bill, partly by assessments. Though their inquiry brought out no proofs, which could fix on the papists the burning of London, the general aversion against that sect still prevailed. Charles, at the desire of the commons, issued a proclamation for the banishment of all priests and jesuits; but the tardy execution of this, as well as of former edicts against the catholics, destroyed all confidence in his sincerity. The intrigues of the duke of Buckingham had somewhat embarrassed the measures of the court; and this was the first time that the king found any reason to complain of a failure of confidence in this house of commons.

Charles began to be sensible, that the ends, for which the war had been undertaken, were likely to prove abortive. The Dutch had defended themselves with vigour, and were every day improving in their military skill and preparations. Though their trade had suffered greatly, their credit enabled them to levy great sums; and while the seamen of England complained for want of pay, the Dutch navy was supplied with money and every requisite for its subsistence. As two powerful kings supported the Dutch, every place from the extremity of Norway to the coasts of Bayonne, was become hostile to the English. And Charles earnestly sought for means of restoring tranquillity to his people, who were now disgusted with the war.

The first advances towards an accommodation were made by England. When the king sent for the body of sir William Berkeley, he insinuated to the States his desire of peace on reasonable terms; and their answer corresponded in the same amicable intentions. Charles, however, to maintain the appearance of superiority, still insisted that the States should treat at London; and they agreed to make him this compliment so far as concerned themselves: but being engaged in alliance with two crowned heads, they could not, they said, prevail with these to depart in that respect from their dignity. The king then offered to send ambassadors to the Hague; but this proposal was rejected; and conferences were secretly held in the queen-mother's apartments at Paris, where the pretensions of both parties were discussed. The Dutch made equitable proposals; and almost every thing was adjusted, except the disputes with regard to the isle of Polerone, in the East Indies, which was formerly valuable for its produce of spices. As neither party seemed likely to be satisfied, it was agreed to transfer the treaty to some other place; and Charles made choice of Breda. Lord Hollis and Henry Coventry, the English ambassadors, immediately desired, that a suspension of arms should be agreed to, till the several claims could be adjusted: but this proposal was rejected by the credit of de Wit.

Whatever projects might have been formed by Charles for secreting the money granted him by parliament, he had hitherto failed in his intention. The expences of such vast armaments had exhausted all the supplies (f); and even a great debt was contracted to the seamen. The king therefore was resolved to save, as far as possible, the last supply of one million eight hundred thousand pounds; and to employ it for payment of his debts. Thus, by an ill-timed frugality, Charles remitted his preparations, and exposed England to one of the greatest insults which it ever received. Two small squadrons alone were equipped; and during a war with such potent and martial enemies, every thing was left almost in the same situation as in times of peace.

De Wit protracted the negociations at Breda, and hastened the naval preparations. The Dutch fleet appeared in the Thames, on the 10th of June, 1667, under the command of de Ruyter, and threw the English into the utmost consternation. A chain had been drawn across the river Medway; some fortifications had been added to Sheerness and Upnore Castle: but these preparations were unequal to the present necessity. Sheerness was soon taken; nor could it be saved by the valour of sir Edward Sprague, who defended it. Having the advantage of a spring tide and an easterly wind, the Dutch pressed on, and broke the chain, though fortified by some ships, which had been there sunk by orders of the duke of Albemarle. They burned the three ships, which lay to guard the chain, the Matthias, the Unity, and the Charles the Fifth. After damaging several vessels, and possessing themselves of the hull of the Royal Charles, which the English had burned, they advanced with six men of war and five fire-ships, as far as Upnore Castle, where they burned the Royal Oak, the Loyal London, and the Great James. Captain Douglas, who commanded on board the Royal Oak, perished in the flames, though he had an easy opportunity of escaping. "Never was it known," he said, "that a Douglas had left his post without orders." The Hollanders fell down the Medway without receiving any considerable damage; and it was apprehended, that they might next tide sail up the Thames, and extend their hostilities even to the bridge of London. Nine ships were sunk at Woolwich, four at Blackwall: platforms were raised in many places, furnished with artillery: the train-bands were called out; and every place was in violent agitation. The Dutch sailed next to Portsmouth, where they made a fruitless attempt: they met with no better success at Plymouth: they insulted Harwich: they sailed again up the Thames as far as Tilbury, where they were repulsed. The whole coast was in alarm; and had the French joined the (e) The causes of this calamity were variously reported. The narrow streets of London, the houses built entirely of wood, the dry season, and a violent east wind which blew; these were so many concurring circumstances, which rendered it easy to assign the reason of the destruction that ensued. But the people were not satisfied with this obvious account. Prompted by blind rage, some ascribed the guilt to the republicans, others to the catholics; though it is not easy to conceive how the burning of London could serve the purposes of either party. As the papists were the chief objects of public detestation, the rumour, which threw the guilt on them, was more favourably received by the people. No proof, however, or even presumption, after the strictest inquiry by a committee of parliament, ever appeared to authorize such a calumny; yet, in order to give countenance to the popular prejudice, the inscription, engraved by authority on the monument, ascribed this calamity to that hated sect. This clause was erazed by order of James the Second, when he came to the throne; but after the revolution it was replaced. So credulous, as well as obstinate, are the people, in believing every thing which flatters their prevailing passion!

In "Anecdotes of the Manners and Customs of London," by J. Malcolm, F.S.A. lately published, occurs the following curious note, at p. 255. "This subject may be allowed to be familiar to me, and I have, perhaps, had more than common means of judging; and I now declare it to be my full and decided opinion, that London was burnt by government to annihilate the plague, which was grafted in every crevice of the hateful old houses composing it."

(f) The Dutch had spent on the war near forty millions of livres a-year, above three millions sterling: a much greater sum had been granted by the English parliament. D'Estrades, 24th of December, 1665; 1st of January, 1666. Temple, vol. i. p. 71. It was probably the want of money which engaged the king to pay the seamen with tickets; a contrivance which proved so much to their loss.

Dutch fleet at this time, consequences the most fatal might have been apprehended. But Louis had no intention to push the victory to such extremities.

An army of twelve thousand men was suddenly levied; and the parliament, though it lay under prorogation, was summoned to meet. The houses were very thin; and the only vote, which the commons passed, was an address for breaking the army; which was complied with. This expression of jealousy shewed the court what they might expect from that assembly; and it was thought prudent to prorogue them till next winter. But the signing of the treaty at Breda, which took place on the 10th of July, extricated the king from his present difficulties (g).

The chancellor was at this period much hated by the public, and every party which divided the nation. The numerous sectaries regarded him as their enemy; and ascribed to his advice and influence those persecuting laws, to which they had lately been exposed. The catholics knew, that while he retained any authority, all their credit with the king (h) and the duke would be entirely useless to them, nor must they ever expect any favour or indulgence. Even the royalists, disappointed in their hopes of preferment, threw a load of calumny on Clarendon, into whose hands the king seemed at first to have resigned the whole power of government. The sale of Dunkirk, the bad payment of the seamen, the disgrace at Chatham, the unsuccessful conclusion of the war; all these misfortunes were charged on the chancellor, who, though he had opposed the rupture with Holland, thought it his duty to justify it. A building, likewise, of more expence and magnificence than his slender fortune could afford, being undertaken by him, exposed him to public reproach. The populace gave it commonly the appellation of Dunkirk House. The king himself, who had always more revered than loved the chancellor, was now totally estranged from him. What perhaps touched Charles more nearly, he found in Clarendon, it is said, obstacles to his pleasures as well as to his ambition. The king too, disgusted with the homely person of his consort, and desirous of having children, had hearkened to proposals of obtaining a divorce, on pretence either of her being pre-engaged to another, or of having made a vow of chastity before her marriage. He was farther stimulated by his passion for Mrs. Stuart, daughter of a Scotch gentleman; whose virtue he had hitherto found impregnable: but Clarendon, apprehensive of the consequences attending a disputed title, engaged the duke of Richmond to marry Mrs. Stuart, and thereby put an end to the king's hopes. It is pretended that Charles never forgave this disappointment. The great seal was taken from him, and given to sir Orlando Bridgeman, by the title of lord keeper, on the 30th of August, 1667. Southampton, the treasurer, was now dead, who had persevered to the utmost in his attachments to the chancellor. The last time he appeared at the council-table, he exerted his friendship with a vigour which neither age nor infirmities could abate. "This man," said he, speaking of Clarendon, "is a true Protestant, and an honest Englishman; and while he enjoys power, we are secure of our laws, liberties, and religion. I dread the consequences of his removal." But the fall of the chancellor was not sufficient to gratify the malice of his enemies: his total ruin was resolved on. The duke of York in vain exerted his interest in behalf of his father-in-law. Both prince and people united in promoting that violent measure.

The king, by popular acts, paved the way for the session; and the parliament, in their first address, on the 14th of October, gave the king thanks for these instances of his goodness, and, among the rest, for his dismission of Clarendon. The king, in reply, assured the houses, that he would never again employ that nobleman in any public office whatsoever. Immediately, the charge against him was opened in the house of commons by Mr. Seymour, afterwards sir Edward, and consisted of seventeen articles. The house, without examining particulars, farther than hearing general affirmations, that all would be proved, immediately voted his impeachment. Many of the articles were false or frivolous; but his advising the sale of Dunkirk, seems the heaviest and truest part of the charge; yet the king's necessities appear to have occasioned that measure. When the impeachment was carried up to the peers, as it contained an accusation of treason in general, without specifying particulars, it seemed not a sufficient ground for committing Clarendon to custody; but as the commons insisted upon his commitment, it was necessary to appoint a free conference between the houses. The lords persevered in their resolution; and the commons voted this conduct to be an obstruction to public justice, and a precedent of evil and dangerous tendency. Clarendon, finding that the popular torrent ran against him, thought proper to withdraw. At Calais, he wrote a paper addressed to the house of lords, which was presented to the peers on the 3rd of December; which the lords transmitted to the commons under the appellation of a libel; and by a vote of both houses, it was condemned to be burned by the hands of the hangman. The parliament next passed a bill of banishment and incapacity against Clarendon, which received the royal assent on the 19th of December. He retired into France, where he lived in a private manner. He survived his banishment seven years; and he employed his leisure chiefly in reducing into order the History of the Civil Wars, for which he had before collected materials (i).

Charles seems never to have mitigated his resentment against Clarendon; and the national prejudices pursued him to his retreat in France. A company of English soldiers, being quartered near him, assaulted his house, broke open the doors, gave him a dangerous wound on the head, and would have proceeded to the last extremities, had not their officers, hearing of the violence, timely interposed.

In the beginning of 1668, the king embraced an expedient to acquire popularity, which is more deserving of praise. This was the Triple Alliance; a measure, which gave entire satisfaction to the public.

The glory of France, which had long been eclipsed, either by domestic factions, or by the superior force of the Spanish monarchy, began now to break out with great lustre, and to engage the attention of the neighbouring nations. The independent power and mutinous spirit of the nobility were subdued: the popular pretensions of the parliament restrained: the Hugonot party reduced to subjection: that extensive and fertile country, enjoying every advantage both of climate and situation, was fully peopled with ingenious and industrious inhabitants: and while the spirit of the nation discovered all the vigour and bravery requisite for great enterprizes, it was tamed to an entire submission under the will of the sovereign.

The sudden decline and almost total fall of the Spanish monarchy, opened an inviting field to so enterprizing a prince as Louis XIV. and seemed to promise him easy and extensive conquests. The other nations of Europe, feeble or ill-governed, were astonished at the greatness of his rising empire; and all of them cast their eyes towards England, as the only power which could save them from that subjection with which they seemed to be so nearly threatened.

The animosity which had formerly subsisted between the English and French nations, and which had been suspended for above a century through jealousy of Spanish greatness, began to revive and to exert itself. The chi-

(g) The English ambassadors received orders to recede from those demands, which, however frivolous in themselves, could not now be relinquished, without acknowledging a superiority in the enemy. Polerone remained with the Dutch; satisfaction for the ships Bonaventure and Good-Hope, the pretended grounds of the quarrel, was no longer insisted on: Acadie was yielded to the French. The acquisition of New York, a settlement so important by its situation, was the chief advantage which the English reaped from a war, in which the national character of bravery had shone out with lustre, but where the misconduct of the government had been no less apparent.

(h) It has been confidently asserted, that while Charles was in France, in order to ingratiate himself with the pope, and to obtain a pension from the French court, he changed his religion, and became a proselyte to the Catholic system. This was shortly after the battle of Worcester, but Burnet thinks that change did not take place till 1659.

(i) Clarendon, at the commencement of the civil wars, had entered into the late king's service, and was honoured with a great share in the esteem and friendship of that monarch: he was pursued with unrelenting animosity by the long parliament: he had shared all the fortunes, and directed all the counsels of the present king during his exile: he had been advanced to the highest trust and offices after the restoration: yet all these circumstances, which might naturally operate with such force, either on resentment, gratitude, or ambition, had no influence on his mind. It is said, that when he first engaged in the study of the law, his father exhorted him with great earnestness to shun the practice too common in that profession, of straining every point in favour of prerogative, and perverting so useful a science to the oppression of liberty: and in the midst of these rational and virtuous counsels, which he reiterated, he was suddenly seized with an apoplexy, and expired in his son's presence. This circumstance gave additional weight to the principles which he inculcated.

mera of preserving the balance of Europe, flattered the ambition of England; and the people were eager to provide for their future security, by opposing the progress of so detested a rival. The prospect of embracing such measures had contributed to render the peace of Breda acceptable to the nation. By the death of Philip IV. king of Spain, an inviting opportunity had been afforded to call forth the ambition of Louis.

At the treaty of the Pyrenees, when Louis espoused the Spanish princess, he had renounced every title of succession to every part of the Spanish monarchy; and this renunciation had been couched in the most accurate and precise terms that language could afford. But, on the death of his father-in-law, he retracted his renunciation, and pretended that natural rights, depending on blood and succession, could not be annihilated by any extorted deed or contract. Philip had left a son, Charles II. of Spain; but as the queen of France was of a former marriage, she laid claim to a considerable province of the Spanish monarchy, even to the exclusion of her brother (k).

Having made this claim, Louis appeared in 1668 on the frontiers of the Netherlands with an army of forty thousand men, commanded by the best generals of the age, and exceedingly well appointed. The Spaniards were totally unprepared. Their towns fell into the hands of the French king, as soon as he presented himself before them. Athe, Lisle, Tournay, Oudenarde, Courtray, Charleroi, Binche, were immediately taken: and it was visible that no force in the Low Countries was able to stop or retard the progress of the French arms. This measure gave alarm to almost every court in Europe. It had been observed with what dignity, or even haughtiness, Louis, from the time he began to govern, had ever supported all his rights and pretensions. The conduct of Louis had given strong indications of his character: but the invasion of Flanders discovered an ambition which, being supported by such overgrown power, menaced the general liberties of Europe.

As no state lay nearer the danger, none was seized with more terror than the United Provinces. They were still engaged, together with France, in a war against England; and Charles, acquainted with these apprehensions of the Dutch, had been the more obstinate in insisting on his own conditions at Breda; and by delaying to sign the treaty, had exposed himself to the disgrace which he received at Chatham. De Wit, sensible that a few weeks delay would be of no consequence in the Low Countries, took this opportunity of striking an important blow, and of finishing the war with honour to himself and his country.

Negociations in the meantime commenced for the saving of Flanders; but no resistance was made to the French arms. The Spanish ministers exclaimed against the injustice of Louis's pretensions, and represented it to be the interest of every power in Europe, to prevent his conquest of the Low Countries. The emperor and the German princes discovered symptoms of discontent; but their motions were slow and backward. And though Louis, dreading a combination of all Europe, had offered terms of accommodation, the Dutch were apprehensive that they would never be carried into execution.

Charles resolved to take the first step towards a confederacy. Sir William Temple, his resident at Brussels, received orders to go secretly to the Hague, and to concert with the States the means of saving the Netherlands. This man, whom philosophy had taught to despise the world, without rendering him unfit for it, was frank, open, sincere, superior to the little tricks of vulgar politicians: and meeting in de Wit with a man of the same generous and enlarged sentiments, he immediately opened his master's intentions, and pressed a speedy conclusion. A treaty was from the first negociated between these two statesmen with the same cordiality as if it were a private transaction between intimate companions. Deeming the interests of their country the same, they gave full scope to that sympathy of character which disposed them to an entire reliance on each other's professions and engagements. And though jealousy against the house of Orange might inspire de Wit with an aversion to a strict union with England, he generously resolved to sacrifice all private considerations to the public service.

Temple insisted on an offensive league between England and Holland, in order to oblige France to relinquish all her conquests: but de Wit told him, that this measure was too bold and precipitate to be agreed to by the States. He said, that the French were the old and constant allies of the republic; and, till matters came to extremities, she never would deem it prudent to abandon a friendship so well established, and rely entirely on a treaty with England, which had lately waged so cruel a war against her. At length the English minister was content to accept of the terms proposed by the pensionary. Louis had offered to relinquish all the queen's rights, on condition either of keeping the conquests which he had made last campaign, or of receiving, in lieu of them, Franchecomté, together with Cambray, Aire, and St. Omers. De Wit and Temple founded their treaty upon this proposal. They agreed to offer their mediation to the contending powers, and oblige France to adhere to this alternative, and Spain to accept of it. If Spain refused, they agreed, that France should not prosecute her claim by arms, but leave it entirely to England and Holland to employ force for making the terms effectual. And the remainder of the Low Countries they thenceforth guarranteed to Spain. A defensive alliance was likewise concluded between Holland and England (l).

An opening had been left in the treaty for the accession of Sweden, which was soon after obtained; and thus was concluded in five days the triple league; an event received with equal surprize and approbation by the different European courts. Notwithstanding the unfortunate conclusion of the last war, England, by this wise conduct, had recovered her influence and credit among the continental powers. Temple likewise received great applause; but to all the compliments made him on the occasion, he modestly replied, that to remove things from their centre, or proper element, required force and labour; but that of themselves they easily returned to it.

The French monarch was extremely displeased with this measure; for by it, not only bounds were at present set to his ambition, but such a barrier was raised as seemed for ever impregnable. The court of Madrid shewed equal displeasure. But Temple and de Wit knew, that Spain must still retain the Low Countries, as a bond of connection with the other European powers, who alone, if her young monarch should die without issue, could insure her independency against the pretensions of France. They still urged, therefore, the terms of the triple league, and threatened Spain in case of refusal. The plenipotentiaries of all the powers met at Aix-la-Chapelle. Temple was minister for England; Van Beuninghen for Holland; D'Ohna for Sweden.

At last Spain, pressed on all hands, accepted of the alternative offered; but in her very compliance, gave strong symptoms of ill-humour and discontent. Franche Comté, by a vigorous and well-concerted plan of the French king, had been conquered, in fifteen days, during a rigorous season, and in the midst of winter. She chose, therefore, to recover this province, and to abandon all the towns conquered in Flanders during the last campaign. By this mean, Louis extended his garrisons into the heart of the Low Countries; and a very feeble barrier remained to the Spanish provinces. All Europe seemed now to repose herself with security under the wings of that powerful confederacy, which had been so happily formed for her protection.

Thus was England, since the restoration, brought to a proper state for ensuring at once, both her tranquillity and her liberty: the king was in continual want of supply from the parliament; and he appeared to be willing to accommodate himself to that dependent situation. Instead of (k) By the customs of some parts of Brabant, a female of a first marriage was preferred to a male of a second, in the succession to private inheritances; and Louis thence inferred, that his queen had acquired a right to the dominion of that important duchy.

(l) The articles of this confederacy were soon adjusted by such candid and able negociators: but the greatest difficulty still remained. By the constitution of the republic, all the towns in all the provinces must give their consent to every alliance; and besides that this formality could not be dispatched in less than two months, it was justly to be dreaded, that the influence of France would obstruct the passing of the treaty in some of the smaller cities. D'Estrades, the French ambassador, a man of abilities, hearing of the league which was on the carpet, treated it lightly; "Six weeks hence," said he, "we shall speak of it." To obviate this difficulty, de Wit had the courage, for the public good, to break through the laws in so fundamental an article; and by his authority, he prevailed with the States General at once to sign and ratify the league: though they acknowledged that, if that measure should displease their constituents, they risked their heads by this irregularity. After sealing, all parties embraced with great cordiality, Temple cried out, "At Breda, as friends: Here, as brothers." And de Wit added, that now the matter was finished it looked like a miracle.

reviving

reviving those claims of prerogative, so strenuously insisted on by his predecessors, Charles had strictly confined himself within the limits of the law, and had courted, by every art of popularity, the affections of his people. Even the severities, however blameable, which he had exercised against non-conformists, are to be considered as expedients by which he strove to ingratiate himself with that party which predominated in parliament. But notwithstanding these appearances, there were many circumstances which kept the government from resting steadily on that foundation on which it was placed. The crown having lost almost all its ancient demesnes, relied on voluntary grants of the people; but the commons were not disposed to supply the necessities of the crown with that liberality which Charles's extravagancies seemed to require. They imitated the example of their predecessors in a rigid frugality of public money; for which indeed they were to be commended; but they did not altogether consider the indigent condition of their prince, nor the general state of Europe. Some considerable sums, however, were bestowed on Charles; and the patriots of that age, tenacious of ancient maxims, loudly upbraided the commons with prodigality. Attempts were made to gain an ascendant over the commons by offices, and by bribes and pensions; but these artifices operated in a manner contrary to what was intended by the ministers. The novelty of the practice conveyed a general, and indeed a just alarm; while, at the same time, the poverty of the crown rendered this influence very limited and precarious.

On the 8th of February, the parliament met, after a long adjournment; and the king promised himself every thing from the attachment of the commons. All his late measures had been calculated to acquire the good-will of his people; and, above all, the triple league, it was hoped, would be able to efface all the disagreeable impressions left by the unhappy conclusion of the Dutch war. But a new attempt made by the court lost him, for a time, the effect of all these endeavours. Buckingham, who was in great favour with the king, and carried on many intrigues among the commons, had also endeavoured to support connexions with the non-conformists; and he now formed a scheme, in concert with the lord keeper, sir Orlando Bridgeman, and the chief justice, sir Matthew Hale, two worthy patriots, to put an end to those severities under which these religionists had so long laboured. It was proposed to reconcile the Presbyterians by a comprehension, and to grant a toleration to the Independents and other sectaries. Favour seems not, by this scheme, as by others embraced during the present reign, to have been intended the Catholics: yet were the zealous commons disgusted, and immediately voted an address for a proclamation against conventicles. Their request was complied with; but as the king still dropped some hints of his desire to reconcile his protestant subjects, the commons passed a very unusual vote, that no man should bring into the house any bill of that nature. The king in vain reiterated his solicitations for supply; represented the necessity of equipping a fleet; and offered, that the money which they might grant should be collected and issued for that purpose by commissioners appointed by the house. Instead of complying, the commons voted an inquiry into all the miscarriages during the late war; the slackening of sail after the duke's victory from false orders delivered by Brounker, the miscarriage at Bergen, the division of the fleet under prince Rupert and Albemarle, the disgrace at Chatham. Brounker was expelled the house, and ordered to be impeached. Commissioner Pet, who had neglected orders issued for the security of Chatham, met with the same fate. These impeachments were never prosecuted. The house at length, having been indulged in all their prejudices, were prevailed with to vote the king three hundred and ten thousand pounds, by an imposition on wine and other liquors; after which they were adjourned.

Public business, besides being retarded by the disgust of the commons against the tolerating maxims of the court, met with obstructions this session from a quarrel between the two houses. Skinner, a rich merchant in London, having suffered some injuries from the East-India company, laid the matter by petition before the house of lords, on the 11th of May, by whom he was relieved in costs and damages to the amount of five thousand pounds. The commons voted, that the lords, in taking cognizance of this affair, originally, without any appeal from inferior courts, had acted in a manner not agreeable to the laws of the land, and tending to deprive the subject of the right, ease, and benefit due to him by these laws; and that Skinner, in prosecuting the suit after this manner, had infringed the privileges of the commons: for which offence they ordered him to be taken into custody. Some conferences ensued between the houses; where the lords were tenacious of their right of judicature, and maintained, that the method in which they had exercised it was quite regular. The commons rose into a great ferment; and voted, that, "whoever should be aiding, or assisting in putting in execution the order or sentence of the house of lords, in the case of Skinner against the East-India company, should be deemed a betrayer of the rights and liberties of the commons of England, and an infringer of the privileges of the house of commons." They rightly judged, that it would not be easy, after this vote, to find any one who would venture to incur their indignation. The proceedings indeed of the lords seem in this case to have been unusual, and without precedent.*

The king's necessities obliged him again to assemble the parliament, which he did on the 9th of October, 1669; and the commons shewed some disposition to relieve him. The price, however, which he must pay for this indulgence, was his yielding to new laws against conventicles. His complaisance in this particular contributed more to gain the commons, than all the pompous pretences of supporting the triple alliance, by which he expected to make such advantage. The quarrel between the two houses was revived; and as the commons had voted only four hundred thousand pounds, with which the king was not satisfied, he thought proper, before they carried their vote into a law, to prorogue them on the 11th of December (m).

When the parliament met, after the prorogation, on the 14th of February, 1670, they entered anew upon the business of supply, and granted the king an additional duty, during eight years, of twelve pounds on each tun of Spanish wine imported, and eight on each tun of French. A law also passed empowering him to sell the fee-farm rents (n); the last remains of the demesnes, by which the ancient kings of England had been supported. By this expedient, he obtained some supply for his present necessities, but left the crown, if possible, still more dependent than before.

The act against conventicles passed, and received the royal assent. It bears the appearance of mitigating the former persecuting laws; but, if we may judge by the spirit, which had broken out almost every session during this parliament, it was not intended as any favour to the non-conformists. By this act a hearer in a conventicle (that is, in a dissenting assembly, where more than five were present, besides the family) was fined five shillings for the first offence, ten for the second; the preacher twenty pounds for the first offence, forty for the second. The person in whose house the conventicle met, was amerced a like sum with the preacher (o).

The affair of Skinner still remained a ground of quarrel between the two houses; but the king prevailed with the peers to accept of the expedient proposed by the commons, that a general razure should be made of all the transactions with regard to that disputed question.

Some attempts were made by the king to effect an union between England and Scotland; though they were too

(m) The only business finished this short session, was the receiving of the report of the committee appointed for examining the public accounts. On the first inspection of this report, there appears a great sum, no less than a million and a half, unaccounted for; and the natural inference is, that the king had much abused the trust reposed in him by parliament. But a more accurate inspection of particulars serves, in a great measure, to remove this imputation. The king indeed went so far as to tell the parliament from the throne, "That he had fully informed himself of that matter, and did affirm, that no part of those monies which they had given him had been diverted to other uses, but, on the contrary, besides all those supplies, a very great sum had been raised out of his standing revenue and credit, and a very great debt contracted; and all for the war." Though artificial pretences have often been employed by kings in their speeches to parliament, and by none more than Charles, it is somewhat difficult to suspect him of a direct lie and falsehood. He must have had some reasons, and perhaps not unplausible ones, for this affirmation, of which all his hearers, as they had the accounts lying before them, were at that time competent judges.

(n) Mr. Carte, in his Vindication of the Answer to the Byestander, p. 99, says, that the sale of the fee-farm rents would not yield above one hundred thousand pounds; and his reasons appear well founded.

(o) One clause is remarkable; that, if any dispute should arise with regard to the interpretation of any part of the act, the judges should always explain the doubt in the least sense favourable to conventicles, it being the intention of parliament entirely to suppress them. Such was the zeal of the commons, that they violated the plainest and most established maxims of civil policy, which require, that, in all criminal prosecutions, favour should always be given to the prisoner.

feeble

feeble to remove all the difficulties which obstructed that important undertaking. Commissioners were appointed to meet, in order to regulate the conditions; but the design, chiefly by the intrigues of Lauderdale, dropped soon after.

The king, about this time, began frequently to attend the debates of the house of peers. He said, that they amused him, and that he found them no less entertaining than a play. But deeper designs were suspected. As he seemed greatly to interest himself in the cause of lord Roos, who had obtained a divorce from his wife on the accusation of adultery, and applied to parliament for leave to marry again; people imagined, that Charles intended to make a precedent of the case, and that some other pretence would be found for getting rid of the queen. Many proposals to this purpose, it is said, were made him by Buckingham; but the king, how little scrupulous soever in some respects, was incapable of an action so harsh or barbarous; and he always rejected every scheme of this nature. A suspicion, however, of such intentions, it was observed, had, at this time, begotten a coldness between the king and the duke of York.

We now come to a period, when the king's counsels, which had hitherto been good, though negligent and fluctuating, became, during some time, remarkably bad, or even criminal; and breeding incurable jealousies in all men, were followed by such consequences as had almost terminated in the ruin both of prince and people. Happily, the same negligence still attended him; and, as it had lessened the influence of the good, it also diminished the effect of the bad measures which he embraced.

The king had long been fluctuating between his pride and his pleasures; the one urged him to extend his prerogative, the other to enjoy the good things which fortune threw in his way. He therefore would be likely to find the greatest satisfaction in those ministers who could flatter both his wishes at once. He was excited, by the active spirit of his brother, to rise above humble solicitations to his parliament; and was beset by some desperate counsellors, who importuned and encouraged him to assert his own independence. The whole secret was intrusted to five persons, Clifford, Ashley, Buckingham, Arlington, and Lauderdale. These men were known by the appellation of the CABAL, a word which the initial letters of their names happened to compose. Never was there a more dangerous ministry in England, nor one more noted for pernicious counsels (p).

The dark counsels of the Cabal, though from the first they gave anxiety to all men of reflection, were not thoroughly known but by the event. They advised the king to take steps against the parliament, and to exert his authority in an arbitrary way. Their suggestions happened fatally to agree with the inclinations and prejudices of the king; his desire of more extensive authority, his propensity to the Catholic religion, his avidity for money. He seems likewise, from the beginning of his reign, to have entertained great jealousy of his own subjects, and, on that account, a desire of fortifying himself by an intimate alliance with France. Even during the time when the triple alliance was most zealously cultivated, the king never seems to have been entirely cordial in those salutary measures; and Clifford, who had much of his confidence, said imprudently, "Notwithstanding all this joy, we must have a second war with Holland."

De Wit, at that time, came to Temple; and told him, that he paid him a visit as a friend, not as a minister. The occasion was, to acquaint him with a conversation which he had lately had with Puffendorf the Swedish agent, who had passed by the Hague in the way from Paris to his own country. This was relative to a war with Holland; and when Puffendorf seemed incredulous, Turenne showed him a letter from Colbert de Crossy, the French minister at London; in which, after mentioning the success of his negociations, and the favourable disposition of the chief ministers there, he added, "And I have at last made them sensible of the full extent of his majesty's bounty (q)."

The visit which the king received from his sister, the duchess of Orleans, about this time, was the foundation of still stronger suspicions. Louis, knowing the address and insinuation of that amiable princess, and the great influence which she had gained over her brother, had engaged her to employ all her good offices, in order to detach Charles from the triple league; and he now sent her to put the last hand to the plan of their conjunct operations. That he might the better cover this negociation, he pretended to visit his frontiers, particularly the great works which he had undertaken at Dunkirk; and he carried the queen and the whole court along with him. On the 16th of May, while he remained on the opposite shore, the duchess of Orleans went over to England; and Charles met her at Dover, where they passed ten days together in great mirth and festivity. By her artifices and caresses, she prevailed on Charles to relinquish the most settled maxims of honour and policy, and to finish his engagements with Louis for the destruction of Holland; as well as for the subsequent change of religion in England.

In order to fix Charles in the French interests, he resolved to bind him by the ties of pleasure; and he made him a present of a French mistress, by whose means he hoped, for the future, to govern him. The duchess of Orleans brought with her a young lady of the name of Queroüaille, whom the king carried to London, and soon after created duchess of Portsmouth. He was extremely attached to her during the remainder of his life; and she proved a great means of supporting his connexions with her native country.

But the satisfaction which Charles reaped from his new alliance, received a great check by the death of his sister, and still more by those melancholy circumstances which attended it. Her death was sudden, after a few days illness; and she was seized with the malady upon drinking a glass of succory water. Strong suspicions of poison arose in the court of France, and were spread all over Europe; and her husband was believed to be the author of the crime. Charles himself was convinced of his guilt; but upon receiving the attestation of physicians, who found no foundation for the rumour, he was, or pretended to be, satisfied.

Charles took advantage of this incident to send over Buckingham, under pretence of condoling with the duke of Orleans, but in reality to concert farther measures for the projected war. Never ambassador received greater caresses; and the journey of Buckingham augmented the suspicions in Holland, which every circumstance tended still farther to confirm. Louis made a sudden irruption into Lorraine; which he was soon able, without resistance, to make himself master of; and Charles turned a deaf ear to all remonstrances made him upon that occasion. But (p) Lord Ashley, soon after known by the name of earl of Shaftesbury, was one of the most remarkable characters of the age, and the chief spring of all the succeeding movements. During his early youth, he had engaged in the late king's party; but being disgusted with some measures of prince Maurice, he soon deserted to the parliament. He insinuated himself into the confidence of Cromwell; and had great influence with the Presbyterians. He afterwards had a considerable hand in promoting the Restoration. In all his changes, he maintained the character of never betraying those friends whom he deserted; and his great capacity and singular talents soon gained him the confidence of the party he espoused, and enabled him to take the lead among them. Well acquainted with the blind attachment of faction, he surmounted all sense of shame; and relying on the subtilty of his contrivances, he was not startled with enterprizes the most hazardous and most criminal. His eminent abilities, by reason of his insatiable desires, were equally dangerous to himself, to the prince, and to the people.

The duke of Buckingham possessed all the advantages, which a graceful person, a high rank, a splendid fortune, and a lively wit could bestow; but by his wild conduct, unrestrained either by prudence or principle, he found means to render himself in the end odious and even insignificant. The least interest could make him abandon his honour; the smallest pleasure could seduce him from his interest; the most frivolous caprice was sufficient to counterbalance his pleasure. By riot and debauchery, he ruined his health; and he remained at last as incapable of doing hurt, as he had ever been little desirous of doing good, to mankind.

The earl, soon after created duke of Lauderdale, was not defective in natural, and still less in acquired, talents; but neither was his address graceful, nor his understanding just. He was ambitious, obstinate, insolent, and sullen.

The talents of parliamentary eloquence and intrigue had raised sir Thomas Clifford; and his daring impetuous spirit gave him weight in the king's councils. Of the whole cabal, Arlington was the least dangerous, either by his vices or his talents. His judgement was sound, though his capacity was but moderate; and his intentions were good, though he wanted courage and integrity to persevere in them. Clifford and he were secretly Catholics: Shaftesbury, though addicted to astrology, was reckoned a Deist: Buckingham had too little reflection to embrace any steady principles: Lauderdale had long been a bigoted and furious Presbyterian; and the opinions of that sect still kept possession of his mind, how little soever they appeared in his conduct.

Such were the men to whom Charles gave up the conduct of his affairs; and who plunged the remaining part of his reign in difficulties which produced the most dangerous symptoms.

(q) From this incident it appears, that the infamous practice of selling themselves to foreign princes, a practice which, notwithstanding the malignity of the vulgar, is certainly rare among men in high office, had not been scrupled by Charles's ministers, who even obtained their master's consent to this dishonourable species of corruption.

what tended chiefly to open the eyes of De Wit and the States, with regard to the measures of England, was the sudden recall of sir William Temple. De Wit made the Dutch resident inform the English court, that he should consider the recall of Temple as an express declaration of a change of measures in England; and should even know what interpretation to put upon any delay of his return, which was promised by Charles.

While these measures were in agitation, the parliament met, according to adjournment, on the 24th of October, 1670. The king made a short speech, and left the business to be enlarged upon by the keeper. That minister insisted on the king's great want of supply; the mighty increase of the naval power of France, now triple to what it was before the last war with Holland; the decay of the English navy; the necessity of fitting out next year a fleet of fifty sail; the obligations which the king lay under by several treaties to exert himself for the common good of Christendom. Among other treaties, he mentioned the triple alliance, and the defensive league with the States. The artifice succeeded. The house of commons voted him considerable supplies. A land tax for a year was imposed of a shilling in the pound; two shillings in the pound on two-thirds of the salaries of offices; fifteen shillings on every hundred pounds of bankers' money and stock; an additional excise upon beer for six years, and certain impositions upon law proceedings for nine years (r).

The commons passed another bill, for laying a duty on tobacco, Scotch salt, glasses, and some other commodities. Against this bill the merchants of London petitioned the house of lords. The lords entered into their reasons, and began to make amendments on the bill sent up by the commons. This attempt was highly resented by the lower house, as an encroachment on the right, which they pretended to possess alone, of granting money to the crown. Many remonstrances passed between the two houses; and in consequence of their altercations the king prorogued the parliament on the 22nd of April, 1671; and thereby lost the money which was intended him. This is the last time that the peers have revived any pretensions of that nature. Ever since, the privilege of the commons, in all other places, except in the house of peers, has passed for uncontroverted.

There was a private affair, which, during this session, disgusted the house of commons, and required some pains to accommodate it. The usual method of those who opposed the court in the money bills was, if they failed in the main vote, as to the extent of the supply, to levy the money upon such funds as they expected would be unacceptable, or would prove deficient. It was proposed to lay an imposition upon playhouses: the courtiers objected, that the players were the king's servants, and a part of his pleasure. Sir John Coventry, a gentleman of the country party, asked, "whether the king's pleasure lay among the male or the female players?" This stroke of satire was aimed at Charles, who, besides his mistresses of higher quality, entertained at that time two actresses, Davis and Nell Gwin. The king received not the raillery with the good humour which might have been expected; Sands, Obrian, and some other officers of the guards, were ordered to way-lay him, and set a mark upon him. He defended himself with bravery, and after wounding several of the assailants, was disarmed with some difficulty. They cut his nose to the bone, in order, as they said, to teach him what respect he owed to the king. The commons were inflamed by this indignity offered to one of their members, on account of words spoken in the house. They passed a law, which made it capital to maim any person; and they enacted, that those criminals, who had assaulted Coventry, should be incapable of receiving a pardon from the king.

There was another private affair transacted about this time, by which the king was as much exposed to the imputation of a capricious lenity, as he was here blamed for an act of the most shameful severity. Blood, a disbanded officer of the protector's, had been engaged in the conspiracy for raising an insurrection in Ireland; and on account of this crime had been attainted, and some of his accomplices capitally punished. The daring villain meditated revenge upon Ormond, the lord lieutenant. Having by artifice drawn off the duke's footmen, he attacked his coach in the night-time, as it drove along St. James's street in London; and made himself master of his person. He might here have finished the crime, had he not meditated refinements in his vengeance: he was resolved to hang the duke at Tyburn; and for that purpose bound him, and mounted him on horseback behind one of his companions. They were advanced a good way into the fields; when the duke, making efforts for his liberty, threw himself to the ground, and brought down with him the assassin to whom he was fastened. They were struggling together in the mire; when Ormond's servants, whom the alarm had reached, came and saved him. Blood and his companions, firing their pistols in a hurry at the duke, rode off, and saved themselves by means of the darkness (s).

A little after, Blood formed a design of carrying off the crown and regalia from the Tower; a design to which he was prompted, as well by the boldness of the enterprize, as by the views of profit. He was near succeeding. He had bound and wounded Edwards, the keeper of the jewel-office, and had gotten out of the Tower with his prey; but was overtaken and seized, with some of his associates. One of them was known to have been concerned in the attempt upon Ormond, and Blood was immediately concluded to be the ring-leader. When questioned, he frankly avowed the enterprize, but refused to tell his accomplices. "The fear of death," he said, "should never engage him, either to deny a guilt, or betray a friend." All these extraordinary circumstances made him the general subject of conversation; and the king was moved, by an idle curiosity, to see and speak with a person so noted for his courage and his crimes. Blood might now esteem himself secure of pardon; and he wanted not address to improve the opportunity. He told Charles, that he had been engaged, with others, in a design to kill him with a carabine above Battersea, where his majesty often went to bathe: that the cause of this resolution was the severity exercised over the consciences of the godly, in restraining the liberty of their religious assemblies: that when he had taken his stand among the reeds, full of these bloody resolutions, he found his heart checked with an awe of majesty; and he not only relented himself, but diverted his associates from their purpose: that he had long ago brought himself to an entire indifference about life, which he now gave for lost; yet could he not forbear warning the king of the danger which might attend his execution: that his associates had bound themselves by the strictest oaths to revenge the death of any of the confederacy: and that no precaution or power could secure any one from the effects of their desperate resolutions.

Whether these considerations excited fear or admiration in the king, they confirmed his resolution of granting a pardon to Blood; but he thought it a point of decency first to obtain the duke of Ormond's consent. Arlington came to Ormond in the king's name, and desired that he would not prosecute Blood, for reasons which he was commanded to give him. The duke replied, that his majesty's commands were the only reason that could be given; and being sufficient, he might therefore spare the rest. Charles carried his kindness to Blood still farther: he granted him an estate of five hundred pounds a-year in Ireland; he encouraged his attendance about his person; he showed him great countenance, and many applied to him for promoting their pretensions at court. And while old Edwards, who had bravely ventured his life, and had been wounded, in defending the crown and regalia, was forgotten and neglected, this man, who deserved only to be detested as a monster, became a favourite of the king.

(r) This year, on the 3d of January, died George Monk, duke of Albemarle, at Newhall in Essex, after a languishing illness, and in the sixty-third year of his age. He left a great estate of fifteen thousand pounds a-year in land, and sixty thousand pounds in money, acquired by the bounty of the king, and increased by his own frugality in his latter years. Bishop Burnet reproaches him with avarice: but as he appears not to have been in the least tainted with rapacity, his frugal conduct may more candidly be imputed to the habits acquired in early life, while he was possessed of a very narrow fortune.

(s) Buckingham was at first, with some appearances of reason, suspected to be the author of this attempt. His profligate character, and his enmity against Ormond, exposed him to that imputation. Ossory soon after came to court; and seeing Buckingham stand by the king, his colour rose, and he could not forbear expressing himself to this purpose: "My lord, I know well that you are at the bottom of this late attempt upon my father: but I give you warning; if by any means he come to a violent end, I shall not be at a loss to know the author: I shall consider you as the assassin: I shall treat you as such; and wherever I meet you, I shall pistol you, though you stood behind the king's chair; and I tell it you in his majesty's presence, that you may be sure I shall not fail of performance." Carte's Life of Ormond, vol. ii. p. 225. If there was here any indecorum, it was easily excused in a generous youth, when his father's life was exposed to danger.

Another

Another incident happened this year, which infused a general displeasure, and still greater apprehensions, into the minds of all men. The duchess of York died; and in her last sickness, she made open profession of the Romish religion, and finished her life in that communion. This put an end to that thin disguise which the duke had hitherto worn; and he now openly declared his conversion to the church of Rome. Unaccountable terrors of popery, ever since the accession of the house of Stuart, had prevailed throughout the nation; but the duke of York's imprudent bigotry convinced the whole nation that their surmises were well grounded. Popery was now become a real ground of terror; being openly and zealously embraced by the heir to the crown, a prince of industry and enterprize; while the king himself was well known to have embraced the same communion when he resided on the continent.

A ground of quarrel was now sought by means of a yatch, dispatched for lady Temple. The captain sailed through the Dutch fleet, which lay on their own coasts; and he had orders to make them strike, to fire on them, and to persevere till they should return his fire. The Dutch admiral, Van Ghent, surprized at this bravado, came on board the yatch, and expressed his willingness to pay respect to the British flag, according to former practice; but that a fleet, on their own coasts, should strike to a single vessel, and that not a ship of war, was, he said, such an innovation, that he durst not, without express orders, agree to it. The captain, thinking it dangerous, as well as absurd, to renew firing in the midst of the Dutch fleet, continued his course; and, for that neglect of orders, was committed to the Tower.

This incident, however, furnished Downing with a new article to increase those vain pretences, on which it was purposed to ground the intended rupture. The English court delayed several months before they complained; but the Dutch tried every expedient to prevent hostilities. At length, after various negociations, and delays on the part of the English, the Dutch ambassador demanded an audience, when an hour was appointed for that purpose; but when he attended, the English refused to enter upon business, and told him, (so grossly did the English insult the Dutch,) that the season for negociating was now past (t).

Long and frequent prorogations were made of the parliament; lest the houses should declare themselves with vigour against counsels, so opposite to the interests of the public. Every step, which the king took in this affair, became a proof, to all men of penetration, that the present war was intended against the religion and liberties of his own subjects, even more than against the Dutch themselves. It was well known, that ever since his restoration he had intended to favour the catholics, but had hitherto kept from the attempt through fear of being driven from the throne. He now acted in every thing, as if he were an absolute monarch, and was never more to lie under the control of national assemblies.

The long prorogations of parliament, if they freed the king from the importunate remonstrances of that assembly, were attended with this inconvenience, that no money could be procured to carry on the warlike preparations against Holland. Under pretence of maintaining the triple league, which he had firmly resolved to break, Charles had obtained a large supply from the commons; but this money was soon exhausted by debts and expences; and it seemed as yet premature to venture on levying money, without consent of parliament; since the power of taxing themselves was the privilege, of which the English were, with reason, particularly jealous. Some other resource must be devised. The king had declared, that the staff of treasurer was ready for any one that could find an expedient for supplying the present necessities. Shaftesbury dropped a hint to Clifford, which the latter immediately seized, and carried to the king, who granted him the promised reward, together with a peerage. This expedient was the shutting up of the Exchequer, which took place on the 2nd of January, 1672, and the retaining of all the payments which should be made into it (u).

At this period Charles resolved to make use of his supreme power in ecclesiastical matters. By virtue of this authority, he issued a proclamation, on the 15th of March, suspending the penal laws enacted against all non-conformists or recusants whatsoever; and granting to the Protestant dissenters the public exercise of their religion, to the Catholics the exercise of it, in private houses. By this measure Charles expected to gain favour with the dissenters and the Catholics; but though it softened them in some degree, they still looked upon him as a tyrant.

About the same time, the act of navigation was suspended by royal will and pleasure: a measure, which, though a stretch of prerogative, seemed useful to commerce, while all the seamen were employed on board the royal navy. A like suspension had been granted, during the first Dutch war, and was not much remarked; because men had, at that time, entertained less jealousy of the crown. A proclamation was also issued, containing rigorous clauses in favour of pressing: another full of menaces against those who presumed to speak undutifully of his majesty's measures, and even against those who heard such discourse, unless they informed in due time against the offenders: another against importing or vending any sort of painted earthen ware, "except those of China, upon pain of being grievously fined, and suffering the utmost punishment, which might be lawfully inflicted upon contemners of his majesty's royal authority." An army had been levied; and it was found, that discipline could not be enforced without the exercise of martial law, which was therefore established by order of council, though contrary to the Petition of Right (v).

It may be worth remarking, that the lord-keeper refused to affix the great seal to the declaration for suspending the penal laws; and was for that reason, though under other pretences, removed from his office. Shaftesbury was made chancellor in his place; and thus another member of the Cabal received the reward of his counsels.

Foreign transactions kept pace with these domestic occurrences. An attempt, before the declaration of war, was made on the Dutch Smyrna fleet by sir Robert Holmes. This fleet consisted of seventy sail, valued at a million and a half sterling; and the hopes of seizing so rich a prey had been a great motive for engaging Charles in the present war, and he had considered that capture as a principal resource for supporting his military enterprizes. Holmes, with nine frigates and three yachts, had orders to go on this expedition; and he passed Sprague in the channel, who was returning with a squadron from a cruize in the Mediterranean. Sprague informed him of the near approach of the Hollanders; and had not Holmes, from a desire of engrossing the honour and profit of the enterprize, kept the secret of his orders, the conjunction of these squadrons had rendered the success infallible. When Holmes approached the Dutch, he put on an amicable appearance, and invited the admiral Van Ness, who commanded the convoy, to come on board his vessel, on the 13th of March: one of his captains gave a like insidious invitation to the rear-admiral. But these officers were on their guard. They had received an intimation of the hostile intentions of the English, and had already put all the ships of war and merchant-men in an excellent posture of defence. Three times were they assailed by the English; and as often did they defend themselves. In the third attack one of the Dutch ships of war was taken; and three or four of their most inconsiderable merchant-men fell into the enemies' hands. The rest, fighting with (t) England's Appeal, p. 22. This year, on the 12th of November, died, in his retreat, and in the sixtieth year of his age, Thomas lord Fairfax, who performed many great actions, without being a memorable personage, and allowed himself to be carried into many criminal enterprizes, with the best and most upright intentions. His daughter and heir was married to George Villiers, duke of Buckingham.

(u) It had been usual for the bankers to carry their money to the Exchequer, and to advance it upon security of the funds, by which they were afterwards reimbursed, when the money was levied on the public. The bankers, by this traffic, got eight, sometimes ten, per cent. for sums which either had been consigned to them without interest, or which they had borrowed at six per cent.: profits, which they dearly paid for by this egregious breach of public faith. The measure was so suddenly taken, that none had warning of the danger. A general confusion prevailed in the city, followed by the ruin of many. The bankers stopped payment; the merchants could answer no bills; distrust took place every where, with a stagnation of commerce, by which the public was universally affected: and men, full of dismal apprehensions, asked each other, what must be the scope of those mysterious counsels, whence the parliament and all men of honour were excluded, and which commenced by the forfeiture of public credit, and an open violation of the most solemn engagements, both foreign and domestic.

(v) All these acts of power, how little important soever in themselves, savoured strongly of arbitrary government, and were no-wise suitable to that legal administration, which the parliament, after such violent convulsions and civil wars, had hoped to have established in the kingdom.

skill

skill and courage, continued their course; and got safe into their own harbours. This attempt is denominated perfidious and piratical by the Dutch writers, and even by many of the English. The English ministry endeavoured to apologize for the nefarious action, by pretending that it was a casual rencounter, arising from the obstinacy of the Dutch, in refusing the honours of the flag: but the contrary was so well known, that even Holmes himself had not the assurance to persist in this assertion.

Till this incident the States never believed the English in earnest. Charles, however, was too far advanced to retreat; and he issued a declaration of war against the Dutch, on the 17th of March. Surely reasons more false and frivolous never were employed to justify a flagrant violation of treaty, than were adopted by the English on this occasion. The conclusion of this manifesto, where the king still professed his resolution of adhering to the triple alliance, was of the same complexion with the rest of it. Louis's declaration of war contained more dignity, if undisguised violence and injustice could merit that appellation. De Wit, sensible of the dangerous situation, of his country, and alarmed by the reports which came from all quarters, exerted himself to supply those defects, to which it was not easy of a sudden to provide a suitable remedy. But every proposal he could make, was opposed by the Orange party, now become formidable. The long administration of this statesman had begotten envy: but while the factions in Holland struggled for superiority, every scheme for defence was opposed, every project retarded. What was determined with difficulty, was executed without vigour. Levies were made, and the army completed to seventy thousand men: the prince was appointed both general and admiral of the commonwealth, and the whole military power was put into his hands. But the partizans of the prince were still unsatisfied, as long as the perpetual edict, so it was called, remained in force; by which he was excluded from the stadtholdership, and from all share in the civil administration.

It had always been the maxim of de Wit's party to cultivate naval affairs with care, and to give the fleet a preference above the army, which they represented as the object of partiality in the princes of Orange. The two wars, which had of late been waged with England, had exercised the valour, and improved the skill, of the seamen. And de Ruyter, the great sea commander, was closely connected with the Louvestein party; and every one was disposed to obey him. The equipment of the fleet was therefore hastened by de Wit; in hopes that, by striking at first a successful blow, he might inspire courage into the dismayed States, and support his own declining authority. De Ruyter, soon after put to sea with a formidable fleet, consisting of ninety-one ships of war and forty-four fire-ships. Cornelius de Wit was on board as deputy from the States. They sailed in quest of the English, who were under the command of the duke of York, and who had already joined the French under mareschal d'Etrées. The combined fleets lay at Solebay in a negligent posture; and Sandwich, being an experienced officer, had given the duke warning of the danger; but received such an answer as intimated, that there was more of caution than of courage in his apprehensions. Upon the appearance of the enemy, every one ran to his post with precipitation, and many ships were obliged to cut their cables, in order to be in readiness. Sandwich commanded the van; and though determined to conquer or to perish, he tempered his courage with prudence, and the whole fleet was visibly indebted to him for its safety. He hastened out of the bay, and by this wise measure he gave time to the duke of York, who commanded the main body, and to mareschal d'Etrées, admiral of the rear, to disengage themselves. He rushed into battle with the Hollanders; and by presenting himself to every danger, had drawn upon him the bravest of the enemy. He killed Van Ghent, a Dutch admiral, and beat off his ship: he sunk another ship, which ventured to board him: he sunk three fire-ships, which endeavoured to grapple with him: and though his vessel was torn in pieces with shot, and of a thousand men she contained, near six hundred were laid dead upon the deck, he continued still to thunder with all his artillery in the midst of the enemy. But another fire-ship, more fortunate than the preceding, having laid hold of his vessel, her destruction was now inevitable. Warned by sir Edward Haddock, his captain, he refused to make his escape, and embraced death as a shelter from that ignominy, which a rash expression of the duke's, he thought, had thrown upon him. This battle was fought on the 28th of May, 1672.

During this fierce engagement with Sandwich, de Ruyter remained not inactive. He attacked the duke of York, and fought with such fury for above two hours, that of two and thirty actions, in which that admiral had been engaged, he declared this combat to be the most obstinately disputed. The duke's ship was so shattered, that he was obliged to leave her, and remove his flag to another. His squadron was overpowered with numbers; till sir Joseph Jordan, who had succeeded to Sandwich's command, came to his assistance; and the fight, being more equally balanced, was continued till night, when the Dutch retired, and were not followed by the English. The loss sustained by the fleets of the two maritime powers was nearly equal, if it did not rather fall more heavy on the English (w).

It was indeed honourable for the Dutch to have fought with advantage the combined fleets of two such powerful nations; but nothing less than a complete victory could serve the purpose of de Wit, or save his country from those calamities, which threatened to overwhelm her. He had expected that the French would make their attack on the side of Maestricht, which was well fortified, and provided with a good garrison; but Louis, taking advantage of his alliance with Cologne, resolved to invade the enemy on that frontier, which he knew to be more feeble and defenceless. Louis passed the Meuse at Viset; and laying siege to Orsoi, a town of the elector of Brandenburgh, but garrisoned by Dutch, he carried it in three days. He divided his army, and invested at once Burik, Wesel, Emerik, and Rhinberg, four places regularly fortified, and not unprovided with troops: in a few days all these places were surrendered. A general astonishment seized the Hollanders, from the combination of such powerful princes against the republic; and no where was resistance made, suitable to the ancient glory or present greatness of the state.

Louis advanced to the banks of the Rhine, which he prepared to pass, on the 2nd of June. To all the other calamities of the Dutch was added the extreme drought of the season, by which the greatest rivers were much diminished, and in some places rendered fordable. The French cavalry, animated by the presence of their prince, full of impetuous courage, but ranged in exact order, flung themselves into the river: the infantry passed in boats: a few regiments of Dutch appeared on the other side, who were unable to make resistance. And thus was executed without danger, but not without glory, the passage of the Rhine; so much celebrated, at that time, by the flattery of the French courtiers, and transmitted to posterity by the more durable flattery of their poetical writers. Each success added courage to the conquerors, and struck the vanquished with dismay. It was expected, that the fort of Skink, famous for the sieges which it had formerly sustained, would make some resistance; but it yielded to Turenne in a few days. The same general made himself master of Arnheim, Knotzembourg, and Nimeguen, as soon as he appeared before them. Doesbourg at the same time opened its gates to Louis: soon after, Hardewic, Amersfort, Campen, Rhenen, Viane, Elberg, Zwol, Cuilemberg, Wageninguen, Lochem, Woerden, fell into the enemies' hands. Groll and Deventer surrendered to the mareschal Luxembourg, who commanded the troops of Munster. And every hour brought to the States news of the rapid progress of the French, and of the cowardice of their own garrisons.

The prince of Orange, with his small and discouraged army, retired into the province of Holland; where he expected, from the natural strength of the country, to be able to make some resistance. The town and province of Utrecht sent deputies, and surrendered themselves to Louis. Naerden, a place within three leagues of Amsterdam, was seized by the marquis of Rochfort, and had he pushed on to Muyden, he had easily gotten possession of it. Fourteen stragglers of his army having appeared before the gates of that town, the magistrates sent them the keys; but a servant maid, who was alone in the castle, (w) The French suffered but little, because they had scarcely been engaged in the action; and as this backwardness is not their national character, it was concluded that they had received secret orders to spare their ships, while the Dutch and English should weaken each other by their mutual animosity. Almost all the other actions during the present war tended to confirm this suspicion.

having

having raised the drawbridge, kept them from taking possession of that fortress. The magistrates afterwards, finding the party so weak, made them intoxicated, and took the keys from them (x).

On the 25th of June, Louis with a splendid court made a solemn entry into Utrecht. Three provinces were already in his hands, Guelderland, Overyssel, and Utrecht: Groningen was threatened; Friezeland was exposed: the only difficulty lay in Holland and Zealand; and the monarch deliberated concerning the proper measures for reducing them. Condé and Turenne exhorted him to dismantle the towns he had taken, except a few; and fortifying his main army by the garrisons, put himself in a condition of pushing his conquests. Louvois, however, advised a contrary measure, and his counsel was followed; though it was found, soon after, to have been impolitic.

The people, throughout the republic, instead of collecting a noble indignation against the haughty conqueror, discharged their rage upon their own unhappy minister, on whose prudence and integrity every one formerly bestowed the merited applause. The bad condition of the armies was laid to his charge: the ill choice of governors was ascribed to his partiality. The prince of Orange, notwithstanding his youth and inexperience, was looked on as the only saviour of the state; and men were driven by their fears into his party, to which they had been led by inclination.

Amsterdam alone seemed to retain some courage; and by forming a regular plan of defence, endeavoured to infuse spirit into the other cities. The magistrates obliged the burgesses to keep a strict watch: the populace, whom want of employment might engage to mutiny, were maintained by regular pay, and armed for the general defence. Some ships, which lay useless in the harbour, were refitted, and stationed to guard the city; and the sluices being opened, the neighbouring country was laid under water. All the provinces followed the example, and scrupled not, in this extremity, to restore to the sea those fertile fields, which with great art and expence had been gained from its incursions.

The states were assembled to consider whether any means were left to save the remains of their lately flourishing, and now distressed commonwealth. Though they were surrounded with waters, which barred all access to the enemy, the nobles voted, that, provided their religion, liberty, and sovereignty, could be saved, every thing else should be sacrificed to the conqueror. Eleven towns concurred in the same sentiments: Amsterdam singly declared against all treaty with their enemies; but notwithstanding that opposition, ambassadors were dispatched to implore the pity of the two combined monarchs. It was resolved to sacrifice to Louis, Maestricht, and all the frontier towns which lay without the boundaries of the seven provinces; and to pay him a large sum for the charges of the war.

The French king deliberated with his ministers Louvois and Pomponne, concerning the measures which he should embrace on the present occasion; and fortunately for Europe, he still preferred the violent counsels of the former. The terms he offered were extremely exorbitant; and he allowed them but ten days for the acceptance of his proposals. The ambassadors, sent to London, met with still worse reception: no minister was allowed to treat with them; and they were retained in a kind of confinement. But, notwithstanding this rigorous conduct of the court, the presence of the Dutch ambassadors excited the sentiments of compassion, and even indignation, among the people in general, especially among those who could foresee the aim and result of those dangerous counsels; and even Charles himself was touched with anxiety, when he found every thing yield to the French arms, while such vigorous resistance was made to his own. He soon dismissed the Dutch ambassadors, lest they should cabal among his subjects, who bore them great favour; but he sent over Buckingham and Arlington, and soon after lord Halifax, to negociate with the French king in the present prosperous situation of affairs.

These ministers passed through Holland; and as they were supposed to bring peace to the distressed republic, they were every where received with the loudest acclamations. "God bless the king of England! God bless the prince of Orange! Confusion to the States!" This was every where the cry of the populace. The ambassadors had several conferences with the States and the prince of Orange; but made no reasonable advances towards an accommodation. They went to Utrecht, where they renewed the league with Louis, and agreed, that neither of the kings should make peace with Holland but by common consent. They next gave in their pretensions, which were in the highest degree humiliating and arbitrary. The terms indeed proposed by Louis bereaved the republic of all security against any invasion by land from France: those demanded by Charles exposed them equally to an invasion by sea from England: and when both were united, they appeared absolutely intolerable, and reduced the Hollanders, who saw no means of defence, to the utmost despair. What extremely augmented their distress, were the violent factions with which they continued to be agitated. De Wit became the object of horror to the Dutch populace. Their rage at last broke all bounds, and bore every thing before it. They rose in an insurrection at Dort, on the 30th of June, and by force constrained their burgo-masters to sign the repeal of the perpetual edict, so much demanded. This proved a signal of a general revolt throughout all the provinces.

At Amsterdam, the Hague, Middlebourg, Rotterdam, the people flew to arms, and, trampling under foot the authority of their magistrates, obliged them to submit to the prince of Orange. They expelled from their office such as displeased them: they required the prince to appoint others in their place; and agreeably to the proceeding of the populace in all ages, provided they might wreak their vengeance on their superiors, they expressed great indifference for the protection of their civil liberties.

The superior talents and virtues of de Wit made him, on this occasion, the chief object of envy, and exposed him to the rage of popular prejudice. Four assassins, had assaulted him in the streets, and after giving him many wounds, had left him for dead. One of them was punished: the others were never questioned for the crime. His brother, Cornelius, who had behaved with prudence and courage on board the fleet, was obliged by sickness to come ashore; and he was now confined to his house at Dort. Some assassins broke in upon him; and it was with the utmost difficulty that his family and servants could repel their violence. At Amsterdam, the house of the brave de Ruyter, the sole resource of the distressed commonwealth, was surrounded by the populace; and his wife and children were for some time exposed to the greatest danger.

One Tichelaer, a barber, a man noted for infamy, accused Cornelius de Wit of endeavouring by bribes to engage him in the design of poisoning the prince of Orange. The accusation was greedily received by the credulous multitude; and Cornelius was cited before a court of judicature. The judges, either blinded by prejudice, or not daring to oppose the popular torrent, condemned him to suffer the question. This man, who had bravely served his country in war, and who had been invested with the highest dignities, was delivered into the hands of the executioner, and torn in pieces by the most inhuman torments (y). The judges, however, condemned him to lose his offices, and to be banished the commonwealth. The pensionary, who had not been terrified from performing the part of a kind brother and faithful friend during this prosecution, resolved not to desert him on account of the unmerited infamy which was endeavoured to be thrown upon him. He came to his brother's prison, determined to accompany him to the place of his exile. The signal was given to the populace. They rose in arms: they broke open the doors of the prison; they pulled out the two brothers; and a thousand hands vied who should first be imbrued in their blood. Even their death did not satiate the brutal rage of the multitude. They exercised on the dead bodies of those virtuous citizens, indignities too shocking to be recited; and till tired with their own fury, they permitted not the friends of the deceased to approach, or to bestow on them the honours of a funeral, silent and unattended.

The massacre of the de Wits put an end for the time to the remains of their party; and all men, from fear, inclination, or prudence, concurred in expressing the most implicit obedience to the prince of Orange. He bent all his efforts against the public enemy. Those intolerable conditions demanded by their insolent enemies, he exhorted the States to reject with scorn; and by his advice they put an end to negociations, which served only to break the courage of their fellow citizens, and delay the assistance of their allies. He exhorted them to remember the generous valour of their ancestors, who, yet in the infancy of the state, preferred liberty to every human consideration; and rousing their spirits to an obstinate defence, repelled all the power, riches, and military discipline of Spain. And he professed himself willing to tread in the steps of his illustrious predecessors, and hoped, that, as they had honoured him with the same affection which their ancestors paid to the former princes of Orange, they would second his efforts with the same constancy and fortitude. Immediately those who lately entertained thoughts of yielding their necks to subjection, were determined to resist the haughty victor, and to defend those last remains of their native soil, of which neither the irruptions of Louis, nor the inundation of waters, had as yet bereaved them. Should even the ground fail them on which they might combat, they were still resolved not to yield; but, flying to their settlements in the Indies, erect a new empire in those remote regions, and preserve alive, even in the climates of slavery, that liberty of which Europe was become unworthy.

Louis and Charles, finding at last some appearance of opposition, bent all their efforts to seduce the prince of Orange; but he rejected their proposals with scorn, and treated those who offered them with contempt. When Buckingham urged the inevitable destruction which hung over the United Provinces, and asked him, whether he did not see that the commonwealth was ruined? "There is one certain means," replied the prince, "by which I can be sure never to see my country's ruin; I will die in the last ditch." Louis, now finding that his enemies gathered courage behind their inundations, and that no farther success was likely for the present to attend his arms, retired to Versailles.

The emperor of Germany began to put himself in motion; Brandenburgh showed a disposition to support the States; Spain had sent some forces to their assistance; and by the present efforts of the prince of Orange, and the prospect of relief from their allies, a different face of affairs began to appear. Groninghen was the first place that stopped the progress of the enemy: the bishop of Munster was repulsed from before that town, and obliged to raise the siege with loss and dishonour. Naerden was attempted by the prince of Orange; but mareschal Luxembourg, breaking in upon his entrenchments with a sudden irruption, obliged him to abandon the enterprize.

There was no ally on whom the Dutch more relied for assistance than the parliament of England, which the king's necessities at last obliged him to assemble on the 4th of February, 1673. The eyes of all men, both abroad and at home, were fixed on this session, which met after prorogations continued for nearly two years. It was evident how much the king dreaded the assembling of his parliament; and the discontents universally excited by the bold measures entered into, both in foreign and domestic administration, had given just foundation for his apprehensions. The king, however, in his speech, addressed them with all the appearance of cordiality and confidence. He said, that he would have assembled them sooner, had he not been desirous to allow them leisure for attending their private affairs, as well as to give his people respite from taxes and impositions: that, since their last meeting, he had been forced into a war, not only just but necessary; necessary both for the honour and interest of the nation: that in order to have peace at home, while he had war abroad, he had issued his declaration of indulgence to dissenters, and had found many good effects to result from that measure: that he heard of some exceptions which had been taken to this exercise of power; but he would tell them plainly, that he was resolved to stick to his declaration; and would be much offended at any contradiction: and that though a rumour had been spread, as if the new levied army had been intended to control law and property, he regarded that jealousy as so frivolous, that he was resolved to augment his forces next spring, and did not doubt but they would consider the necessity of them in their supplies. The rest of the business he left to the chancellor; who enlarged on the same topics, and added many extraordinary positions of his own. He told them, that the Hollanders were the common enemies of all monarchies, especially that of England; and that, both by interest and inclination, the parliament had wisely judged it necessary to extirpate them, and had laid it down as an eternal maxim, that delenda est Carthago, this hostile government by all means is to be subverted: and that though the Dutch pretended to have assurances that the parliament would furnish no supplies to the king, he was confident that this hope, in which they extremely trusted, would soon fail them.

Before the commons entered upon business, there lay before them an affair, which discovered beyond a possibility of doubt, the arbitrary projects of the king; and the measures taken upon it proved that the house was not at present in a disposition to submit to them. It had been the constant practice for the house, in case of any vacancy, to issue out writs for new elections. This indeed was one of the first steps which the commons had taken in establishing and guarding their privileges; and nothing could be more requisite than this precaution, in order to prevent the clandestine issuing of writs, and to ensure a fair and free election. Several members had taken their seats upon irregular writs issued by the chancellor; but the house was no sooner assembled, and the speaker placed in the chair, than a motion was made against them; and the members themselves, thus called to parliament, had the modesty to withdraw. Their election was declared null; and new writs, in the usual form, were issued by the speaker.

The next step taken by the commons was to supply his majesty's extraordinary occasions, (for that was the expression employed); for which purpose they granted eighteen months assessment, at the rate of seventy thousand pounds a month, amounting in the whole to one million two hundred and sixty thousand pounds. The king's declaration of indulgence was next taken into consideration; and a remonstrance was immediately framed against that exercise of prerogative. The king defended his measure. The commons persisted in their opposition to it; and the king (z), that he might yield with the better grace, asked the opinion of the house of peers, who advised him to comply with the commons. Accordingly the king sent for the declaration, and with his own hands broke the seals. The commons expressed the utmost satisfaction with this measure, and the most entire duty to his majesty. Charles assured them that he would willingly pass any law offered him, which might tend to give them satisfaction in all their just grievances.

The earl of Shaftesbury, when he found the king recede at once from so capital a point, concluded that all schemes for enlarging royal authority were vanished, and that Charles was incapable of pursuing such difficult and hazardous measures. The parliament, he foresaw, might push their inquiries into those counsels, which were so generally odious; and the king might abandon his ministers to their vengeance. Like an habitual traitor, he now entered into all the measures of the country party; and discovered to them the arbitrary designs of the court, in which himself had borne so deep a share. He was received with open arms by that party, who stood in need of so able a leader; and no questions were asked with regard to his late apostacy.

Having abridged the king's stretches of power in some points, they went still farther, and resolved to make the conformity of principles still more general. A law was passed for imposing a test (a) on all who should enjoy any public office. Besides taking the oaths of allegiance and supremacy, and receiving the sacrament in the established church once a year; they were obliged to abjure all belief (z) It is evident that Charles was now come to that delicate crisis which he ought at first to have foreseen, when he embraced those desperate counsels; and his resolutions, in such an event, ought long ago to have been entirely fixed and determined. Besides his usual guards, he had an army encamped at Blackheath, under the command of mareschal Schomberg, a foreigner; and many of the officers were of the catholic religion. His ally, the French king, he might expect, would second him, if force became requisite for restraining his discontented subjects, and supporting the measures which, by common consent, they had agreed to pursue. But the king was startled, when he approached so dangerous a precipice as that which lay before him. Were violence once offered, there could be no return, he saw, to mutual confidence and trust with his people; the perils attending foreign succours, especially from so mighty a prince, were sufficiently apparent; and the success which his own arms had met with in the war, was not so great as to increase his authority, or terrify the malcontents from opposition.

(a) This was called the Test Act.

in the doctrine of transubstantiation. As the dissenters had also seconded the efforts of the commons against the king's declaration of indulgence, and seemed resolute to accept of no toleration in an illegal manner, a bill passed the commons for the ease and relief of the Protestant non-conformists; but met with some delays in the house of lords.

The resolution for supply was carried into a law; as a recompense to the king for his concessions. An act, likewise, of general pardon and indemnity was passed, which screened the ministers from farther inquiry. None of the capital points were touched on in the remonstrance concerning grievances; the breach of the triple league, the French alliance, or the shutting up of the exchequer. The sole grievances mentioned were, an arbitrary imposition on coals for providing convoys, the exercise of martial law, the quartering and pressing of soldiers; and they prayed, that, after the conclusion of the war, the whole army should be disbanded. The king gave them an evasive answer. When business was finished, the two houses adjourned themselves, on the 29th of March.

The king, however, was still resolved to persevere in his alliance with France, and in the Dutch war, and consequently in all those secret views which depended on those fatal measures. The money, granted by parliament, sufficed to equip a fleet, of which prince Rupert was made admiral; (for the duke was set aside by the test.) Sir Edward Sprague and the earl of Ossory commanded under the prince. A French squadron joined them, commanded by d'Etrées. The combined fleets set sail towards the coast of Holland, and found the enemy, lying at anchor, within the sands at Schonvelt, on the 28th of May, when an engagement took place. Both sides claimed the victory; therefore we infer, that the event was not decisive. The Dutch, being near home, retired into their harbours. In a week they were refitted, and presented themselves again to the combined fleets. A new action ensued, on the 4th of June, not more decisive than the foregoing. There seems not to have been a ship lost on either side in the second engagement.

It was sufficient glory to de Ruyter, that, with a fleet much inferior to the combined squadrons of France and England, he could fight them without any notable disadvantage; and it was sufficient victory, that he could defeat the project of a descent in Zealand, which, had it taken place, had endangered, in the present circumstances, the overthrow of the Dutch commonwealth (b).

Prince Rupert was suspected of being unfavourable to the designs of the court, but it is certain that the duke of York, though he could no longer command the fleet, still possessed the chief authority in the admiralty, and treated prince Rupert extremely ill. The prince complained of a total want of every thing, powder, shot, provisions, beer, and even water; and he went into harbour, that he might refit his ships, and supply their numerous necessities. After some weeks he was refitted, and again put to sea. The hostile fleets met at the mouth of the Texel, and fought the last battle, on the 11th of August, which, during the course of so many years, these neighbouring maritime powers had disputed with each other. De Ruyter, and under him Van Tromp, commanded the Dutch in this action, as in the two former: for the prince of Orange had reconciled these gallant rivals; and they retained nothing of their former animosity, except that emulation, which made them exert themselves with more distinguished bravery against the enemies of their country. Brankert was opposed to d'Etrées, de Ruyter to prince Rupert, Tromp to Sprague (c).

D'Etrées and all the French squadron, except rear-admiral Martel, kept at a distance; and Brankert, instead of attacking them, bore down to the assistance of de Ruyter, who was engaged in furious combat with prince Rupert. On no occasion did the prince acquire more deserved honour: his conduct, as well as valour, shone out with signal lustre. Having disengaged his squadron from the numerous enemies, with whom he was every where surrounded, and having joined sir John Chicheley, his rear-admiral, who had been separated from him, he made haste to the relief of Sprague, who was hard pressed by Tromp's squadron. The Royal Prince, in which Sprague first engaged, was so disabled, that he was obliged to hoist his flag on board the St. George; while Tromp was for a like reason obliged to quit his ship, the Golden Lion, and go on board the Comet. The fight was renewed with the utmost fury by these valorous rivals, and by the rear-admirals, their seconds. Ossory, rear-admiral to Sprague, was preparing to board Tromp, when he saw the St. George terribly torn, and in a manner disabled. Sprague was leaving her, in order to hoist his flag on board a third ship, and return to the charge; when a shot, which had passed through the St. George, took his boat, and sunk her. The admiral was drowned, to the great regret of Tromp himself, who bestowed on his valour the deserved praises.

Prince Rupert found affairs in this dangerous situation, and saw most of the ships in Sprague's squadron disabled from fight. The engagement however was renewed, and became very close and sanguinary. The prince threw the enemy into disorder. To increase it, he sent among them two fire-ships; and at the same time made a signal to the French to bear down; but the prince, when he saw that they neglected his signal, and observed that most of his ships were in no condition to keep the sea long, provided for their safety by making easy sail towards the English coast. The victory in this battle was as doubtful, as in all the actions fought during the present war.

The turn which the affairs of the Hollanders took by land, was still more favourable. The prince of Orange besieged and took Naerden; and from this success gave his country reason to hope for still more prosperous enterprizes. Montecuculi, who commanded the Imperialists on the Upper Rhine, deceived, by the most artful conduct, the vigilance and penetration of marshal Turenne, and making a sudden march, sat down before Bonne. The prince of Orange's conduct was no less masterly; for he eluded all the French generals, and leaving them behind him, joined his army to that of the Imperialists. Bonne was taken in a few days: several other places in the electorate of Cologne fell into the hands of the allies; and the communication being thus cut off between France and the United Provinces, Louis recalled his forces, and abandoned all his conquests, with greater rapidity than he had at first made them. The taking of Maestricht was the only advantage which he gained this campaign.

A congress was opened at Cologne, under the mediation of Sweden; but with little hopes of success. The demands of the two kings were calculated to reduce the Hollanders to perpetual servitude. In proportion as the affairs of the States rose, the kings sunk in their demands; but the States still sunk lower in their offers; and it was found impossible for the parties ever to agree on any conditions. After the French evacuated Holland, the congress broke up; and the seizure of prince William of Furstenburg by the Imperialists afforded the French and English a good pretence for leaving Cologne. The Dutch ambassadors, in their memorials, expressed all the haughtiness and disdain, so natural to a free state, which had met with such unmerited ill treatment.

On the 20th of October, the parliament of England again assembled, and discovered greater symptoms of ill-humour than had appeared in the former session. They had seen for some time a negociation of marriage carried on between the duke of York and the archduchess of Inspruc, a Catholic of the Austrian family; and they had made no opposition. But when that negociation failed, and the duke applied to a princess of the house of Modena, then in close alliance with France; this circumstance raised the commons into a flame; and they remonstrated with zeal and acrimony against the intended marriage. The king told them, that their remonstrance came too late; and that the marriage was already agreed on, and even celebrated by proxy. The commons still insisted; and proceeding to the examination of the other parts of government, they voted the standing army a grievance, and declared, that they would grant no more supply, unless it appeared, that the Dutch were so obstinate as to refuse all reasonable conditions of peace. To cut short

(b) It is remarkable, that, during this war, though the English, with their allies, much over-matched the Hollanders, they were not able to gain any advantage over them; while in the former war, though often overborne by numbers, they still exerted themselves with the greatest courage, and always acquired great renown, sometimes even signal victories. But they were disgusted at the present measures, which they deemed pernicious to their country; they were not satisfied in the justice of the quarrel; and they entertained a perpetual jealousy of their confederates, whom, had they been permitted, they would, with much more pleasure, have destroyed, than even the enemy themselves.

(c) It is to be remarked, that in all actions these brave admirals last mentioned had still selected each other, as the only antagonists worthy each other's valour; and no decisive advantage had as yet been gained by either of them. They fought in this battle, as if there were no mean between death and victory.

these

these disagreeable altercations, the king resolved to prorogue the parliament; and with that intention he went unexpectedly to the house of peers, on the 4th of November, and sent the usher to summon the commons. It happened, that the speaker and the usher nearly met at the door of the house; but the speaker being within, some of the members suddenly shut the door, and exclaimed, "To the chair, to the chair;" while others cried, "The black rod is at the door." The speaker was hurried to the chair; and the following motions were instantly made: that the alliance with France is a grievance; that the evil counsellors about the king are a grievance; that the duke of Lauderdale is a grievance, and not fit to be trusted or employed. There was a general cry, "To the question, to the question:" but the usher knocking violently at the door, the speaker leaped from the chair, and the house rose in great confusion.

During the interval, the earl of Shaftesbury was dismissed from the office of chancellor; and the great seal was given to sir Heneage Finch, by the title of lord keeper. The test had incapacitated Clifford; and the white staff was conferred on sir Thomas Osborne, soon after created earl of Danby, a minister of abilities, who had risen by his parliamentary talents. Clifford retired into the country, and soon after died.

The parliament had been prorogued, in order to give the duke leisure to finish his marriage; but the king's necessities soon obliged him again to assemble them; which he did on the 7th of February, 1674; and by some popular acts he paved the way for the session. But all his efforts were in vain. The disgust of the commons was fixed in foundations too deep to be easily removed. They began with applications for a general fast; by which they intimated, that the nation was in a very calamitous condition: they addressed against the king's guards, which they represented as dangerous to liberty, and even as illegal, since they never had yet received the sanction of parliament: they took some steps towards establishing a new and more rigorous test against popery: but that which chiefly alarmed the court, was the attack they made on the members of the cabal, to whose pernicious counsels they imputed all their present grievances. Clifford was dead: Shaftesbury had made his peace with the country party, and was become their leader: Buckingham was endeavouring to imitate Shaftesbury; but his intentions were as yet known to very few. A motion was therefore made in the house of commons for his impeachment: he desired to be heard at the bar; but gave little satisfaction. He was required to answer precisely to certain queries, which they proposed to him. These regarded all the articles of misconduct above mentioned; and among the rest, the following query seems remarkable: "By whose advice was the army brought up to overawe the debates and resolutions of the house of commons?" Buckingham, in all his answers, endeavoured to exculpate himself, and to load Arlington. He succeeded not in the former intention: the commons voted an address for his removal. But Arlington, who was on many accounts disagreeable to the house, was attacked. Articles were drawn up against him; though the impeachment was never prosecuted.

The king perceived that he could expect no supply from the commons for carrying on a war so odious to them. He therefore resolved to make a separate peace with the Dutch, on the terms which they had proposed through the channel of the Spanish ambassador. With an affected cordiality he asked advice of the parliament. The parliament unanimously gave their advice for peace. Peace was accordingly concluded. The honour of the flag was yielded by the Dutch in the most extensive terms: a regulation of trade was agreed to: all possessions were restored to the same condition as before the war: the English planters in Surinam were allowed to remove at pleasure: and the States agreed to pay to the king the sum of eight hundred thousand patacoons, near three hundred thousand pounds. Four days after the parliament was prorogued, the peace was proclaimed in London, to the great joy of the people, on the 28th of February. Spain had declared that she could no longer remain neuter, if hostilities were continued against Holland: and a sensible decay of trade was foreseen, in case a rupture should ensue with that kingdom. The prospect of this loss contributed to increase the national aversion to the present war, and to enliven the joy for its termination.

In the French service there was a great body of English, to the number of ten thousand men, who had acquired honour in every action, and had greatly contributed to the success of Louis. These troops, Charles said, he was bound by treaty not to recall; but he obliged himself to the States by a secret article, not to allow them to be recruited; yet his partiality to France prevented a strict execution of this stipulation.

In considering the projects of the famous Cabal, it will appear difficult to determine, whether the end which those ministers pursued were more blamable and pernicious, or the means, by which they intended to effect it, were more impolitic and imprudent. Though they might talk only of recovering or fixing the king's authority; their intention could be no other than that of making him absolute. The assistance of the French king was, no doubt, deemed, by the cabal, a considerable support in the schemes which they were forming; but it is not likely, that they could imagine themselves capable of directing and employing an associate of so overbearing and ambitious a character. In all its other parts the plan of the cabal appears equally absurd and incongruous. Besides, whatever views might be entertained of promoting the Catholic religion in England, they could only tend to render all the other schemes abortive, and make them fall with inevitable ruin upon the projectors. But it must be allowed, that the difficulties, and even inconsistencies, attending the schemes of the Cabal, are so numerous and obvious, that one feels at first an inclination to deny the reality of those schemes, and to suppose them entirely the chimeras of calumny and faction. But the utter impossibility of accounting, by any other hypothesis, for those strange measures embraced by the court, as well as for the numerous circumstances which accompanied them, obliges us to acknowledge that a formal plan was laid for changing the religion, and subverting the constitution, of this country, and that the king and the ministry were in reality conspirators against the people (d). Though the king possessed penetration and a sound judgement, his capacity was chiefly (d) Some authors have doubted the existence of a plan for the subversion of the constitution of this country; but there is the most direct and positive evidence of its reality. From the humanity and candour of the Principal of the Scotch College at Paris, Mr. Hume tells us, he was admitted to peruse James the Second's Memoirs, kept there. They amount to several volumes of small folio, all written with that prince's own hand, and comprehending the remarkable incidents of his life, from his early youth till nearly the time of his death. His account of the French alliance is as follows: The intention of the king and duke was chiefly to change the religion of England, which they deemed an easy undertaking, because of the great propensity, as they imagined, of the cavaliers and church party to popery: the treaty with Louis was concluded at Versailles in the end of 1669, or beginning of 1670, by lord Arundel of Wardour, whom no historian mentions as having had any hand in these transactions. The purport of it was, that Louis was to give Charles two hundred thousand pounds a-year in quarterly payments, in order to enable him to settle the Catholic religion in England; and he was also to supply him with an army of six thousand men in case of any insurrection. When that work was finished, England was to join with France in making war upon Holland. In case of success, Louis was to have the inland provinces, the prince of Orange Holland in sovereignty, and Charles, Sluice, the Brille, Walcheren, with the rest of the sea-ports as far as Mazeland Sluice. The king's project was first to effect the change of religion in England; but the duchess of Orleans, in the interview at Dover, persuaded him to begin with the Dutch war, contrary to the remonstrances of the duke of York, who insisted that Louis, after serving his own purposes, would no longer trouble himself about England. The duke makes no mention of any design to render the king absolute; but that was, no doubt, implied in the other project, which was to be effected entirely by royal authority. The king was so zealous a papist, that he wept for joy when he saw the prospect of re-uniting his kingdom to the Catholic church.

Sir John Dalrymple has since published some other curious particulars with regard to this treaty. We find, that it was concerted and signed with the privity alone of four popish counsellors of the king's, Arlington, Arundel, Clifford, and sir Richard Bealing. The secret was kept from Buckingham, Ashley, and Lauderdale. In order to engage them to take part in it, a very refined and a very mean artifice was fallen upon by the king. After the secret conclusion and signature of the treaty, the king pretended to these three ministers, that he wished to have a treaty and alliance with France for mutual support, and for a Dutch war; and when various pretended obstacles and difficulties were surmounted, a sham treaty was concluded with their consent and approbation, containing every article of the former real treaty, except that of the king's change of religion. However, there was virtually involved even in this treaty, the assuming of absolute government in England: for the support of French troops, and a war with Holland, so contrary to the interests and inclinations of his people, could mean nothing else. One cannot sufficiently admire the absolute want of common sense, which appears throughout the whole of this criminal transaction. For if popery was so much the object of national horror, that even the king's three ministers, Buckingham, Ashley, and Lauderdale, and such profligate ones too, either would not, or durst not receive it, what hopes could he entertain of forcing the nation into that communion? Considering the state of the kingdom, full of veteran and zealous soldiers, bred during the civil wars, it is probable that he had not kept the crown two months after a declaration chiefly fitted for smaller matters, and the ordinary occurrences of life; nor had he application enough to carry his view to distant consequences, or to digest and adjust any plan of political operations. As he scarcely ever thought twice on any one subject, every appearance of advantage was apt to seduce him; and when he found his way obstructed by unlooked-for difficulties, he readily turned aside into the first path, where he expected more to gratify the natural indolence of his disposition. But the suspicions of the people, though they burst not forth at once, were by this attempt rendered altogether incurable; and the more they reflected on the circumstances attending it, the more resentment and jealousy were they apt to entertain: therefore deemed no precaution too great to secure them against the pernicious consequences of such machinations.

Charles, sensible of this jealousy, was inclined thenceforth not to trust his people, of whom he had before entertained a great diffidence; and, though obliged to make a separate peace, he still kept up connexions with the French monarch. He apologized for deserting his ally, by representing to him all the real difficulties under which he laboured; and Louis, with the greatest complaisance, admitted the validity of his excuses. The duke likewise, conscious that his principles and conduct had rendered him still more disgustful to the people, maintained on his own account a separate correspondence with the French court, and entered into particular connexions with Louis, which these princes dignified with the name of friendship. The duke had only in view to secure his succession, and favour the Catholics; and it must be acknowledged, that, though his schemes were dangerous to the people, they gave the king no ground of jealousy. A dutiful subject, and an affectionate brother, he knew no other rule of conduct than obedience; and the same unlimited submission which afterwards, when king, he exacted of his people, he was ever willing, before he ascended the throne, to pay to his sovereign.

The king was now at peace with all the world, and therefore he thought proper to offer his mediation to the contending powers, in order to compose their differences. Louis, willing to negociate under so favourable a mediator, accepted of Charles's offer; but it was apprehended, that the allies would be inclined to refuse it. Sir William Temple was sent by Charles as ambassador to the States; but when he was on the continent, he soon found, that the scheme of mediating a peace was likely to prove abortive. The allies, besides their jealousy of the king's mediation, expressed a great ardour for the continuance of war. Holland had stipulated with Spain never to come to an accommodation, till all things in Flanders were restored to the condition in which they had been left by the Pyrenean treaty. The emperor had high pretensions in Alsace; and as the greater part of the empire joined in the alliance, it was hoped that France, so much overmatched in force, would soon be obliged to submit to the terms demanded of her. In the mean time, the war between the Dutch and the French went on with the greatest vigour; and though the prince of Orange was frequently unsuccessful, he still found means to repair his losses, and to make head in a little time against his victorious enemies. But in England these events were considered by the people with great anxiety and concern; though the king and his ministers affected great indifference with regard to them.

Considerable alterations were about this time made in the English ministry. Buckingham was dismissed, who had long, by his wit and humour, possessed the king's favour. Arlington, now chamberlain, and Danby, the treasurer, possessed chiefly the king's confidence. Great hatred and jealousy took place between these ministers; and public affairs were somewhat disturbed by their quarrels. But as Danby daily gained ground with his master, Arlington declined in the same proportion. Danby was a frugal minister; and, by his application and industry, he brought the revenue into tolerable order. He endeavoured so to conduct himself as to give offence to no party; and the consequence was, that he was not able to please any. He was a declared enemy to the French alliance; but never possessed sufficient authority to overcome the prepossessions which the king and the duke retained towards it. It must be ascribed to the prevalence of that interest, aided by money remitted from Paris, that the parliament was assembled so late this year; lest they should attempt to engage the king in measures against France during the ensuing campaign. They met not till April 13, 1675 (e).

The commons, in all their measures, discovered that ill-humour and jealousy, to which the late open schemes of the king, and his present secret attachments, gave but too just foundation. They drew up a new bill against popery, and resolved to insert in it many severe clauses for the detection and prosecution of priests: they presented addresses a second time against Lauderdale; and when the king's answer was not satisfactory, they seemed still determined to persevere in their applications: an accusation was moved against Danby; but upon examining the several articles, it was found not to contain any just reasons for a prosecution; and was therefore dropped: they applied to the king for recalling his troops from the French service; and as he only promised that they should not be recruited, they were much dissatisfied with the answer: a bill was brought in, making it treason to levy money without authority of parliament: another vacating the seats of such members as accepted of offices: another to secure the personal liberty of the subject, and to prevent sending any person prisoner beyond sea.

That the court party might not be idle during these attacks, a bill for a new test was introduced into the house of peers by the earl of Lindesey. All members of either house, and all who possessed any office, were by this bill required to swear, that it was not lawful, upon any pretence whatsoever, to take arms against the king; that they abhorred the traiterous position, of taking arms by his authority against his person, or against those who were commissioned by him; and that they will not at any time endeavour the alteration of the Protestant religion, or of the established government either in church or state (f). There were many absurdities in this test, particularly that of binding men by oath not to alter the government either in church or state; since all human institutions are liable to abuse, and require continual amendments, which are, in reality so many alterations. These difficulties produced such obstructions to the bill, that it was carried only by two voices in the house of peers. All the popish lords, headed by the earl of Bristol, voted against it. It was sent down to the house of commons, where it was likely to undergo a scrutiny still more severe. But a quarrel, which ensued between the two houses, prevented the passing of every bill projected during the present session. Dr. Shirley, being cast in a law-suit before chancery against sir John Fag, a member of the house of commons, preferred a petition of appeal to the house of peers. The lords received it, and summoned Fag to appear before them. He complained to the lower house, who espoused his cause. The commons sent Shirley to prison; the lords asserted their powers. Conferences were tried; but no accommodation ensued. Four lawyers were sent to the Tower by the commons, for transgressing the orders of the house, and pleading in this cause before the peers. The peers ordered the lieutenant of the Tower to release the prisoners: he declined obedience: they applied to the king, and desired him to punish the lieutenant for his contempt. The king summoned both houses; and exhorted them to unanimity; but his advice had no effect: the commons continued as violent as ever; and the king, finding that no business could be finished, at last prorogued the parliament on the 8th of June.

When the parliament was again assembled, on the 13th of October, there appeared not in any respect a change in the disposition of either house. The king desired supplies, as well for the building of ships, as for taking off anticipations, which lay upon his revenue. He even confessed, that he had not been altogether so frugal as he might have been, and as he resolved to be for the future. The commons took into consideration the subject of supply. They ration so wild and extravagant. This was probably the reason why the king of France and the French ministers always dissuaded him from taking off the mask, till the successes of the Dutch war should render that measure prudent and practicable.

(e) This year, on the 25th of March, died Henry Cromwell, second son of the protector, in the 47th year of his age. He had lived unmolested in a private station, ever since the king's restoration.

(f) Great opposition was made to this bill; as might be expected from the present disposition of the nation. During seventeen days, the debates were carried on with much zeal; and all the reason and learning of both parties were displayed on the occasion.

voted three hundred thousand pounds for the building of ships; but they appropriated the sum by very strict clauses. They passed a resolution not to grant any supply for taking off the anticipations of the revenue. This vote was carried in a full house, by a majority of four only: so nearly were the parties balanced. The quarrel was revived, to which Dr. Shirley's cause had given occasion; and the king prorogued them till the 22nd of November.

Soon after the prorogation, an incident occurred, which, though trivial in itself, tended strongly to mark the genius of the English government, and of Charles's administration, during this period. The liberty of the constitution, and the variety as well as violence of the parties, had begotten a propensity for political conversation; and as the coffee-houses were the places in which the conduct of the king and the ministry was canvassed with freedom, a proclamation was issued to suppress these houses of rendezvous. But Charles, finding doubts to arise upon his proclamation, had recourse to the judges, who supplied him with a chicane, and that too a frivolous one, by which he might justify his proceedings. The law, which settled the excise, enacted, that licences for retailing liquors might be refused to such as could not find security for payment of the duties. But coffee was not a liquor subjected to excise; and even this power of refusing licences was very limited, and could not be extended beyond the intention of the act. The king therefore, observing the people to be dissatisfied, yielded to a petition of the coffee-house keepers, who promised for the future to restrain seditious discourses in their houses; and the proclamation was recalled.

The campaign of 1675 proved more fortunate to the confederates than any other during the whole war. The French took the field in Flanders with a numerous army; and Louis himself served as a volunteer under the prince of Condé. But notwithstanding his great preparations, he could gain no advantage over the prince of Orange, who, with a considerable army, opposed him in all his motions; Louis, tired of so unactive a campaign, returned to Versailles. Success now attended the arms of the confederates in a variety of ways: the French retreated, and the allies advanced.

To the misfortunes of the French were added some domestic insurrections of the common people in Guienne and Britanny. Though soon suppressed, they divided the force and attention of Louis. The only advantage, gained by the French, was at sea. Messina in Sicily had revolted; and a fleet under the duke de Vivonne was dispatched to support the rebels. The Dutch had sent a squadron to assist the Spaniards. A battle ensued, where de Ruyter was killed.

Notwithstanding the successes of the allies, the Spaniards and Imperialists apprehended that France was not yet sufficiently broken, nor willing to submit to the terms which they resolved to impose upon her. Though they could not refuse Charles's mediation, and Nimeguen was at last fixed on as the place of congress; yet, under one pretence or other, they still delayed sending their ambassadors, and no progress was made in the negociation. Lord Berkeley, sir William Temple, and sir Lionel Jenkins, were the English ministers at Nimeguen. The Dutch soon appeared: Louis, who hoped to divide the allies, sent ambassadors: the Swedes were also forward to negociate. But these powers could not proceed of themselves to settle terms, the congress served only as an amusement to the public.

It was, however, by the events of the campaign in 1676, not by the conferences among the negociators, that the articles of peace were to be determined. The Spanish towns, ill fortified and worse defended, made but a feeble resistance to Louis; who laid siege to Condé in April, and took it by storm in four days. Having sent the duke of Orleans to besiege Bouchaine, a small but important fortress, which also surrendered. On the Upper Rhine, Philipsbourg was taken by the Imperialists. In Pomerania, the Swedes were so unsuccessful against the Danes and Bradenburghers, that they seemed to be losing apace all the possessions which they had acquired in Germany.

About the beginning of winter, the congress of Nimeguen was pretty full, and the plenipotentiaries of the emperor and Spain, two powers strictly conjoined by blood and alliance, at last appeared. The Dutch had threatened, if they absented themselves any longer, to proceed to a separate treaty with France. The allies thought it impossible but the people and parliament of England must at last force Charles to take part in the affairs of the continent, in which their interests were so deeply concerned. And they trusted, that even the king himself, on the approach of so great a danger, must sacrifice his prejudices in favour of France, to the safety of his own dominions. But Charles here found himself entangled in such opposite motives and engagements, as he had not resolution enough to break, or patience to unravel. He had actually in secret sold his neutrality to France, and he received remittances of a million of livres a-year, which was afterwards increased to two millions; a considerable supply in the present embarrassed state of his finances. He dreaded lest the parliament should treat him as they had formerly done his father; and after they had engaged him in a war on the continent, should take advantage of his necessities, and make him purchase supplies by sacrificing his prerogative and abandoning his ministers. But the cries of his people and parliament, seconded by Danby, Arlington, and most of his ministers, occasioned him to take part with the allies, and to correct the unequal balance of power in Europe.

Charles was now reduced to a situation which he knew not how to extricate himself from; therefore he assembled a parliament on the 15th of February, 1677, and made a plausible speech, in which he warned them against all differences among themselves; expressed a resolution to do his part for bringing their consultations to a happy issue; and offered his consent to any laws for the farther security of their religion, liberty, and property. He then told them of the decayed condition of the navy; and asked money for repairing it: he informed them, that part of his revenue, the additional excise, was soon to expire: and he added these words, "You may at any time see the yearly established expence of the government, by which it will appear, that, the constant and unavoidable charge being paid, there will remain no overplus towards answering those contingencies, which may happen in all kingdoms, and which have been a considerable burthen on me this last year."

Previous to the parliament's entering upon business, they were stopped by a doubt concerning the legality of their meeting. It had been enacted by an old law of Edward III. "That parliaments should be held once every year, or oftener, if need be." The last prorogation had been longer than a year; and being supposed on that account illegal, it was pretended to be equivalent to a dissolution. Such weight, however, was put on this cavil, that Buckingham, Shaftesbury, Salisbury, and Wharton, insisted strenuously in the house of peers on the invalidity of the parliament, and the nullity of all its future acts. For such dangerous positions, they were sent to the Tower, there to remain during the pleasure of his majesty and the house. Buckingham, Salisbury, and Wharton made submissions, and were soon after released. But Shaftesbury, more obstinate in his temper, sought the remedy of law; and being rejected by the judges, he was, at last, after a twelvemonth's imprisonment, obliged to make the same submissions; upon which he was also restored to liberty.

The commons at first seemed to proceed with temper. They granted the sum of five hundred and eighty-six thousand pounds, for building thirty ships; though they strictly appropriated the money to that service. Estimates were given in of the expence; but it was afterwards found that they fell short near one hundred thousand pounds. They also voted, agreeably to the king's request, the continuance of the additional excise for three years. This excise had been granted for nine years in 1668. Every thing seemed to promise a peaceable and an easy session. But the parliament was roused from this tranquillity by news received from the continent. The French king had taken the field in the middle of February, and laid siege to Valenciennes, which he carried in a few days by storm. He next invested both Cambray and St. Omers, both which places fell into his hands, and the prince of Orange was defeated. This success of the French infused terror into the English parliament. They addressed the king, representing the danger to which the kingdom was exposed from the growing greatness of France, and praying that his majesty, by such alliances as he should think fit, would both secure his own dominions and the Spanish Netherlands, and thereby quiet the fears of his people. The king, desirous of eluding this application, replied in general terms, that he would use all means for the preservation of Flanders, consistent with the peace and safety of his his kingdoms. This answer was an evasion, or rather a denial. The commons, therefore, thought proper to be more explicit. They entreated him not to defer the entering into such alliances as might attain that great end: and in case war with the French king should be the result of his measures, they promised to grant him all the aids and supplies, which would enable him to support the honour and interest of the nation. The king was also more explicit in his reply. He told them, that the only way to prevent danger, was to put him in a condition to make preparations for their security. This message was understood to be a demand of money. The parliament accordingly empowered the king to borrow on the additional excise two hundred thousand pounds at seven per cent.: a very small sum indeed; but which they deemed sufficient, with the ordinary revenue, to equip a good squadron, and thereby put the nation in security, till farther resolutions should be taken. But this concession fell far short of the king's expectations. He therefore informed them, that, unless they granted him six hundred thousand pounds upon the new funds, it would not be possible for him, without exposing the nation to danger, "to speak or act those things," which would answer the end of their addresses. The house took this message into consideration; but before they came to any resolution, the king sent for them to Whitehall, where he told them, upon the word of a king, that they should not repent any trust which they would repose in him for the safety of his kingdom; that he would not for any consideration break credit with them, or employ their money to other uses than those for which they intended it. This speech brought affairs to a short issue. The king required them to trust him with a large sum: he pawned his royal word for their security: they must either run the risque of losing their money, or fail of those alliances which they had projected, and at the same time declare to all the world the highest distrust of their sovereign. There were, however, many reasons which determined the house of commons to put no trust in the king. They considered, that the pretence of danger was groundless; while the French were opposed by such powerful alliances on the continent, while the king was master of a good fleet at sea, and while all his subjects were united in opposition to foreign enemies. That the only justifiable reason, therefore, of Charles's backwardness, was not the apprehension of danger from abroad, but a diffidence, which he might perhaps have entertained of his parliament; lest, after engaging him in foreign alliances for carrying on war, they should take advantage of his necessities, and extort from him concessions dangerous to his prerogative. The parliament maintained, that the king had, by former measures, excited jealousies in his people, and now required their trust and confidence. That he had not scrupled to demand supplies for maintaining the triple league, at the very moment he was concerting measures for breaking it, and had accordingly employed to that purpose the supplies which he had obtained by those delusive pretences. That his union with France, during the war against Holland, must have been founded on projects the most dangerous to his people; and as the same union was still secretly maintained, it might justly be feared that the same projects were not yet abandoned. That, among other things, the real ground of the king's refusal, was a desire of obtaining the money, that he might, notwithstanding his royal word, employ it to other purposes. And that, by using such dishonourable means, he rendered himself still more unworthy the confidence of the nation. Thus it appears, that a general distrust of the king prevailed; and the parliament resolved not to hazard their money, in expectation of alliances, which, they believed, his majesty never intended to form. Instead of granting the supply, they voted an address, wherein they "besought his majesty to enter into a league, offensive and defensive, with the States General of the United Provinces, against the growth and power of the French king, and for the preservation of the Spanish Netherlands; and to make such other alliances with the confederates as should appear fit and useful to that end." They also promised speedy and effectual supplies, for preserving his majesty's honour and ensuring the safety of the public. The king pretended the highest anger at this address, which he represented as a dangerous encroachment upon his prerogative. He reproved the commons in severe terms; and ordered them to be adjourned on the 8th of May.

This was certainly the critical moment, when the king might with ease have preserved the balance of power in Europe, which it since cost this island great expence of blood and treasure to restore, and might by perseverance have regained, in some degree, the confidence of his people. This opportunity being neglected, the wound became incurable; and notwithstanding his momentary appearances of vigour against France and popery, and their momentary inclinations to rely on his faith; he was still believed to be engaged in the same interests, and they soon elapsed into distrust and jealousy. The secret memoirs of this reign, which have since been published (g), prove beyond doubt, that the king had at this time concerted measures with France, and had no intention to enter into a war in favour of the allies. He had entertained no view, therefore, even when he pawned his ROYAL WORD to his people, than to procure a grant of money; and he trusted, that, while he eluded their expectations, he could not afterwards want pretences for palliating his conduct.

In the mean time negociations were carried on between France and Holland, and all their differences were adjusted, provided they could afterwards satisfy their allies on both sides. This work, though in appearance difficult, seemed to be extremely forwarded by a new event, which promised a more prosperous issue to the quarrel with France, and revived the hopes of the English, who understood the interests of their own nation.

The king saw, with regret, the discontents which prevailed in England, and which seemed every day to increase upon him. He knew that, during the late war with Holland, the malcontents at home had made applications to the prince of Orange: he saw that the religion of the duke of York inspired the people with dismal apprehensions; and though he had obliged his brother to allow the young princesses to be educated in the Protestant faith, something farther, he thought, was necessary, in order to satisfy the nation. He entertained, therefore, proposals for marrying the prince of Orange to the lady Mary, the elder princess, and heir apparent to the crown (for the duke had no male issue,) and he hoped, by so tempting an offer, to engage him entirely in his interests. A peace he purposed to make; such as would satisfy France, and still preserve his connections with that crown: and he intended to sanctify it by the approbation of the prince, whom he found to be extremely revered in England, and respected throughout Europe. The reasons for this alliance were seconded by Danby and Temple; and Charles at last granted permission to the prince, when the campaign should be over, to pay him a visit.

The king received his nephew at Newmarket, on the 10th of October, and would have entered immediately upon business; but the prince desired first to be acquainted with the lady Mary: and he declared, that, contrary to the usual sentiments of persons of his rank, he placed a great part of happiness in domestic satisfaction, and would not, upon any consideration of interest or politics, match himself with a person disagreeable to him. He was accordingly introduced to the princess, and the king thought that he had now a double tie upon him, and might safely expect his compliance with every proposal; but he was surprized to find the prince decline all discourse of business, till his marriage should be finished. One day, Temple found the prince in a very bad humour, repenting that he had ever come to England, and resolute in a few days to leave it: but before he went, the king, he said, must chuse the terms on which they should hereafter live together: he was sure it must be like the greatest friends or the greatest enemies: and he desired Temple to inform his master next morning of these intentions. Charles was struck with this menace, and foresaw how the prince's departure would be interpreted by the people. He therefore paid a compliment to his nephew's honesty, and told Temple, that the marriage was concluded, and desired him to inform the duke of it, as of an affair already resolved

(g) Such as the letters, which passed betwixt Danby and Montague, the king's ambassador at Paris; Temple's Memoirs, and his Letters. In these last, we see that the king never made any proposals of terms but what were advantageous to France, and the prince of Orange believed them to have always been concerted with the French ambassador. Vol. i. p. 439. In sir John Dalrymple's Appendix, p. 103. it appears that the king had signed himself, without the participation of his ministers, a secret treaty with France, and had obtained a pension on the promise of his neutrality: a fact which renders his royal word, solemnly given to his subjects, one of the most dishonourable and most scandalous acts that ever proceeded from a throne.

on. The duke seemed surprized; but yielded a prompt obedience; which, he said, was his constant maxim to whatever he found to be the king's pleasure. The marriage of the prince of Orange with the lady Mary, took place on the 23rd of October, 1677. No measure, during this reign, gave such general satisfaction. All parties strove who should most applaud it (h).

This marriage was a great surprize to Louis, who had been accustomed to govern every thing in the English court. A conjunction of England with the allies, and a vigorous war in opposition to French ambition, were the consequences immediately expected, both abroad and at home: but to check these sanguine hopes, the king, a few days after the marriage, prolonged the adjournment of the parliament from the 3rd of December to the 4th of April. This term was too late for granting supplies, or making preparations for war; and could be chosen by the king for no other reason, than as an atonement to France for his consent to the marriage. It appears also, that Charles secretly received from Louis the sum of two millions of livres on account of this important service. Negociations at length commenced between England and France; and though Charles seemed to be determined, and talked in a menacing manner, Louis artfully evaded coming to any conclusion.

The English parliament met, after some new adjournments, on the 28th of January, 1678; and the king was astonished, that, notwithstanding the measures which he had taken, great distrust and jealousy and discontent prevailed, at intervals, among the members. Though in his speech he had allowed that a good peace could no longer be expected from negociation, and assured them that he was resolved to enter into a war for that purpose; the commons did not forbear to insert in their reply several harsh clauses. Upon his reproving them, they seemed penitent, and voted, that they would assist his majesty in the prosecution of the war. A fleet of ninety sail, an army of thirty thousand men, and a million of money, were also voted. Great difficulties, however, were made by the commons with regard to the army, which the house, judging by past measures, believed to be intended more against the liberties of England than against the progress of the French monarch. Thus had the king reduced both himself and the nation to a very perilous situation. In all debates, severe speeches were made, and were received with seeming approbation: the duke and the treasurer began to be apprehensive of impeachments: many motions against the king's ministers were lost by a trifling majority: the commons appointed a day to consider the state of the kingdom with regard to popery; and they even voted, that, how urgent soever the occasion, they would lay no farther charge on the people, till secured against the prevalence of the Catholic party. In short, the parliament was impatient for war whenever the king seemed averse to it; but grew suspicious of some sinister design as soon as he appeared to comply with their requests.

The politic Louis knew how to avail himself of all the advantages which these distractions afforded him. By his emissaries, he represented to the Dutch, the imprudence of their depending on England; where an indolent king, averse to all war, especially with France, and irresolute in his measures, was actuated only by the uncertain breath of a factious parliament. In order to enforce his insinuations, he took the field very early in the spring; and after threatening Ghent and Ypres, advances towards an accommodation were quickened.

Directly after the parliament had voted the supply, the king began to inlist forces; and such was the ardour of the English for a war with France, that an army of above twenty thousand men was completed in a few weeks. Three thousand men, under the duke of Monmouth, were sent over to secure Ostend: some regiments were recalled from the French service: a fleet was fitted out with great diligence: and a quadruple alliance was projected between England, Holland, Spain, and Germany.

But these measures received a sudden damp from an address of the lower house; in which they justified all their past proceedings that had given disgust to the king; desired to be acquainted with the measures taken by him; prayed him to dismiss evil counsellors; and named in particular the duke of Lauderdale, on whose removal they strenuously insisted. The king told them, that their address was so extravagant, that he was not willing speedily to give it the answer which it deserved. And he began again to lend an ear to the proposals of Louis, who offered him great sums of money, if he would consent to France's making an advantageous peace with the allies.

Sir William Temple, though pressed by the king, refused to have any concern in so dishonourable a negociation: but he informs us, that the king said, there was one article proposed, which so incensed him, that, as long as he lived, he should never forget it. Sir William goes no farther; but Dr. Swift, the editor of his works, says that the French, before they would agree to any payment, required as a preliminary, that the king should engage never to keep above eight thousand regular troops in Great Britain (i). Charles exclaimed in a passion, "Cod's fish," his usual oath, "does my brother of France think to serve me thus? Are all his promises to make me absolute master of my people come to this? Or does he think that a thing to be done with eight thousand men?"

Van Beverning was the Dutch ambassador at Nimeguen, a man of great authority with the States. He was eager for peace, and was persuaded, that the reluctance of the king, and the jealousies of the parliament, would for ever disappoint the allies in their hopes of succour from England. He therefore went to the French king at Ghent, to concert the terms of a general treaty, as well as to procure a present truce, for six weeks. The terms agreed on left the chief strength of the Spanish frontier in the hands of France.

The English murmured when it was known that Flanders was to be left in so defenceless a condition. The chief complaints were levelled against the king, who, by his concurrence at first, by his favour afterwards, and by his delays at last, had raised the power of France to so enormous a height, that it threatened the general liberties of Europe. Charles, uneasy under these imputations, and dreading the consequence of losing the affections of his subjects, began to wish heartily for war, hoping by that measure to be restored to his ancient popularity.

The marquis de Balbaces, the Spanish ambassador, asked the ambassadors of France, at what time France intended to restore the six towns in Flanders. They declared that the king, their master, would keep them till restitution was made to Sweden. The States immediately gave the king intelligence of a pretension, which might be attended with such dangerous consequences. Charles was both surprized and angry. He immediately dispatched Temple to concert with the States vigorous measures for opposing France. Temple in six days concluded a treaty, on the 16th of July, by which Louis was obliged to declare, within sixteen days after the date, that he would shortly evacuate the towns: and in case of his refusal, Holland was bound to continue the war, and England to declare immediately against France, in conjunction with the whole confederacy.

These warlike measures were so ill seconded by the parliament, where even the French ministers were suspected, with reason (k), of carrying on some intrigues, that the commons renewed their former jealousies against the king, and voted the army immediately to be disbanded.

(h) Even Arlington, who had been kept out of the secret, told the prince, "That some things good in themselves, were spoiled by the manner of doing them, as some things bad were mended by it; but he would confess, that this was a thing so good in itself, that the manner of doing it could not spoil it."

(i) To wit, three thousand men for Scotland, and the usual guards and garrisons in England, amounting to near five thousand men. Sir J. Dalrymple's App. p. 161.

(k) Sir John Dalrymple, in his Appendix, has given us from Barillon's dispatches in the secretary's office at Paris, a more particular detail of these intrigues. They were carried on with lord Russel, lord Hollis, lord Berkshire, the duke of Buckingham, Algernon Sydney, Montague, Bulstrode, col. Titus, sir Edward Harley, sir John Baber, sir Roger Hill, Boscawen, Littleton, Powle, Harbord, Hamden, sir Thomas Armstrong, Hotham, Herbert, and some others of less note. Of these, lord Russel and lord Hollis alone refused to touch any French money: all the others received presents or bribes from Barillon. But we are to remark, that the party views of these men, and their well-founded jealousies of the king and duke, engaged them, independently of the money, into the same measures that were suggested to them by the French ambassador. The intrigues of France, therefore, with the parliament were a mighty small engine in the political machine. Those with the king, which have always been known, were of infinitely greater consequence. The sums distributed to all these men, excepting Montague, did not exceed sixteen thousand pounds in three years; and therefore could have little weight in the two houses, especially when opposed to the influence of the crown. Accordingly we find, in all Barillon's dispatches, a great anxiety that the parliament should never be assembled. The conduct of these English patriots was more mean than criminal; and monsieur Courten says, that two hundred thousand livres employed by the Spaniards and Germans, would have more influence than two millions distributed by France. See sir J. Dalrymple's App. p. 111.

The

The king by a message represented the danger of disarming before peace were finally concluded; and he recommended to their consideration, whether he could honourably recal his forces from those towns in Flanders, which were put under his protection, and which had at present no other means of defence. The commons agreed to prolong the term with regard to these forces. Every thing indeed in Europe bore the appearance of war.

Charles usually passed a great part of his time in the women's apartments, particularly those of the duchess of Portsmouth; where, among other gay company, he often met with Barillon, the French ambassador, a man of polite conversation, who was admitted into all the amusements of that inglorious but agreeable monarch. It was the charms of this sauntering, easy life, which, during his later years, attached Charles to his mistresses. By the insinuations of Barillon, and the duchess of Portsmouth, an order was, in an unguarded hour, procured, which instantly changed the face of affairs in Europe. One Du Cros, a French fugitive monk, was sent to Temple, directing him to apply to the Swedish ambassador, and persuade him not to insist on the conditions required by France, but to sacrifice to general peace those interests of Sweden. Du Cros, who had secretly received instructions from Barillon, published every where in Holland the commission with which he was intrusted; and all men took the alarm. It was concluded, that Charles's sudden alacrity for war was as suddenly extinguished, and that no steady measures could ever be taken with England. The king afterwards, when he saw Temple, treated this important matter in raillery; and said, laughing, that the rogue Du Cros had outwitted them all.

The negociations, however, at Nimeguen still continued; and the French ambassadors spun out the time, till the morning of the critical day, which, by the late treaty between England and Holland, was to determine whether a sudden peace or a long war were to have place in Christendom. The French ambassadors came then to Van Beverning, and told him, that they had received orders to consent to the evacuation of the towns, and immediately to conclude and sign the peace. The papers were instantly drawn, and signed by the ministers of France and Holland, between eleven and twelve o'clock at night, on the 1st of August. By this treaty France secured the possession of Franche Comté, together with Cambray, Aire, St. Omer's, Valenciennes, Tournay, Ypres, Bouchaine, Cassel, &c. and restored to Spain only Charleroi, Coutrai, Oudenard, Aeth, Ghent, and Limbourg. The next day Temple received an express from England, which brought the ratifications of the treaty lately concluded with the States, together with orders immediately to proceed to the exchange of them. Charles was now returned to his former inclinations for war with France. Van Beverning was loudly exclaimed against by the ambassadors of the allies at Nimeguen, and Hyde was sent over by Charles with a view of persuading the States to disavow Van Beverning; and the king promised that England, if she might depend on Holland, would immediately declare war, and would pursue it, till France were reduced to reasonable conditions. Charles at present went farther than words. He hurried on the embarkation of his army for Flanders; and all his preparations wore a hostile appearance. But the States had been too often deceived to trust any longer. They ratified the treaty signed at Nimeguen; and all the other powers of Europe were at last, after much clamour and many disgusts, obliged to accept of the terms prescribed to them (l).

The king, in the early part of his reign, endeavoured to render himself popular in England, and adopting like measures in Scotland, he entrusted the government into the hands chiefly of Tweddale, and sir Robert Murray, men of prudence and moderation. These ministers made it their principal object to compose the religious differences, which ran high; and as rigour and restraint had failed of success among the Scots, a scheme of comprehension was tried; by which it was intended to diminish the authority of bishops, to abolish their negative voice in the ecclesiastical courts, and to leave them little more than the right of precedency among the presbyters. But the presbyterians entertained great jealousy against this scheme. The least communication with unlawful and antichristian institutions they esteemed dangerous and criminal: "Touch not, taste not, handle not;" was vociferated amongst them: and the malcontents therefore were determined not to yield.

The next project adopted was that of indulgence. In prosecution of this scheme, the most popular of the expelled preachers were settled in vacant churches; and small salaries were offered to the rest, till they should otherwise be provided for. These last refused the king's bounty, which they considered as the wages of a criminal silence; and the former soon repented their compliance. The people now deemed their sermons languid and spiritless (m). In consequence, conventicles multiplied daily in the west: the clergy of the established church were insulted: the laws were neglected: the covenanters even met daily in arms at their places of worship; and though they usually dispersed themselves after divine service, yet the government took alarm at seeing men dare to set authority at defiance, and, during a time of full peace, to put themselves in a military array. The covenant, which the non-conformists in Scotland idolized, was a persecuting band of confederacy; and the government, instead of soothing them into tranquillity, thought themselves entitled to a rigid obedience, and were too apt, from a mistaken policy, to retaliate upon the dissenters, who differed from them in religious opinion.

Amidst these disturbances, a new parliament was assembled at Edinburgh, on the 19th of October, 1669; and Lauderdale was sent down commissioner. The zealous Presbyterians, who were the chief patrons of liberty, were too feeble to resist, with any success, the measures of government; and in parliament the tide ran strongly in favour of monarchy. The commissioner had influence to get two acts passed, which were of consequence to the ecclesiastical and civil liberties of the kingdom. By the one, it was declared, that the settling of all things with regard to the external government of the church was a right of the crown: that whatever related to ecclesiastical meetings, matters, and persons, was to be ordered according to such directions as the king should send to his privy council: and that these being published by them, should have the force of laws (n). The other act regarded the militia, which the king, by his own authority, had two years before established, instead of the army, which was disbanded (o).

The king by the former of these laws was rendered absolute master of the church, and might legally, by his edict, re-establish, if he thought proper, even the catholic religion in Scotland. By the latter, he saw a powerful force ready at his call: he had even the advantage of being able to disguise his orders under the name of the privy council; and in case of failure in his enterprizes, could, by such a pretence, apologize for his conduct to the parliament of England. But in proportion as these laws were agreeable to the king, they gave alarm to the English commons, and were the chief cause of the redoubled attacks which they made upon Lauderdale. These attacks, however, served only to fortify him in his interest with the king; and by degrees he became the prime, or rather sole minister for Scotland.

In a subsequent session of the same parliament, a se-

(l) Louis had now reached the height of that glory which ambition can afford. His ministers and negociators appeared as much superior to those of all Europe in the cabinet, as his generals and armies had been experienced in the field. A successful war had been carried on against an alliance, composed of the greatest potentates in Europe. Considerable conquests had been made, and his territories enlarged on every side. An advantageous peace was at last concluded, where he had given the law. The allies were so enraged against each other, that they were not likely to cement soon in any new confederacy. And thus he had, during some years, a real prospect of attaining the monarchy of Europe, and of exceeding the empire of Charlemagne, perhaps equalling that of ancient Rome. Had England continued much longer in the same condition, and under the same government, it is not easy to conceive that he could have failed of effecting his purpose.

(m) Their usual gifts, they thought, had left them, on account of their submission, which was stigmatised as erastianism. They gave them the appellation, not of ministers of Christ, but of the king's curates; as the clergy of the established church were commonly denominated the bishop's curates.

(n) As if the king had a right to determine what opinion a man should entertain with respect to his religion; and to compel him to embrace those sentiments which he could by no means reconcile to his conscience.

(o) By this act the militia was settled, to the number of twenty-two thousand men, who were to be constantly armed and regularly disciplined. And it was farther enacted, that these troops should be held in readiness to march into England, Ireland, or any part of the king's dominions, for any cause in which his majesty's authority, power, or greatness, was concerned; on receiving orders, not from the king himself, but from the privy council of Scotland.

vere law was enacted against conventicles, on the 28th of July, 1670. Ruinous fines were imposed both on the preachers and hearers, even if the meetings had been in houses; but field conventicles were subjected to the penalty of death, and confiscation of goods; four hundred marks Scotch were offered as a reward to those who should seize the criminals; and they were indemnified for any slaughter which they might commit in the execution of such an undertaking. And as it was found difficult to get evidence against these conventicles, however numerous, it was enacted by another law, that whoever, being required by the council, refused to give information upon oath, should be punished by arbitrary fines, by imprisonment, or by banishment to the plantations. Thus all persecution adopts the iniquities, as well as rigours, of the most detestable of all courts—the inquisition.

Notwithstanding this ready compliance in the parliament, a party was formed against Lauderdale, of which duke Hamilton was at the head. This nobleman, with Tweddale and others, went to London, and applied to the king, who, during the present depression and insignificance of parliament, was alone able to correct the abuses of Lauderdale's administration. But even their complaints to him might be dangerous; and all approaches of truth to the throne were barred by the ridiculous law against leasing-making; and no redress was obtained; for Charles continued Lauderdale in his authority. A very bad, at least a severe use was made of this authority. The privy council, in 1675, dispossessed twelve gentlemen or noblemen of their houses; which were converted into so many garrisons, established for the suppression of conventicles. The nation, it was pretended, was really, on account of these religious assemblies, in a state of war; and by the ancient law, the king, in such an emergency, was empowered to place a garrison in any house where he should judge it expedient.

It were endless to recount every act of violence and arbitrary authority exercised during Lauderdale's administration. All the lawyers were put from the bar, nay banished, by the king's order, twelve miles from the capital, and by that means the whole justice of the kingdom was suspended for a year; till these lawyers were brought to declare it as their opinion, that all appeals to parliament were illegal. A letter was procured from the king, for expelling twelve of the chief magistrates of Edinburgh, and declaring them incapable of all public office; though their only crime had been their want of compliance with the tyrannical measures of Lauderdale. Even several members of the Scottish parliament were fined and imprisoned, because they petitioned the king to empower his commissioner to repeal some late acts which obstructed their commerce. One More, a member of parliament, having moved in the house, that in imitation of the English parliament, no bill should pass except after three readings, he was, for this pretended offence, immediately sent to prison by the commissioner.

Lauderdale's private deportment was as insolent and provoking as his public administration was violent and tyrannical. Justice likewise was universally perverted by faction and interest; and from the great rapacity of that duke, and still more of his duchess, all offices and favours were openly put to sale. No one was allowed to approach the throne who was not dependent on him; and no remedy could be hoped for or obtained against his manifold oppressions. The case of Mitchel shows that this minister was as much destitute of truth and honour, as of lenity and justice (p).

The rigours exercised by Lauderdale against conventicles, instead of breaking the spirit of the religionists, had tended only to render them more obstinate, to increase the fervour of their zeal, to link them more closely together, and to inflame them against the established hierarchy. The commonalty frequented conventicles without reserve; and the gentry, though they themselves commonly abstained from these places of worship, connived at this irregularity in their inferiors. In order to interest the former on the side of the persecutors, a bond or contract was, by order of the privy council, tendered to the landlords in the west, by which they were to engage for the good behaviour of their tenants; and in case any tenant frequented a conventicle, the landlord was to subject himself to the same fine as could by law be exacted from the delinquent; thus iniquitously making one man answerable for the conduct of another. The greater part of the gentry consequently refused to sign these bonds; and Lauderdale endeavoured to break their spirit by expedients still more unusual and arbitrary.

The law enacted against conventicles had called them seminaries of rebellion. This expression, which was nothing but a flourish of rhetoric, Lauderdale and the privy council were willing to understand in a literal sense; and because the western counties abounded in conventicles, though otherwise in profound peace, they pretended that these counties were in a state of actual war and rebellion. They made therefore an agreement with some highland chieftains to call out their clans, to the number of eight thousand men: to these they joined the guards, and the militia of Angus; and sent the whole to live at free quarters upon the lands of such as had refused the bonds illegally required of them. The noxious counties were the most populous and most industrious in Scotland. The highlanders were the people the most disorderly and the least civilized. It is easy to imagine the havoc and destruction which ensued. Nothing escaped their ravenous hands: by menaces, by violence, and sometimes by tortures, men were obliged to discover their concealed wealth. Neither age, nor sex, nor innocence, afforded protection; and the gentry, finding that even those who had been most compliant, and who had subscribed the bonds, were equally exposed to the rapacity of those barbarians, confirmed themselves still more in the resolution of refusing them. The voice of the nation was raised against this enormous outrage; and after two months free quarter, the highlanders were sent back to their hills, loaded with the spoils and execrations of the west.

The very persons who had been engaged to subscribe

(p) Mitchel was a fanatic, and had entertained a resolution of assassinating Sharpe, archbishop of St. Andrews, who, by his former apostasy and subsequent rigour, had rendered himself extremely odious to the covenanters. In 1668, Mitchel fired a pistol at the primate, as he was sitting in his coach; but the bishop of Orkney, stepping into the coach, happened to stretch out his arm, which intercepted the ball, and was much shattered by it. This happened in the principal street of the city; but so generally was the archbishop despised, that the assassin was allowed peaceably to walk off; and having turned a street or two, and thrown off a wig, which disguised him, he immediately appeared in public, and remained altogether unsuspected. Some years after, Sharpe remarked one, who seemed to eye him very eagerly; and being still anxious lest an attempt of assassination should be renewed, he ordered the man to be seized and examined. Two loaded pistols were found upon him; and as he was now concluded to be the author of the former attempt, Sharpe promised, that, if he would confess his guilt, he should be dismissed without any punishment. Mitchel was so credulous as to believe him; but was immediately produced before the council by the faithless primate. The council, having no proof against him, but hoping to involve the whole body of covenanters in this crime, solemnly renewed the promise of pardon, if he would make a full discovery; and it was a great disappointment to them, when they found, upon his confession, that only one person, who was now dead, had been acquainted with his intention. Mitchel was then carried before a court of judicature, and required to renew his confession; but being apprehensive lest, though a pardon for life had been promised him, other corporal punishment might still be inflicted, he refused compliance, and was sent back to prison. He was next examined before the council, under pretence of his being concerned in the insurrection at Pentland; and though no proof appeared against him, he was put to the question, and, contrary to every principle of equity, was urged to accuse himself. He endured the torture with resolution, and continued obstinate in the denial of a crime, of which he really was not guilty. Instead of obtaining his liberty, he was sent to the Bass, a very high rock, surrounded by the sea; at this time converted into a state prison, and full of the unhappy covenanters. He there remained in great misery, loaded with irons, till 1677, when it was resolved by some new examples to strike a fresh terror into the persecuted, but still obstinate enthusiasts. Mitchel was then brought before a court of judicature, and put upon his trial, for an attempt to assassinate an archbishop and a privy counsellor. His former confession was pleaded against him, and was proved by the testimony of the duke of Lauderdale, lord commissioner, lord Hatton his brother, the earl of Rothes, and the primate himself. Mitchel, besides maintaining that the privy council was no court of judicature, and that a confession before them was not judicial, asserted, that he had been engaged to make that confession by a solemn promise of pardon. The four privy counsellors denied upon oath that any such promise had ever been given. The prisoner then desired that the council-books might be produced in court; and even offered a copy of that day's proceedings to be read; but the privy counsellors maintained, that, after they had made oath, no farther proof could be admitted; and that the books of council contained the king's secrets, which were on no account to be divulged. They were not probably aware, when they swore, that the clerk, having engrossed the promise of pardon in the narrative of Mitchel's confession, the whole minute had been signed by the chancellor, and that the proofs of their perjury were by that means committed to record. Though the prisoner was condemned, Lauderdale was still inclined to pardon him; but the unrelenting primate rigorously insisted upon his execution; and said, that if assassins remained unpunished, his life must be exposed to perpetual danger. Mitchel was accordingly executed at Edinburgh in January, 1678. Such a complication of cruelty and treachery shews the character of those ministers to whom the king had, at this time, entrusted the government of Scotland.

the bonds, could find no security but by turning out such tenants as they suspected of an inclination to conventicles, and thereby depopulating their estates. To increase the misery of these unhappy farmers, the council enacted, that none should be received any where, or allowed a habitation, who brought not a certificate of his conformity from the parish minister. That the obstinate and refractory might not escape farther persecution, a new device was fallen upon. By the law of Scotland, any man, who should go before a magistrate, and swear that he thought himself in danger from another, might obtain a writ of law-burrows, as it is called; by which the latter was bound, under the penalty of imprisonment and outlawry, to find security for his good behaviour. The refusers of the bonds were summoned to appear before the council, and were required to bind themselves, under the penalty of two years' rent, neither to frequent conventicles themselves, nor allow their family and tenants to be present at those unlawful assemblies. It was an old law, but seldom executed, that a man, who was accused of any crime, and did not appear, in order to stand his trial, might be intercommuned, that is, he might be publicly outlawed; and whoever afterwards, either on account of business, relation, nay charity, had the least intercourse with him, was subjected to the same penalties as could by law be inflicted on the criminal himself. Several writs of intercommuning were now issued against the hearers and preachers in conventicles; and by this severe and even absurd law, crimes and guilt went on multiplying in a geometrical proportion.

Lest the cry of an oppressed people should reach the throne, the council forbade, under severe penalties, all noblemen or gentlemen of landed property to leave the kingdom: a severe edict, especially where the sovereign himself resided in a foreign country. Notwithstanding this act of council, Cassilis first, afterwards Hamilton and Tweddale, went to London, and laid their complaints before the king. These violent proceedings of Lauderdale were even praised by his majesty in a letter which he wrote to the privy council; and Burnet informs us, that Charles, after a full hearing of the debates concerning Scottish affairs, said, "I perceive, that Lauderdale has been guilty of many bad things against the people of Scotland; but I cannot find that he has acted any thing contrary to my interest."

The reign of Charles the Second presents the most amazing contrasts of levity and cruelty, of mirth and gloomy suspicion. Ever since the fatal league with France, the people had entertained violent jealousies against the court. The fears and discontents of the nation were vented without restraint; the apprehension of a popish successor, an abandoned court, and a parliament which, though sometimes assertors of liberty, yet continuing for seventeen years without change; these naturally rendered the minds of men timid and suspicious, and they only wanted objects on which to wreak their ill humour.

On the 12th of August, 1678, one Kirby, a chemist, accosted the king, as he was walking in the park: "Sir," said he, "keep within the company: your enemies have a design upon your life; and you may be shot in this very walk." Being asked the reason of these strange speeches, he said, that two men, called Grove and Pickering, had engaged to shoot the king, and sir George Wakeman, the queen's physician, to poison him. This intelligence, he added, had been communicated to him by doctor Tongue; whom, if permitted, he would introduce to his majesty (q). Dr. Tongue carried a bundle of papers to the king, which contained information of a plot, and were digested into forty-three articles. The king sent them to the treasurer, Danby, and ordered the two informers to lay the business before that minister. Tongue declared to Danby, that the papers had been secretly thrust under his door, and that, though he suspected, he did not certainly know, who was the author. After a few days, he told the treasurer, that the author of the intelligence had acknowledged the whole matter, but desired that his name might be concealed, lest the papists should murder him. The intelligence, however, was so vague and unsatisfactory, that the king concluded the whole was an imposture.

But Tongue was not to be repressed in the ardour of his loyalty: he next went to the treasurer, and told him, that a packet of letters, written by jesuits concerned in the plot, was that night to be put into the post-house for Windsor, directed to Bennifield, a jesuit, confessor to the duke. When this intelligence was conveyed to the king, he replied, that the packet mentioned had a few hours before been brought to the duke by Bennifield; who said, that he suspected some bad design upon him, that the letters seemed to contain matters of a dangerous import, and that he knew them not to be the hand-writing of the persons whose names were subscribed to them. This incident still further confirmed the king in his incredulity: but for the anxiety of the duke, who, hearing that priests and jesuits, and even his own confessor, had been accused, was desirous that a thorough inquiry should be made by the council into the pretended conspiracy, that their innocency might be proved. Kirby and Tongue were inquired after, and were now found to be living in close connection with Titus Oates, the person who was said to have conveyed the first intelligence to Tongue. Oates affirmed, that he had fallen under suspicion with the Jesuits; that he had received three blows with a stick, and a box on the ear from the provincial of that order, for revealing their conspiracy: and that, over-hearing them speak of their intentions to punish him more severely, he had withdrawn, and concealed himself (r). But he thought proper, before he was presented to the council, to go with his two companions to sir Edmundsbury Godfrey, a noted and active justice of peace, and to give evidence before him of all the articles of the conspiracy.

The wonderful intelligence, which Oates conveyed both to Godfrey and the council, and afterwards to the parliament, was to this purpose. The pope, he said, considered himself entitled to the possession of England and Ireland on account of the heresy of the prince and people, and had accordingly assumed the sovereignty of these kingdoms. This supreme power he had thought proper to delegate to the Jesuits; and de Oliva, general of that order, in consequence of the papal grant, had supplied all the chief offices, both civil and military. Lord Arundel was created chancellor; lord Powis, treasurer; sir William Godolphin, privy seal; Coleman, the duke's secretary, was made secretary of state; Langhorne, attorney-general; lord Bellasis, general of the papal army; lord Petre, lieutenant general; lord Stafford, pay-master; and inferior commissions, signed by the provincial of the Jesuits, were distributed all over England. All the dignities too of the church were filled, and many of them with Spaniards and other foreigners. The king, whom the Jesuits called the Black Bastard, was tried and condemned as a heretic; and a resolution taken to put him to death. Father le Shee (for this great plotter and informer called father la Chaise, the confessor of the French king) had consigned to London ten thousand pounds to be paid to any man who should merit it by this assassination. A Spanish provincial had expressed like liberality: the prior of the Benedictines was willing to go the length of six thousand: the Dominicans approved of the action; but pleaded poverty. Ten thousand pounds had been offered to sir George Wakeman, the queen's physician, who demanded fifteen thousand, as a reward for so great a service: his demand was complied with; and five thousand had been paid him in advance. Lest these means should fail, four Irish ruffians had been hired by the Jesuits, at the rate of twenty guineas a-piece, to stab the king at Windsor; and Coleman, secretary to the late duchess of York, had given the messenger, who carried them orders, a guinea to quicken his diligence. Grove and Pickering were also employed to shoot the king with silver bullets: the former was to receive the sum of fifteen hundred pounds; the latter, being a pious man, was to be rewarded with thirty thousand masses, which, estimating masses at a shilling a-piece, amounted to the like value. Pickering would have executed his purpose, had not the flint at one time dropped out of his pistol, at another time the priming. Coniers, the Jesuit, had bought a knife at the price of ten shillings, which he thought was not dear, considering the purpose

(q) Tongue was a divine of the church of England; a man active, restless, full of projects, void of understanding.

(r) This Titus Oates was an abandoned miscreant, obscure, illiterate, vulgar, and indigent. He had been once indicted for perjury, was afterwards chaplain on board a man of war, and dismissed for unnatural practices. He then professed himself a Roman Catholic, and crossed the sea to St. Omer's, where he was for some time maintained in the English seminary at that place. The fathers of that college sent him with some dispatches to Spain; but after his return, when they became better acquainted with his character, they would not suffer him to continue among them; so that he was obliged to return to London, where he was ready to encounter every danger for his support. But it appears strange, that at a time when he was supposed to have been entrusted with a secret involving the fate of kings and kingdoms, he should be suffered to remain in such a state of absolute necessity, that Kirby was obliged to supply him with the means for his daily subsistence.

for which he intended it, to wit, stabbing the king. Letters of subscription were circulated among the Catholics all over England to raise a sum for the same purpose. No less than fifty Jesuits had met in May last, at the White Horse tavern, where it was unanimously agreed to put the king to death; and Oates was employed to carry notes and letters from one to another, all tending to the same end, of murdering the king. A wager of a hundred pounds was laid, and stakes made, that the king should eat no more Christmas pies. In short, it was determined, to use the expression of a Jesuit, that if he would not become R. C. (Roman Catholic) he should no longer be C. R. (Charles Rex). The great fire of London had been the work of the Jesuits, who had employed eighty or eighty-six persons for that purpose, and had expended seven hundred fire-balls; but they had a good return for their money, for they had been able to pilfer goods from the fire to the amount of fourteen thousand pounds. A paper model was also framed for firing the city again: the stations were regularly marked out, where the several fires were to commence. Fire-balls were familiarly called among them Tewkesbury mustard pills; and were said to contain a notable biting sauce. Twenty thousand Catholics in London, were to rise in four-and-twenty hours or less; and Jennison, a Jesuit, said, that they might easily cut the throats of a hundred thousand Protestants. Coleman had remitted two hundred thousand pounds to promote the rebellion in Ireland; and the French king was to land a great army in that island. Poole, who wrote the Synopsis, was particularly marked out for assassination; as was also Dr. Stillingfleet, a controversial writer against the papists. Burnet tells us, that Oates paid him the same compliment. After all this havoc, the crown was to be offered to the duke, but on condition of his pardoning the incendiaries, and the murderers of his brother and of the people; and his consent to the extirpation of the Protestant religion. If he refuse these conditions, he himself was immediately to be poisoned or assassinated, "To pot James must go;" according to the expression ascribed by Oates to the Jesuits.

This abandoned wretch, Titus Oates, when examined before the council, betrayed his impostures in such a manner, as would have utterly discredited the most consistent story, and the most reputable evidence. While in Spain, he had been carried, he said, to don John, who promised great assistance to the execution of the Catholic designs. The king asked him, what sort of a man don John was: he answered, a tall lean man; directly contrary to the truth, as the king well knew. He totally mistook the situation of the Jesuits' college at Paris. Though he pretended great intimacies with Coleman, he knew him not, when placed very near him; and had no other excuse than that his sight was bad by candle-light. He fell into like mistakes with regard to Wakeman, the queen's physician.

Notwithstanding these objections, great attention was paid to Oates's evidence, and the plot became very soon the subject of conversation, and even the object of terror to the people. The violent animosity, which had been excited against the Catholics in general, made the public listen to the grossest absurdities when they accompanied an accusation of those religionists: and the more diabolical any contrivance appeared, the better it suited the tremendous idea entertained of a Jesuit. Danby likewise, who stood in opposition to the French and Catholic interest at court, was willing to encourage every story, which might serve to discredit that party. By his suggestion, when a warrant was signed for arresting Coleman, there was inserted a clause for seizing his papers; a circumstance attended with the most important consequences.

Coleman, partly on his own account, partly by orders from the duke, had been engaged in a correspondence with father la Chaise, with the pope's nuncio at Brussels, and with other Catholics abroad; and being himself a fiery zealot, busy and sanguine, the expressions in his letters often betrayed great violence and indiscretion. His correspondence, during the years 1674, and 1675, and part of 1676, was seized, and contained many extraordinary passages; but yet there was nothing in them which could serve as proof in the present information. But when the contents of these letters were publicly known, they diffused the panic, with which the nation began already to be seized on account of the popish plot. Indeed men reasoned more from their fears and passions than from the evidence before them. Thus Oates's plot and Coleman's supposed one in favour of the introduction of popery were universally confounded together; and the evidence of the latter being unquestionable, the belief of the former took possession of the people's minds.

There was danger, however, lest time might open the eyes of the public; when the murder of sir Edmundsbury Godfrey completed the general delusion, and rendered the prejudices of the nation absolutely incurable. This magistrate had been missing some days; and after much search, and many surmizes, his body was found lying in a ditch at Primrose Hill, near the Hampstead Road: the marks of strangling appeared about his neck, which was dislocated, and some contusions on his breast: his own sword was sticking in the body; but as no blood ensued on drawing it, it was concluded, that it had been thrust in some time after his death, and that he had not killed himself: he had rings on his fingers, and money in his pocket: it was therefore inferred, that he had not fallen into the hands of robbers. Without farther reasoning, it was inferred, that he had been assassinated by the papists, on account of his taking Oates's evidence. This clamour was quickly propagated, and met with universal belief. The panic spread itself on every side with infinite rapidity; and all men, astonished with fear, and animated with rage, saw in Godfrey's fate all the horrible designs ascribed to the Catholics; that no farther doubt remained of Oates's veracity. The voice of the nation united against that hated sect; and notwithstanding that the bloody conspiracy was supposed to be now detected, men could scarcely be persuaded that their lives were in safety.

In order still farther to propagate the popular frenzy, several artifices were employed. The dead body of Godfrey was carried into the city, attended by vast multitudes. It was publicly exposed in the streets, and viewed by all ranks of men. The funeral pomp was celebrated with great parade. The corpse was conducted through the chief streets of the city: seventy-two clergymen marched before: above a thousand persons of distinction followed after: and at the funeral-sermon, two able-bodied divines mounted the pulpit, and stood on each side of the preacher, lest, in paying the last duties to this unhappy magistrate, he should, before the whole people, be murdered by the papists. In this disposition of the nation, reason could not be heard; and even at present, the death of Godfrey remains, and must still continue, an impenetrable secret.

While the nation was in this ferment, the parliament was assembled, on the 21st of October, 1678. In his speech the king told them, that, though they had given money for disbanding the army (s), he had found Flanders so exposed, that he had thought it necessary still to keep them on foot, and doubted not but this measure would meet with their approbation. He informed them, that his revenue lay under great anticipations, and at best was never equal to the constant and necessary expence of government; as would appear from the state of it, which he intended to lay before them. He was anxious to keep the question of the popish plot from the parliament; but Danby, the prime minister, opened the matter in the house of peers the very first day of the session. The king was extremely displeased with this temerity, and told his minister, "Though you do not believe it, you will find, that you have given the parliament a handle to ruin yourself, as well as to disturb all my affairs; and you will surely live to repent it;" which actually came to pass. The cry of the plot was immediately echoed from one house to the other. An address was voted for a solemn fast: a form of prayer was contrived for that solemnity; and because the popish plot had been omitted in the first draught, it was carefully ordered to be inserted; lest omniscience should want intelligence (t).

In order to continue and propagate the alarm, addresses were voted for laying before the house such papers as might discover the horrible conspiracy; for the removal of popish recusants from London; for administering every where the oaths of allegiance and supremacy; for denying access at court to all unknown or suspicious persons; and for appointing the trainbands of London and Westminster to be in readiness. The lords Powis, Stafford, Arundel, Petre, and Bellasis, were committed to the Tower, and were soon after impeached for high treason. And both houses, after hearing Oates's evidence, voted, "That the lords and commons are of opinion, that there hath been, and still is, a damnable and hellish plot, contrived and carried on by the popish recusants, for assassinating the king, for subverting the government, and for rooting out and destroying the Protestant religion."

So vehement were the houses, that they sat every day, forenoon and afternoon, on the subject of the plot: for no other business could be attended to. A committee of lords was appointed to examine prisoners and witnesses: blank warrants were put into their hands, for the commitment of such as should be accused or suspected. Oates, who must, by his own account, be regarded as an infamous villain, was applauded, caressed, and called the saviour of the nation. He was recommended by the parliament to the king. He was lodged in Whitehall, protected by guards, and encouraged by a pension of one thousand two hundred pounds a-year.

The encouragement given to Oates brought forth new witnesses. William Bedloe, a man, if possible, more infamous than even Oates, appeared next upon the stage. He was of very low birth, had been noted for several cheats and even thefts, had travelled over many parts of Europe under borrowed names, and frequently passed himself for a man of quality, and had endeavoured, by a variety of contrivances, to prey upon the ignorant and unwary. When he appeared before the council, he gave intelligence of Godfrey's murder only, which, he said, had been perpetrated in Somerset House, where the queen lived, by papists, some of them servants in her family. He was questioned about the plot; but utterly denied all knowledge of it, and also asserted, that he had no acquaintance with Oates. Next day, when examined before the committee of lords, he bethought himself better, and was ready to give an ample account of the plot, which he found so anxiously inquired into. This narrative he made to tally, as well as he could, with that of Oates, which had been published: but that he might make himself acceptable by new matter, he added some other circumstances, and these still more tremendous and extraordinary. He said, that ten thousand men were to be landed from Flanders in Burlington Bay, and immediately to seize Hull: that Jersey and Guernsey were to be surprized by forces from Brest; and that a French fleet was, all last summer, hovering in the Channel for that purpose: that the lords Powis and Petre were to form an army in Radnorshire, to be joined by another army, consisting of twenty or thirty thousand religious men and pilgrims, who were to land at Milford Haven from St. Iago in Spain: that there were forty thousand men ready in London; besides those, who would, on the alarm, be posted at every alehouse door, in order to kill the soldiers, as they came out of their quarters: that lord Stafford, Coleman, and father Ireland, had money sufficient to defray the expences of all these armaments: that he himself was to receive four thousand pounds, as one that could murder a man; as also a commission from lord Bellasis, and a benediction from the pope: that the king was to be assassinated; all the Protestants massacred, who would not seriously be converted; the government offered to ONE, if he would consent to hold it of the church, but if he should refuse that condition, as was suspected, the supreme authority would be given to certain lords under the nomination of the pope. In a subsequent examination before the commons, Bedloe added that lord Carrington was also in the conspiracy for raising men and money against the government; as was likewise lord Brudenel. These noblemen, with all the other persons mentioned by Bedloe, were immediately committed to custody by the parliament.

These narrations carry their own refutation; the infamy of the witnesses, the contradiction in their testimony, the improbability of it, the low vulgarity of the information, unlike what men trusted with great affairs would be apt to form, all these serve to raise our horror against these base villains, and our pity at the delusion of the times that could credit such reports (u).

The king, though he scrupled not, wherever he could speak freely, to throw the highest ridicule on the plot, and on all who believed it; yet found it necessary to adopt the popular opinion before the parliament. A bill was introduced for a new test, in which popery was denominated idolatry; and all members, who refused this test, were excluded from both houses. The bill passed the commons without much opposition; but in the upper house the duke moved, that an exception might be admitted in his favour. With great earnestness, and even with tears in his eyes, he told them, that he was now to cast himself on their kindness, in the greatest concern which he could have in the world; and he protested, that whatever his religion might be, it should only be a private thing between God and his own soul, and never should appear in his public conduct. Notwithstanding this strong effort, in so important a point, he prevailed only by two voices; a sufficient indication of the general disposition of the people. "I would not have," said a noble peer, in the debate on this bill, "so much as a popish man or a popish woman to remain here; not so much as a popish dog or a popish bitch; not so much as a popish cat to pur or mew about the king." This was wretched eloquence, but it was admirably suited to the times, and therefore met with praise and approbation.

Encouraged by this general fury, the witnesses went still a step farther in their accusations; and though both Oates and Bedloe had often declared, that there was no other person of distinction, whom they knew to be concerned in the plot, they had now the audacity to accuse the queen herself of entering into the design against the life of her husband. The commons, in an address to the king, gave countenance to this scandalous accusation; but the lords would not be prevailed with to join in the address. The king, it was well known, bore no great affection to his consort; but Charles, notwithstanding all allurements of pleasure, or interest, or safety, had the generosity to protect his injured queen. "They think," said he, "I have a mind to a new wife; but for all that, I will not suffer an innocent woman to be abused." He immediately ordered Oates to be strictly confined, seized his papers, and dismissed his servants; but this daring informer's favour with the parliament soon procured his release.

While these things were in agitation, the parliament gave new attention to the militia. They passed a bill, by which it was enacted, that a regular militia should be kept in arms, during six weeks of the year, and a third part of them do duty every fortnight of that time. But Charles refused his assent to the bill, and told the parliament, that he would not, were it for half an hour, part so far with the power of the sword: but if they would contrive any other bill for ordering the militia, and still leave it in his power to assemble or dismiss them as he thought proper, he would willingly give it the royal assent. The commons, dissatisfied with this negative, immediately voted that all the new-levied forces should be disbanded. They passed a bill, granting money for that purpose; but, besides appropriating the money by the strictest clauses, they ordered it to be paid not into the exchequer, but into the chamber of London. The lords demurred with regard to so extraordinary a clause, which threw a violent reflection on the king's ministers, and even on himself; and by that means the act remained in suspence.

During the present ferment, Montague, the king's ambassador at Paris, had procured a seat in the lower house; and without obtaining the king's leave, he suddenly came over to England. Charles, suspecting his intention, ordered his papers to be seized; but Montague, who foresaw this measure, had taken care to secrete one paper, which he immediately laid before the house of commons. It was a letter from the treasurer Danby written in the beginning of the year, during the negociations at Nimeguen for the general peace. Montague was there directed to make a demand of money from France; or in other words, the king was willing secretly to sell his good offices to Louis, contrary to the general interests of the confederates, and even to those of his own kingdoms (v). Danby was so unwilling to engage in this negociation, that the king, to (u) In order to support the panic among the people, especially among the citizens of London, a pamphlet was published with this title, "A Narrative and Impartial Discovery of the horrid Popish Plot, carried on for burning and destroying the Cities of London and Westminster with their Suburbs; setting forth the several Consults, Orders, and Resolutions of the Jesuits, concerning the same: By Captain William Bedloe, lately engaged in that horrid Design, and one of the Popish Committee for carrying on such Fires." Every fire, which had happened for several years past, is in this pamphlet ascribed to the machinations of the Jesuits, who purposed, as Bedloe said, by such attempts, to find an opportunity for the general massacre of the Protestants; and in the mean time, were well pleased to enrich themselves by pilfering goods from the fire.

(v) The letter, among other particulars, contains these words: in case the conditions of peace shall be accepted, the king expects to have six millions of livres a-year for three years, from the time that this agreement shall be signed between his majesty and the king of France; because it will probably be two or three years before the parliament will be in humour to give him any supplies after the making of any peace with France; and the ambassador here has always agreed to that sum; but not for so long a time."

satisfy him, subjoined with his own hand these words: "This letter is writ by my order, C. R." Montague, who revealed this secret correspondence, had even the baseness to sell his treachery at a high price to the French monarch. The commons were inflamed with this intelligence against Danby; and concluded, that the king had all along acted in concert with the French court; and that every step, which he had taken in conjunction with the allies, had been illusory and deceitful. Desirous of getting to the bottom of so important a secret, and being pushed by Danby's numerous enemies, they immediately voted an impeachment of high treason against that minister, and sent up six articles to the house of peers. Danby made a very able defence, and the house of peers plainly saw, that Danby's crime fell not under the statute of Edward III.; and though the words, treason and traiterously, had been carefully inserted in several articles, this appellation could not change the nature of things, or subject him to the penalties annexed to that crime. They refused, therefore, to commit Danby upon this irregular charge: the commons insisted on their demand; and a great contest was likely to arise, when the king thought proper to prorogue the parliament. This prorogation was soon after followed by a dissolution, on the 30th of December, 1678; a desperate remedy in the present disposition of the nation (w).

During the sitting of the parliament, and after its prorogation and dissolution, the trials of the pretended criminals were carried on; and the courts of judicature, places which ought to be kept pure from injustice, were strongly infected with party-rage, and bigoted prejudice. Edward Coleman, the most hated of the conspirators, was first brought to trial. His letters were produced against him. They contained much indiscretion; but they proved nothing criminal, much less treasonable, against him. Oates and Bedloe deposed, that he had received a commission, signed by the superior of the Jesuits, to be papal secretary of state, and had consented to the poisoning, shooting, and stabbing of the king: he had even, according to Oates's deposition, advanced a guinea to promote those bloody purposes. These wild stories were confounded with the projects contained in his letters; and Coleman received sentence of death. The sentence was executed upon him on the 3rd of December. He suffered with calmness and constancy, and to the last persisted in the strongest protestations of his innocence.

Coleman's trial was succeeded by that of father Ireland, who, it is pretended, had signed, together with fifty Jesuits, the great resolution of murdering the king. Grove and Pickering, who had undertaken to shoot him, were tried at the same time. The only witnesses against the prisoners were still Oates and Bedloe. Ireland affirmed, that he was in Staffordshire all the month of August, a time when Oates asserted he was in London. Ireland proved his assertion by good evidence, and would have proved it by undoubted, had he not, most iniquitously, been denied the liberty of sending for witnesses. All these men, before their arraignment, were condemned in the opinion of the judges, jury, and spectators; and to be a Jesuit, or even a Catholic, was of itself a sufficient proof of guilt. The chief justice, sir William Scroggs, gave sanction to all the narrow prejudices of the populace. Instead of being counsel for the prisoners, as his office required, he pleaded the cause against them, brow-beat their witnesses, and represented their guilt as certain and uncontroverted. And when the jury brought in their verdict against the prisoners, he said, "You have done, gentlemen, like very good subjects, and very good Christians, that is to say, like very good Protestants: and now much good may their thirty thousand masses do them:" Alluding to the masses by which Pickering was to be rewarded for murdering the king. All these unhappy men went to execution, on the 14th of January, 1679, protesting their innocence; a circumstance which made no impression on the spectators.

Although Bedloe had given information of Godfrey's murder, he still remained a single evidence against the persons accused; and all the allurements of profit and honour had not hitherto tempted any one to confirm the testimony of that informer. At last, means were found to complete the legal evidence. One Miles Prance, a silversmith, and a Catholic, had been accused by Bedloe of being an accomplice in the murder; and upon his denial had been thrown into prison, loaded with heavy irons, and confined to the condemned hole, a place cold, dark, and full of nastiness. Shaftesbury and Buckingham, in examining the prisoners, usually employed threatenings and promises, rigour and indulgence, and every art, under pretence of extorting the truth from them. Prance, being promised a pardon upon making a confession, had not courage to resist, but confessed himself an accomplice in Godfrey's murder. Being asked concerning the plot, he also thought proper to be acquainted with it, and conveyed some intelligence to the council (x). All the information which he gave with regard to the plot, as well as to the murder of Godfrey, Prance solemnly retracted, both before the king and the secret committee: but being again thrown into prison, he was induced, by new terrors and new sufferings, to confirm his first information, and was now produced as a sufficient evidence. The murder, he said, was committed in Somerset House, by the contrivance of Gerrard and Kelly, two Irish priests. That Lawrence Hill, footman to the queen's treasurer, Robert Green, cushion keeper to her chapel, and Henry Berry, porter of the palace, followed sir Edmundsbury Godfrey at a distance from ten in the morning till seven in the evening; but that passing by Somerset House, Green throwing a twisted handkerchief over his head, he was soon strangled, and the body carried to a high chamber in Somerset House, from whence it was carried to another apartment, where it was seen by Bedloe. Hill, Green, and Berry were tried upon this evidence; and though Bedloe's narrative and Prance's information were totally irreconcilable, the prisoners were condemned and executed, on the 21st and and 28th of February, 1679. They all denied their guilt at their execution; and as Berry died a Protestant, this circumstance was regarded as very considerable: but, instead of its giving some check to the general credulity of the people, men were only surprized, that a Protestant could be induced at his death to persist in so manifest a falsehood.

As the army could neither be kept up, nor disbanded, without money, the king, how little hopes soever he could entertain of more compliance, found himself obliged to summon a new parliament. The blood, already shed on account of the popish plot, instead of satiating the people, served only to increase their fury; and each conviction of a criminal was hitherto regarded as a new proof of the horrible designs of the papists (y). Religion, liberty, property, even the lives of men were now supposed to be at stake; and no security, it was thought, except in a vigilant parliament, could be found against the impious and bloody conspirators. All the zealots of the former parliament were re-chosen: new ones were added: the Presbyterians, in particular, being transported with the most inveterate antipathy against popery, were active and successful in the elections. That party, it is said, first began at this time the abuse of splitting their freeholds, in order to multiply votes and electors; and it was concluded, that the new representatives would exceed the old in their opposition to the court, and furious persecution of the Catholics. The king was alarmed, when he perceived such a dreadful tempest arise from such unaccountable beginnings. His life, if Oates and Bedloe's information were true, had been aimed at by the Catholics: even the duke's was said to be in danger. Men gave credit to the informers, so far as concerned the guilt of the Catholics: but they still retained their old suspicions, that these religionists were secretly

(w) Thus came to a period a parliament, which had sitten during the whole course of this reign, one year excepted. Its conclusion was very different from its commencement. Being elected during the joy and festivity of the restoration, it consisted almost entirely of royalists; who were disposed to support the crown by all the liberality which the habits of that age would permit. Alarmed by the alliance with France, they gradually withdrew their confidence from the king; and finding him still to persevere in a foreign interest, they proceeded to discover symptoms of the most refractory and jealous disposition. The popish plot pushed them beyond all bounds of moderation, and before their dissolution they seemed to be treading fast in the footsteps of the last long parliament, on whose conduct they threw at first such violent blame. In all their variations, they still followed the opinions and prejudices of the nation; and ever seemed to be more governed by humour and party-views than by public interest, and more by public interest than by any corrupt or private influence.

(x) Among other absurd circumstances, he said that one Le Fevre bought a second-hand sword of him; because he knew not, as he said, what times were at hand: and Prance expressing some concern for poor tradesmen, if such times came, Le Fevre replied, that it would be better for tradesmen, if the Catholic religion were restored: and particularly, that there would be more church work for silversmiths.

(y) This election is perhaps the first in England, which, since the commencement of the monarchy, had been carried on by a violent contest between the parties, and where the court interested itself, in a high degree, in the choice of the national representatives. But all its efforts were fruitless, in opposition to the torrent of prejudices which prevailed.

cretly favoured by the king, and had obtained the most complete ascendency over his brother. Charles had too much penetration not to see the danger, to which the succession, and even his own crown and dignity, now stood exposed. At length he was roused from his lethargy; and without quitting in appearance his usual facility of temper, he collected an industry, firmness, and vigilance, of which he was supposed to be altogether incapable. One chief step, which the king took, towards gratifying and appeasing his people and parliament, was, desiring the duke to withdraw beyond sea, that no farther suspicion might remain of the influence of popish counsels. The duke readily complied; but first required an order for that purpose, signed by the king; lest his absenting himself should be interpreted as a proof of fear or guilt. He also desired, that his brother should satisfy him, as well as the public, by a declaration of the illegitimacy of the duke of Monmouth (z). The duke, being gratified in so reasonable a request, willingly complied with the king's desire, and retired to Brussels.

But Charles soon found, that, notwithstanding his endeavours to comply with the wishes of the people, he could by no means obtain the confidence of his parliament. The refractory humour of the lower house appeared in the first step which they took upon their assembling, on the 6th of March. It had ever been usual for the commons, in the election of their speaker, to consult the inclinations of the king; and even the long parliament in 1641 had not thought proper to depart from so established a custom. The king now desired that the choice should fall on sir Thomas Meres: but Seymour, speaker to the last parliament, was instantly called to the chair, by a vote which seemed unanimous. The king, when Seymour was presented to him for his approbation, rejected him, and ordered the commons to proceed to a new choice. A great flame was excited. The commons maintained, that the king's approbation was merely a matter of form, and that he could not, without giving a reason, reject the speaker chosen. The king declared, that, since he had the power of rejecting, he might, if he pleased, keep the reason in his own breast. As the question had never before been started, it might seem difficult to find principles, upon which it could be decided (a). By way of compromise, it was agreed to set aside both candidates. Gregory, a lawyer was chosen; and the election was ratified by the king (b).

Seymour was deemed a great enemy to Danby; and it was the influence of that nobleman, as commonly supposed, which had engaged the king to enter into this ill-timed controversy with the commons. The impeachment, therefore, of Danby was, on that account, the sooner revived; and the commons maintained, that, notwithstanding the intervening dissolution, every part of that proceeding stood in the same condition in which it had been left by the last parliament. The king had had the precaution to grant a pardon to Danby; and, in order to screen the chancellor from all attacks by the commons, he had taken the great seal into his own hands, and had himself affixed it to the parchment. He told the parliament, that, as Danby had acted in every thing by his orders, he was in no respect criminal; that his pardon, however, he would insist upon; and if it should be found anywise defective in form, he would renew it again and again, till it should be rendered entirely complete: but that he was resolved to deprive him of all employments, and to remove him from court.

The commons, however pretended, that no pardon of the crown could be pleaded in bar of an impeachment by the commons: and although the prerogative of mercy had hitherto been understood to be altogether unlimited in the king; yet it was not unsuitable to the genius of a limited monarchy, where the king's ministers are supposed to be for ever accountable to national assemblies, even for such abuses of power as they may commit even by orders from their master. The commons insisted on the impeachment of Danby. The peers departed from their former scruples, and ordered Danby to be taken into custody. Danby absconded. The commons passed a bill, appointing him to surrender himself before a certain day, or, in default of it, attainting him. A bill had passed the upper house, mitigating the penalty to banishment; but, after some conferences, the peers thought proper to yield to the violence of the commons; and the bill of attainder was carried. Rather than undergo such severe penalties, Danby appeared, and was immediately committed to the Tower.

While a Protestant nobleman met with such violent prosecution, it was not likely that the Catholics would be overlooked by the zealous commons. The credit of the popish plot still stood upon the oaths of a few infamous witnesses. The commons voted, that, if the king should come to an untimely end, they would revenge his death upon the Papists. They promised rewards to new discoverers; not considering the danger, which they incurred, of granting bribes to perjury. They made Bedloe a present of five hundred pounds; and particularly recommended the care of his safety to the duke of Monmouth. The peers gave power to their committees to send for and examine such as would maintain the innocence of those who had been condemned for the plot. A pamphlet having been published to discredit the informers, and to vindicate the Catholic lords in the Tower, these lords were required to discover the author, and thereby to expose their own advocate to prosecution. And both houses concurred in renewing the former vote, that the Papists had undoubtedly entered into a horrid and treasonable conspiracy against the king, the state, and the Protestant religion.

Sir William Temple had lately been recalled from his foreign employments; and the king, who, after the removal of Danby, had no one with whom he could so much as discourse with freedom on public affairs, was resolved, upon Coventry's dismission, to make him one of his secretaries of state. But as that philosophical patriot could not well refuse the confidence with which his master honoured him, he resolved to employ it to the public service while he continued in office, but determined to relinquish his post so soon as he could do it with a tolerable grace. He represented to the king, that, as the jealousies of the nation were extreme, it was necessary to cure them by some new remedy, and to restore that mutual confidence, so requisite for the safety both of the king and the people: that to refuse every thing to the parliament in their present disposition, or to yield every thing, was equally dangerous to the constitution, as well as to public tranquillity: that if the king would introduce into his counsels such men only as enjoyed the confidence of his people, fewer concessions would probably be required; or if unreasonable demands were made, the king, under the sanction of such counsellors, might be enabled, with the greater safety, to refuse them: and that the heads of the popular party, being gratified with the king's favour, would probably abate of that violence by which they endeavoured at present to pay court to the multitude.

The king, now brought to his senses, assented to the reasons of this excellent and valuable minister; and, in concert with sir William Temple, he laid the plan of a new privy-council, without whose advice he declared himself determined for the future to take no measure of importance. This council was to consist of thirty persons, and was never to exceed that number. Fifteen of the chief officers of the crown were to be continued, who, it was supposed, would adhere to the king, and, in case of any extremity,

(z) James duke of Monmouth was the king's natural son by Lucy Walters, and born about ten years before the restoration. He possessed all the qualities which could engage the affections of the populace; a distinguished valour, an affable address, a thoughtless generosity, a graceful person. He rose still higher in the public favour, by reason of the universal hatred to which the duke, on account of his religion, was exposed. Monmouth's capacity was mean; his temper pliant: so that, notwithstanding his great popularity, he had never been dangerous, had he not implicitly resigned himself to the guidance of Shaftesbury, a man of such a restless temper, such subtle wit, and such abandoned principles. That daring politician had flattered Monmouth with the hopes of succeeding to the crown. The story of a contract of marriage, passed between the king and Monmouth's mother, and secretly kept in a certain black box, had been industriously spread abroad, and was greedily received by the multitude. As the horrors of popery still pressed harder on them, they might be induced, either to adopt that fiction, as they had already done many others more incredible, or to commit open violation on the right of succession. And it would not be difficult, it was hoped, to persuade the king, who was extremely fond of his son, to give him the preference above a brother, who, by his imprudent bigotry, had involved him in such inextricable difficulties. But Charles, in order to cut off all such expectations, as well as to remove the duke's apprehensions, took care, in full council, to make a declaration of Monmouth's illegitimacy, and to deny all promise of marriage with his mother.

(a) In 1566, the speaker said to Queen Elizabeth, that without her allowance the election of the house was of no significance. D'Ewes's Journal, p. 97. In the parliament 1592, 1593, the speaker, who was sir Edward Coke, advances a like position. D'Ewes, p. 459. Townshend, p. 35. So that this pretension of the commons seems to have been somewhat new; like many other powers and privileges.

(b) It has ever since been understood, that the choice of the speaker lies in the house; but that the king retains the power of rejecting any person disagreeable to him.

oppose the exorbitancies of faction. The other half of the council was to be composed, either of men of character, detached from the court, or of those who possessed chief credit in both houses. And the king, in filling up the names of his new council, was highly gratified to find that the members, in land and offices, possessed to the amount of three hundred thousand pounds a-year; a sum nearly equal to the whole property of the house of commons, against whose violence the new council was intended as a barrier to the throne (c).

This experiment was tried, and seemed at first to give some satisfaction to the public. The earl of Essex, a nobleman of the popular party, son of that lord Capel who had been beheaded a little after the late king, was created treasurer in the room of Danby: the earl of Sunderland, a man of intrigue and capacity, was made secretary of state: viscount Halifax, a fine genius, possessed of learning, eloquence, industry, but subject to inquietude, and fond of refinements, was admitted into the council. These three, together with sir William Temple, who often joined them, though he kept himself more detached from public business, formed a kind of cabinet council, from which all affairs received their first digestion. The earl of Shaftesbury was made president of the council, contrary to the advice of Temple, who foretold the consequence of admitting a man of so dangerous a character into any part of the administration of public affairs.

As Temple foresaw, it happened. Shaftesbury, finding that he possessed no more than the appearance of court favour, was resolved still to adhere to the popular party, by whose attachment he enjoyed an undisputed superiority in the lower house, and possessed great influence in the other. The very appearance of court favour, empty as it was, tended to render him still more dangerous. His partizans, observing the progress which he had already made, hoped that he would soon acquire the entire ascendant; and he constantly flattered them, that if they persisted in their purpose, the king, from indolence, and necessity, and fondness for the duke of Monmouth, would at last be induced, even at the expence of his brother's right, to make them every concession they desired.

Besides, the antipathy to popery, as well as jealousy of the king and duke, had taken too deep root in the minds of all men, to be removed by so feeble a remedy as this new council projected by Temple. The commons, soon after the establishment of that council, proceeded so far as to vote unanimously, "That the duke of York's being a papist, and the hopes of his coming to the crown, had given the highest countenance to the present conspiracies and designs of the papists against the king and the protestant religion." It was expected that a bill for excluding him the throne would soon be brought in. To prevent this bold measure, the king concerted some limitations, which he proposed to the parliament. The limitations projected were of the utmost importance, and deprived the successor of the chief branches of royalty. A method was there pointed out, by which the nation, on every new reign, could be ensured of having a parliament, which the king should not, for a certain time, have it in his power to dissolve. In case of a popish successor, the prince was to forfeit the right of conferring any ecclesiastical preferments: no member of the privy council, no judge of the common law or in chancery, was to be put in or displaced but by consent of parliament; and the same precaution was extended to the military part of the government; to the lord lieutenants and deputy lieutenants of the counties, and to all officers of the navy. The chancellor added, "It is hard to invent another restraint; considering how much the revenue will depend upon the consent of parliament, and how impossible it is to raise money without such consent. But yet, if any thing else can occur to the wisdom of parliament, which may farther secure religion and liberty against a popish successor, without defeating the right of succession itself, his majesty will readily consent to it (d)."

Notwithstanding these concessions made by the king, the parliament thought fit to reject them, and a bill was brought in for the total exclusion of the duke from the crown of England and Ireland. It was there declared, that the sovereignty of these kingdoms, upon the king's death or resignation, should devolve to the person next in succession after the duke; that all acts of royalty which that prince should afterwards perform, should not only be void, but be deemed treason; that if he even entered any of these dominions, he should be deemed guilty of the same offence; and that all who supported his title should be punished as rebels and traitors. This important bill, which implied banishment as well as exclusion, passed the lower house by a majority of seventy-nine.

In the commons the country party, during all the last parliament, had much exclaimed against the bribery and corruption of the members; and the same reproach had been renewed against the present parliament. When an inquiry was made, sir Stephen Fox, who was the paymaster, confessed that nine members received pensions to the amount of three thousand four hundred pounds; but by the secret committee, eight more pensioners were discovered. A sum also, about twelve thousand pounds, had been occasionally given or lent to others. The commons brought in a bill, which was twice read, excluding from the lower house all who possessed any lucrative office. So far we think the house of commons did right; for we cannot entertain the idea, that the people can be fairly or properly represented by persons who possess lucrative places under the crown.

The standing army and the king's guards were by the commons voted to be illegal: a new pretension, it must be confessed; but necessary for the full security of liberty and a limited constitution.

As arbitrary imprisonment is a grievance which, in some degree, has place in almost every government, except in that of Great Britain; so we owe our absolute security from it chiefly to the present parliament. The Magna Charta had laid the foundation of this valuable part of liberty; the Petition of Right had renewed and extended it; but some provisions were still wanting to render it complete, and hinder all evasion or delay from ministers and judges. The act of habeas corpus, which passed this session, served these purposes (e).

The king's revenue lay under great debts and anticipations: those branches of it which were granted in 1669 and 1670 were ready to expire: and the fleet was represented by the king as in great decay and disorder. To these distresses of the crown, the commons trusted chiefly for passing the exclusion-bill, and for punishing and displacing all the ministers who were disagreeable to them. They were therefore in no haste to relieve the king; and grew only the more assuming on account of his complaints and uneasiness. Jealous, however, of the army, they granted the sum of two hundred and six thousand pounds, which had been voted for disbanding it by the last parliament; though the vote, by reason of the subsequent prorogation and dissolution, had not been carried into an act. This money was appropriated by very strict clauses.

The impeachment of the five popish lords in the Tower, with that of the earl of Danby, was carried on with vigour. The power of this minister, and his credit with the king, rendered him extremely hateful to the popular leaders; and the commons hoped that he would be obliged, in order to justify his own conduct, to lay open the whole intrigue of the French alliance, which they suspected to contain a secret of the most dangerous nature. The king, apprehensive of the same consequences, employed his whole interest to support the validity of that pardon which had been granted him. The lords appointed a day for the examination of the question, and agreed to hear coun-

(c) The names of the persons who composed the present council were, Prince Rupert; the archbishop of Canterbury; lord Finch, chancellor; earl of Shaftesbury, president; earl of Anglesea, privy-seal; duke of Albemarle; duke of Monmouth; duke of Newcastle; duke of Lauderdale; duke of Ormond; marquis of Winchester, marquis of Worcester; earl of Arlington; earl of Salisbury; earl of Bridgwater; earl of Sunderland; earl of Essex; earl of Bath; viscount Falconberg; viscount Halifax; bishop of London; lord Roberts; lord Hollis, lord Russel; lord Cavendish; secretary Coventry; sir Francis North, chief justice; sir Henry Capel; sir John Ernley; sir Thomas Chicheley; sir William Temple; Edward Seymour; and Henry Powle.

(d) We may remark, that, when these limitations were first laid before the council, Shaftesbury and Temple were the only members who argued against them.

(e) By this act it was prohibited to send any one to a prison beyond sea. No judge, under severe penalties, must refuse to any prisoner a writ of habeas corpus, by which the gaoler was directed to produce in court the body of the prisoner (whence the writ had its name), and to certify the cause of his detainer and imprisonment. If the gaol lie within twenty miles of the judge, the writ must be obeyed in three days; and so proportionably for greater distances: every prisoner must be indicted the first term after his commitment, and brought to trial in the subsequent term. And no man, after being enlarged by order of court, can be recommitted for the same offence. This law seems necessary for the protection of liberty; and as it has not place in any other form of government, this consideration alone may induce us to prefer our present constitution to all others.

sel on both sides: but the commons would not submit their pretensions to the discussion of argument and inquiry. They voted, that "whoever should presume, without their leave, to maintain before the house of peers the validity of Danby's pardon, should be accounted a betrayer of the liberties of the English commons." And they made a demand, that the bishops, whom they knew to be devoted to the court, should be removed, not only when the trial of the earl should commence, but also when the validity of his pardon should be discussed.

The bishops before the reformation had always enjoyed a seat in parliament; but so far were they in former times from regarding that dignity as a privilege, that they affected rather to form a separate order in the state, independent of the civil magistrate, and accountable only to the pope and to their own order. By the constitutions, however, of Clarendon, enacted during the reign of Henry II. they were obliged to give their presence in parliament; but as the canon law prohibited them from assisting in capital trials, they were in such cases obliged to absent themselves. This practice became afterwards a rule; and on the earl of Strafford's trial, the bishops, who would gladly have attended, and who were no longer bound by the canon law, were yet obliged to withdraw. It had been usual for them to enter a protest, asserting their right to sit; and this protest, being considered as a mere form, was always admitted and disregarded. But in the present case was started a new question of no small importance. The commons insisted that the bishops had no more title to vote in the question of the earl's pardon than in the impeachment itself. The bishops asserted that the pardon was merely a preliminary; and that, neither by the canon law nor by the practice of parliament, were they ever obliged, in capital cases, to withdraw till the very commencement of the trial itself. If their absence was considered as a privilege, it depended on their own choice, how far they would insist upon it. If regarded as a diminution of their right of peerage, such unfavourable customs ought never to be extended beyond the very circumstance established by them; and all arguments, from a pretended parity of reason, were in that case of little or no authority.

The house of lords were so much influenced by these reasons, that they admitted the bishops' right to vote, when the validity of the pardon should be examined. The commons insisted on their withdrawing; and thus a quarrel being commenced between the two houses, the king began to entertain thoughts of laying hold of so favourable a pretence, and of finishing the session by a prorogation of parliament. While in this disposition, he was alarmed with sudden intelligence, that the house of commons was preparing a remonstrance, in order to inflame the nation still farther upon the favourite topics of the plot and of popery. He hastened, therefore, to execute his intention, on the 27th of May, even without consulting his new council, by whose advice he had promised to regulate his whole conduct. And thus were disappointed all the projects of the malcontents, who were enraged at this vigorous measure of the king. Shaftesbury publicly threatened that he would have the head of whoever had advised it. The parliament was dissolved on the 10th of July, and writs were issued for a new parliament.

Even during the recess of parliament, there was no interruption to the prosecution of the catholics accused of the plot: the king found himself obliged to give way to this popular fury. Whitebread, provincial of the Jesuits, Fenwick, Gaven, Turner, and Harcourt, all of them of the same order, were first brought to their trial. Besides Oates and Bedloe, one Dugdale (f), a new witness, appeared against the prisoners. Among other things Dugdale asserted, that two hundred thousand papists in England were ready to take arms. The prisoners proved, by sixteen witnesses from St. Omers, students, and most of them young men of family, that Oates was in that seminary at the time when he swore that he was in London: but as they were catholics, and disciples of the Jesuits, their testimony was totally disregarded. Even the reception which they met with in court was full of outrage and mockery. One of them saying that Oates always continued at St. Omers, if he could believe his senses; "You papists," said the chief justice, "are taught not to believe your senses." Oates, however, in opposition to the students of St. Omers, found means to bring evidence of his having been at that time in London: but this evidence, though it had, at that time, the appearance of some solidity, was afterwards discovered, (when Oates himself was tried for perjury,) to be altogether deceitful. In order farther to discredit that witness, the Jesuits proved that he had perjured himself in father Ireland's trial, whom they shewed to have been in Staffordshire at the time when Oates swore that he was committing treason in London. But these pleas availed them nothing: the Jesuits received sentence of death; and were executed, persisting to the last in protestations of their innocence.

The next trial was that of Langhorne, an eminent lawyer, by whom all the concerns of the Jesuits were managed. Oates and Bedloe swore, that all the papal commissions by which the chief offices in England were filled with catholics, passed through his hands. He was in course found guilty, and when verdict was given against the prisoner, the spectators expressed their savage joy by loud acclamations (g).

Thus far had these despicable informers proceeded with success: their accusation was hitherto equivalent to a sentence of death. The first check indeed which they received was on the trial of sir George Wakeman, the queen's physician, whom they accused of an intention to poison the king. It was a strong circumstance in favour of Wakeman, that Oates, in his first information before the council, had accused him only upon hearsay; and when asked by the chancellor, whether he had any thing farther to charge him with? he added, "God forbid I should say any thing against sir George: for I know nothing more against him." On the trial he gave positive evidence of the prisoner's guilt. There were many other circumstances which favoured Wakeman; particularly that which would have involved the queen, whom no one, even during the highest prejudices of the times, could sincerely believe guilty. The chief justice himself, who had hitherto favoured the witnesses, exaggerated the plot, and railed against the prisoners, was now considerably mollified, and gave a favourable charge to the jury. Whereupon Oates and Bedloe had the audacity to attack him to his face, and to accuse him of partiality before the council. The whole party, who had formerly much extolled his conduct, now loaded him with execrations. Wakeman's acquittal was indeed a sensible mortification to the prosecutors of the plot, and fixed an indelible stain upon their favourite witnesses. But sir George, after he recovered his liberty, thought it prudent to retire beyond sea; and his flight was interpreted as a proof of guilt, by those who were still resolved to persist in the belief of the conspiracy which had been propagated by such wretched miscreants.

The discontents in England, and the disposition of the parliament, drew the attention of the Scottish covenanters, and gave them a prospect of some time putting an end to those oppressions, under which they had so long laboured. It was the policy of the earl of Lauderdale and his associates to push these unhappy men to extremities, and force them into rebellion, with a view of reaping profit from the forfeitures and attainders which would naturally ensue upon it. But the covenanters, aware of this nefarious policy, had hitherto forborne all acts of hostility; and that tyrannical minister had failed of his purpose. An incident at last happened, which brought on an insurrection in that country.

The covenanters were greatly enraged against Sharpe, the primate, whom they experienced to be an unrelenting persecutor of all those who dissented from the established worship. He had an officer under him, one Carmichael, no less zealous than himself against conventicles, and who by his violent prosecutions had rendered himself extremely hateful to those religionists. A company of these had waylaid him on the road near St. Andrews, with an intention, if not of killing him, at least of chastizing him so severely as would afterwards render him more cautious in persecuting the non-conformists (h). While looking out for their prey, they were surprized at seeing the arch-

(f) This man had been steward to lord Aston, and, though poor, possessed a character somewhat more reputable than the other two: but his account of the intended massacres and assassinations was equally monstrous and incredible.

(g) So high indeed had the popular rage mounted, that the witnesses for this unhappy man, on approaching the court, were almost torn in pieces by the rabble: one in particular was bruised to such a degree as to put his life in danger: and another, a woman, declared that, unless the court could afford her protection, she durst not give evidence: but as the judges could go no farther than promise to punish such as should do her any injury, the prisoner himself had the humanity to wave her testimony.

bishop's coach pass by, on the 3rd of May; and they immediately interpreted this incident as a declaration of the secret purpose of providence against him. But when they observed that almost all his servants, by some accident, were absent, they no longer doubted, but Heaven had here delivered their capital enemy into their hands. Without farther deliberation, they fell upon him; dragged him from his coach; tore him from the arms of his daughter, who interposed with cries and tears; and piercing him with redoubled wounds, left him dead on the spot, and immediately dispersed.

This action served the ministry as a pretence for a more violent persecution against the religionists, on whom, without distinction, they threw the guilt of those furious assassins. The officers, quartered in the west, received more strict orders to find out and disperse all conventicles; and for that reason the covenanters, instead of meeting in small bodies, celebrated their worship in numerous assemblies, and brought arms for their security. At Rutherglen, a small borough near Glasgow, they openly set forth a declaration against prelacy; and in the market-place burned several acts of parliament and acts of council, which had established that mode of ecclesiastical government, and had prohibited conventicles. For this insult on the supreme authority, they chose the 29th of May, the anniversary of the restoration; and previously extinguished the bonfires which had been kindled for that solemnity.

Captain Graham, afterwards viscount Dundee, an active and enterprizing officer, attacked a great conventicle upon Loudon-hill, and was repulsed with the loss of thirty men. The covenanters, finding that they were now involved in guilt, were engaged to persevere, and to seek, from their valour, for that indemnity, which the severity of the government left them no hopes of being able otherwise to obtain. They pushed on to Glasgow; and though at first repulsed, they afterwards made themselves masters of that city; dispossessed the established clergy; and issued proclamations, in which they declared that they fought against the king's supremacy, against popery and prelacy, and against a popish successor.

The king immediately dispatched thither the duke of Monmouth with a small body of English cavalry. That nobleman joined to these troops the Scottish guards, and some regiments of militia, levied from the well-affected counties; and with great celerity marched in quest of the rebels. They had taken post near Bothwel-castle, between Hamilton and Glasgow; where there was no access to them but over a bridge, which a small body was able to defend against the king's forces. They shewed judgement in the choice of their post; but discovered neither judgement nor valour in any other step of their conduct. No nobility and few gentry had joined them: the clergy were in reality the generals; and the whole army never exceeded eight thousand men. Monmouth attacked the bridge, on the 22nd of June; and the body of rebels, who defended it, maintained their post as long as their ammunition lasted. When they sent for more, they received orders to quit their ground, and to retire backwards. This imprudent measure occasioned an immediate defeat to the covenanters. Monmouth passed the bridge without opposition, and drew up his forces opposite to the enemy. His cannon alone put them to rout. About seven hundred were slain, twelve hundred were taken prisoners; and were treated by Monmouth with a humanity which they had never experienced in their own countrymen. Such of them as would promise to live peaceably were dismissed. About three hundred, who were so obstinate as to refuse this easy condition, were shipped for Barbadoes; but unfortunately perished in the voyage. Two of their clergy only were hanged. Through the humanity of Monmouth, an act of indemnity was granted; but Lauderdale took care that it should be so worded as rather to afford protection to himself and his associates, than to the unhappy covenanters. And though orders were given to connive thenceforwards at all conventicles, he found means, under a variety of pretences, to elude the execution of them.

The king, observing that the whole nation concurred at first in the belief and prosecution of the popish plot, had for his own safety pretended an entire belief in that famous absurdity, and by this artifice he had eluded the violent and irresistible torrent of the people. When a little time and recollection, as well as the execution of the pretended conspirators, had somewhat moderated the general fury, he was now enabled to form a considerable party, devoted to the interests of the crown, and determined to oppose the pretensions of the malcontents.

Though the king, after his restoration, had endeavoured to abolish the distinction of parties, and had chosen his ministers from among all denominations; no sooner had he lost his popularity, and exposed himself to jealousy, than he found it necessary to court the old cavalier party, and to promise them full compensation for that neglect of which they had hitherto complained. The present emergency made it still more necessary for him to apply for their support; and there were many circumstances, which determined them, at this time, to fly to the assistance of the crown, and to the protection of the royal family. But though his union with the political royalists brought great accession of force to the king, he derived no less support from the confederacy, which he had, at this time, the address to form with the church of England. He represented to the ecclesiastics the great number of presbyterians and other sectaries, who had entered into the popular party; and he persuaded them that the old scheme for the abolition of prelacy as well as of monarchy was revived, and that the same miseries and oppressions awaited them, to which, during the civil wars, they had so long been exposed. The cry against popery indeed was loud; but it proceeded less from religious than from party zeal, in those who propagated, and even in those who adopted it. The king too was happy in his amiable manners, and popular address. Far from being distant, stately, or reserved, he had not a grain of pride or vanity; but was a most affable and well-bred man. He treated his subjects therefore like gentlemen, not like vassals or boors.

The general affection borne the king appeared signally about this time. He fell sick at Windsor; and had two or three fits of a fever, and his life was thought in danger. A general consternation seized all ranks of men, increased by the apprehensions entertained of his successor. The malcontents, it was feared, would proceed to extremities, and immediately kindle a civil war in the nation. In the present dilemma, the king's chief counsellors, Essex, Halifax, and Sunderland, advised him to send secretly for the duke, that, in case of any accident, that prince might be ready to assert his right against the opposition which he was likely to meet with. When the duke arrived, he found his brother out of danger; and it was agreed to conceal the invitation which he had received. His journey, however, was attended with important consequences. He prevailed on the king to disgrace Monmouth, on the 2nd of September, 1679, whose projects were now known and avowed; to deprive him of his command in the army; and to send him beyond sea. The duke of York returned to Brussels; but made only a short stay in that place. He obtained leave to retire to Scotland, under pretence of quieting the apprehensions of the English nation; but in reality with a view of securing that kingdom in his interests.

Although Essex and Halifax had concurred in the resolution of inviting over the duke, they soon discovered that they had not obtained his confidence, and that even the king, while he made use of their service, had no sincere regard for their persons. Essex in disgust resigned the treasury: Halifax retired to his country seat: Temple, despairing of any accommodation among such enraged parties, withdrew almost entirely to his books and his gardens. The king, who changed ministers as well as measures with great indifference, bestowed at this time the chief confidence on Hyde, Sunderland, and Godolphin. Hyde succeeded Essex in the treasury.

Every one of the king's ministers, as well as himself, were greatly averse to the meeting of the new parliament, which they expected to find as refractory as any of the preceding. The elections had gone mostly in favour of the country party. The terrors of the plot had still a mighty influence over the populace; and the apprehensions of the duke's bigoted principles and arbitrary character weighed with men of sense and reflection. The king therefore resolved to prorogue the parliament, in which measure he did not expect the concurrence of his council (i). Many of the counsel in disgust threw up their offices about this time; particularly lord Russel, the most popular man in the nation, as well from the mildness and integrity of his character, as from his zealous attachment to the religion and liberties of his country. The earl of Shaftesbury, who was, in most particulars of an opposite character, was removed by the king from the office of president of the council; and the earl of Radnor, a man who possessed whimsical talents and splenetic virtues, succeeded to his post.

(i) It is remarkable, that, though the king had made profession never to embrace any measure without the advice of these counsellors, he had often broken that resolution, and had, in affairs of the greatest consequence controlled their opinion.

It was the favour and countenance of the parliament, which had chiefly encouraged the rumour of plots; but the nation had gotten so much into that vein of credulity, and every necessitous villain was so much incited by the success of Titus Oates and captain Bedloe, that, even during the prorogation, the people were not allowed to remain in tranquillity. There was one Dangerfield, a fellow who had been burned in the hand for crimes, transported, whipped, pilloried four times, fined for cheats, outlawed for felony, convicted of coining, and exposed to all the public infamy which the laws could inflict on the basest and most shameful enormities. The credulity of the people, and the humour of the times, enabled even this wretch to become a person of consequence. He was the author of a new incident, called the Meal-tub Plot, from the place where some papers, relating to it, were said to have been found. In the contrivance of this plot, it appears, that Dangerfield, under pretence of betraying the conspiracies of the presbyterians, had been countenanced by some catholics of condition, and had even been admitted to the duke of York's presence and the king's: and that, under pretence of revealing new popish plots, he had obtained access to Shaftesbury and some of the popular leaders. Which side he intended to cheat, is uncertain; or whether he did not rather mean to cheat both: but he soon found that the belief of the nation was more open to a popish than a presbyterian plot; and he resolved to fall in with the prevailing humour. Though no weight could be laid on his testimony, by reason of his infamous character, great clamour was raised; as if the court, by way of retaliation, had intended to load the presbyterians with the guilt of a false conspiracy. It must be confessed that the present period, by the prevalence and suspicion of such mean and ignoble arts on all sides, throws a great stain on the British annals.

One of the most innocent artifices, practised by party men at this time, was the additional ceremony, pomp, and expence, with which a pope-burning was celebrated in London, on the 17th of November. The spectacle served to entertain, and amuse, and inflame, the populace. The duke of Monmouth likewise came over without leave, and made a triumphant procession through many parts of the kingdom, extremely caressed and admired by the people. All these arts seemed requisite to support the general prejudices, during the long interval of parliament. Great endeavours were also used to obtain the king's consent for the meeting of that assembly. Seventeen peers presented a petition to this purpose, in the beginning of 1680. Many of the corporations imitated the example. Notwithstanding several marks of displeasure, and even a menacing proclamation from the king, petitions came from all parts, earnestly insisting on a session of parliament (k).

This kind of petitioning was one of the chief artifices by which the malcontents in the reign of Charles the First had attacked the crown. As the king found no law, by which he could punish those importunate, and, as he deemed them, undutiful solicitations, he attempted to encounter them by popular applications of a contrary tendency. Wherever the church and court party prevailed, addresses were framed, containing expressions of the highest regard to his majesty, the most entire acquiescence in his wisdom, the most dutiful submission to his prerogative, and the deepest abhorrence of those who endeavoured to encroach upon it, by prescribing to him any time for assembling the parliament (l).

Charles used every art to encourage his partizans, and to reconcile the people to his government. He affected great zeal against popery. He even allowed several priests to be put to death, for no other crime than their having received orders in the Romish church. It is singular, that one of them, named Evans, was playing at tennis, when the warrant for his immediate execution was notified to him: he swore, that he would play out his set first. Charles, with the same view of acquiring popularity, formed an alliance with Spain, and also offered an alliance to Holland: but the Dutch, terrified with the great power of France, and seeing little resource in a country so distracted as England, declined acceptance. He had sent for the duke of York from Scotland, but desired him to return, when the time of assembling the parliament began to approach.

The sheriffs of London by their office return the juries: it had been usual for the mayor to nominate one sheriff by drinking to him; and the common-hall had ever without dispute confirmed the mayor's choice. Sir Robert Clayton, the mayor, appointed one who was not acceptable to the popular party: the common-hall rejected him; and Bethel and Cornish, two independents and republicans, and of consequence deeply engaged with the malcontents, were chosen by a majority of voices. In spite of all remonstrances and opposition, the citizens persisted in their choice; and the court party was obliged to acquiesce. Juries, however, were not so partial in the city, but that reason and justice, even when the popish plot was in question, could sometimes prevail. The earl of Castlemaine, husband to the duchess of Cleveland, was acquitted on the 23rd of June, though accused by Oates and Dangerfield of an intention to assassinate the king. Sir Thomas Gascoigne, a very aged gentleman in the north, had been accused by two servants, whom he had dismissed for dishonesty, received a like verdict. These trials were great blows to the plot, which now began to stagger, in the judgement of most men, except those who were entirely devoted to the country party. But in order still to keep alive the zeal against popery, the earl of Shaftesbury appeared in Westminster Hall, attended by the earl of Huntingdon, the lords Russel, Cavendish, Gray, Brandon, sir Henry Caverly, sir Gilbert Gerrard, sir William Cooper, and other persons of distinction, and presented to the grand jury of Middlesex reasons for indicting the duke of York as a popish recusant. While the jury were deliberating on this extraordinary presentment, the chief justice sent for them, and suddenly dismissed them. Shaftesbury however obtained the end for which he had undertaken this bold measure; by such daring conduct he gave his followers assurance, that he was determined not to desert their cause; and he engaged them to a like devoted perseverance in all the measures which he should suggest to them.

The king therefore resolved, at last, after a long interval, to assemble the parliament; which met on the 21st of October, 1680. In his speech, he told them that the several prorogations which he had made, had been very advantageous to his neighbours, and very useful to himself: that the farther examination of the popish plot and the punishment of the criminals were requisite for the safety both of king and kingdom; and after recommending to them the necessity of providing, by some supplies, for the safety of Tangiers, he made use of a number of mollifying expressions, which, however, had no influence with the commons. They voted that it was the undoubted right of the subject to petition the king for the calling and sitting of parliament. Not content with this decision, they fell with the utmost violence on all those abhorrers, who, in their addresses to the crown, had expressed their disapprobation of those petitions. For this offence, they expelled sir Thomas Withens. They appointed a committee for farther inquiry into such members as had been guilty of a like crime; and complaints were lodged against lord Paston, sir Robert Maleverer, sir Bryan Stapleton, Taylor, and Turner. They addressed the king against sir George Jefferies, recorder of London, for his activity in the same cause; and they frightened him into a resignation of his office, in which he was succeeded by sir George Treby, a great leader of the popular party. They voted an impeachment against North, chief justice of the common pleas, for drawing the proclamation against tumultuous petitions; but upon examination found the proclamation so cautiously worded, that it afforded them no handle against him. A petition had been presented to the king from Taunton. "How dare you deliver me such a paper?" said the king to the person who presented it. "Sir," replied (k) It may be remarked, that the danger of popery, and the terrors of the plot, were never forgotten in any of these addresses.

(l) Thus the nation came to be distinguished into petitioners and abhorrers. The very names, by which each party denominated its antagonist, discover the virulence and rancour which prevailed. For besides petitioner and abhorrer, the year 1680 is remarkable for being the epoch of the well-known epithets of WHIG and TORY, by which, and sometimes without any material difference, this island has been so long divided. The Whigs were so denominated from a cant name given to the four Scotch conventiclers, (Whig being milk turned sour.) The Tories were denominated from the Irish banditti so called, whose usual method of bidding people deliver, was by the Irish word Toree, which signifies Give me. And after this manner, these foolish terms of reproach came into public and general use; and even at present seem not nearer their end than when they were first invented.

plied he, "my name is DARE." For this saucy reply, but under other pretences, he had been tried, fined, and committed to prison. The commons now addressed the king for his liberty, and for remitting his fine. Some printers also and authors of seditious libels they took under their protection.

Great numbers of the abhorrers, from all parts of England, were seized by order of the commons, and committed to custody. The liberty of the subject, which had been so carefully guarded by the great charter, and by the late law of habeas corpus, was every day violated by their capricious commitments. At last, the vigour and courage of one Stowel of Exeter, an abhorrer, put an end to the practice. He refused to obey the serjeant at arms, stood upon his defence, and said, that he knew of no law by which they pretended to commit him. The house, finding it equally dangerous to proceed or to recede, got off by an evasion: they inserted in their votes, that Stowel was indisposed, and that a month's time was allowed him for the recovery of his health.

But the principal violence of the house of commons appeared in all their transactions with regard to the plot, which they prosecuted with the same zeal and credulity as their predecessors. They renewed their former vote, which affirmed the reality of the horrid popish plot; and, in order the more to terrify the people, they even asserted that, notwithstanding the discovery, the plot still subsisted. They expelled sir Robert Can, and sir Robert Yeomans, who had been complained of, for saying that there was no popish, but there was a Presbyterian, plot. And they greatly lamented the death of Bedloe, whom they called a material witness, and on whose testimony they much depended (m). The commons endeavoured to remove the infamy with which Dangerfield was loaded, and to restore him to the capacity of being an evidence. The whole tribe of informers they applauded and rewarded: Jennison, Turberville, Dugdale, Smith, la Faria, appeared before them; and their testimony, however frivolous or absurd, met with a favourable reception: the king was applied to in their behalf for pensions and pardons: their narratives were printed with that sanction which arose from the approbation of the house; and Dr. Tongue was recommended for the first considerable church preferment which should become vacant.

But the principal reasons, which still supported the clamour of the popish plot, were the apprehensions entertained by the people of the duke of York, and the resolution, embraced by their leaders, of excluding him from the throne. The earl of Shaftesbury and many considerable men of the party, had rendered themselves irreconcilable with him, and could find their safety no way but in his ruin. Monmouth's friends hoped that the exclusion of that prince would make way for their patron. The resentment against the duke's apostacy, the love of liberty, the zeal for religion, the attachment to faction, all these motives incited the country party. Though the king had withdrawn his countenance from Monmouth, he was known secretly to retain a great affection for him; and as his beloved mistress, the duchess of Portsmouth, had been engaged to unite herself with the popular party; this incident was regarded as a favourable prognostic of their success. Sunderland, secretary of state, who had linked his interest with that of the duchess, had concurred in the same measure. But besides friendship for his brother and a regard to the right of succession, there were many strong reasons which had determined Charles to persevere in opposing the exclusion. So much indeed were the popular leaders determined to carry matters to extremities, that in less than a week after the commencement of the session, a motion was made for bringing in an exclusion-bill, and a committee was appointed for that purpose. This bill differed in nothing from the former, but in two articles, which showed still an increase of zeal in the commons (n).

The debates were carried on with great violence on both sides. The bill was defended by sir William Jones, who had now resigned his office of attorney-general, by lord Russel, by sir Francis Winnington, sir Harry Capel, sir William Pulteney, by colonel Titus, Treby, Hambden, Montague. It was opposed by sir Leoline Jenkins, secretary of state, sir John Ernley, chancellor of the exchequer, by Hyde, Seymour, Temple. Many arguments were used both for and against the exclusion bill. In the house of commons, the reasoning of the exclusionists appeared very convincing; and the bill passed by a great majority. It was in the house of peers that the king expected to oppose it with success. The court party was there so prevalent, that it was carried only by a majority of two to pay so much regard to the bill as even to commit it. When it came to be debated, on the 15th of November, the contest was violent. Shaftesbury, Sunderland, and Essex, argued for it: Halifax chiefly conducted the debate against it, and displayed an extent of capacity, and a force of eloquence, which had never been surpassed in that assembly; and the bill was thrown out by a considerable majority. All the bishops, except three, voted against it. Besides the influence of the court over them; the church of England, they pretended, was in greater danger from the prevalence of Presbyterianism than of popery, which, though favoured by the duke, and even by the king, was extremely repugnant to the genius of the nation.

The commons upon this disappointment immediately voted an address for the removal of Halifax from the king's councils and presence for ever. When the king applied for money to enable him to maintain Tangiers, instead of complying, they voted such an address as was in reality a remonstrance, and one little less violent than that famous remonstrance, which ushered in the civil wars. All the abuses of government, from the beginning almost of the reign, are there insisted on; the Dutch war, the alliance with France, the prorogations and dissolutions of parliament; and as all these measures, as well as the damnable and hellish plot, are there ascribed to the machinations of papists, it was plainly insinuated that the king had, all along, lain under the influence of that party, and was in reality the chief conspirator against the religion and liberties of the country.

The commons, though they conducted the great business of the exclusion with extreme violence, had yet much reason for the jealousy which gave rise to it: but their vehement prosecution of the popish plot, even after so long an interval, discovers such a spirit, either of credulity or injustice, as admits of no apology. The impeachment of the catholic lords in the Tower was revived; and as viscount Stafford, from his age, infirmities, and narrow capacity, was deemed the least capable of defending himself, it was determined to make him the first victim, that his condemnation might pave the way for a sentence against the rest. The chancellor, now created earl of Nottingham, was appointed high steward for conducting the trial, on the 30th of November. Three witnesses were produced against the prisoner; Oates, Dugdale, and Turberville. Oates swore, that he saw Fenwic, the Jesuit, deliver to Stafford, a commission signed by de Oliva, general of the Jesuits, appointing him pay-master to the papal army, which was to be levied for the subduing of England: for this ridiculous imposture still maintained its credit with the commons. Dugdale gave testimony, that the prisoner, at Tixal, a seat of lord Aston's, had endeavoured to engage him in the design of murdering the king; and had promised him, besides the honour of being sainted by the church, a reward of five hundred pounds for that service. Turberville deposed, that the prisoner, in his own house at Paris, had made him a like proposal (o). It was sworn by Dugdale, that Stafford had assisted in a great consult of the Catholics held at Tixal; but Stafford proved by undoubted testimony, that at the time assigned he was in Bath, and in that neighbourhood. Stafford likewise proved, by the evidence of his gentleman and his page, that Turberville had never, either at Paris or at London, been seen in his company; and it might justly appear strange, that a person

(m) Captain Bedloe had been seized with a fever at Bristol; had sent for chief justice North; confirmed all his former evidence, except that with regard to the duke and the queen; and desired North to apply to the king for some money to relieve him in his necessities. A few days after, he expired; and the whole party triumphed extremely in these circumstances of his death: as if the perseverance of one profligate could outweigh the last words of so many men, guilty of no crime but that of popery.

(n) The bill was to be read to the people twice a-year in all the churches of the kingdom, and every one who should support the duke's title was rendered incapable of receiving a pardon but by act of parliament.

(o) To offer money for murdering a king, without laying down any scheme by which the assassin may insure some probability or possibility of escape, is so incredible in itself, and may so easily be maintained by any prostitute evidence, that an accusation of that nature, not accompanied with circumstances, ought not to have been attended to by any court of judicature. This miscreant Turberville had served as a noviciate among the Dominicans; but having deserted the convent, he had enlisted as a trooper in the French army; and being dismissed that service, he now lived in London, abandoned by all his relations, and exposed to great poverty.

person, who had so important a secret in his keeping, was so long entirely neglected by him. The clamour and outrage of the populace, during the trial, were extreme: great abilities and eloquence were displayed by the managers, sir William Jones, sir Francis Winnington, and serjeant Maynard: yet did the prisoner, under all these disadvantages, make a better defence than was expected, either by his friends or his enemies: the unequal contest in which he was engaged, was a plentiful source of compassion to every mind, seasoned with humanity. He entirely overthrew the testimony of the witnesses employed against him; and with a simplicity and tenderness more persuasive than the greatest oratory, he made protestations of his innocence, and could not forbear, every moment, expressing the most lively surprize and indignation at the audacious impúdence of those suborned against him. The peers, after a solemn trial of six days, by a majority of twenty-four voices, gave sentence against him. He received, however, with resignation the fatal verdict. "God's holy name be praised," was the only exclamation which he uttered. When the high-steward told him that the peers would intercede with the king for remitting the more cruel and ignominious parts of the sentence, hanging and quartering, he burst into tears: but he told the lords that he was moved to this weakness, by his sense of their goodness, not by any terror of that fate which he was doomed to suffer (p).

In the interval between the sentence and execution, many efforts were made to shake the resolution of the infirm and aged prisoner, and to bring him to a confession of the treason for which he was condemned; but they were unable to extort any thing from him which they could possibly turn against him. Stafford now prepared himself for death with the intrepidity which became his birth and station, and which was the natural result of the innocence and integrity which, during the course of a long life, he had ever maintained: his mind seemed even to collect new force from the violence and oppression under which he laboured. When going to execution, on the 29th of December, 1680, he called for a cloak to defend him against the rigour of the season: "Perhaps," said he, "I may shake with cold; but, I trust in God, not for fear." On the scaffold, he continued, with reiterated and earnest asseverations, to make protestations of his innocence: all his fervour was exercised on that point: when he mentioned the witnesses, whose perjuries had bereaved him of life, his expressions were full of mildness and of charity. He solemnly disavowed all those immoral principles, which over-zealous Protestants had ascribed without distinction to the church of Rome: and he hoped, he said, that the time was now approaching, when the present delusion would be dissipated; and when the force of truth, though late, would engage the whole world to make reparation to his injured honour (q).

The earl of Stafford's execution gratified the prejudices of the country party; but it did not contribute to their power and security: on the contrary, it tended to increase that disbelief of the whole plot, which began now to prevail. The commons resolved to make both friends and enemies sensible of their power. They passed a bill for easing the protestant dissenters, and for repealing the persecuting statute of the thirty-fifth of Elizabeth: this laudable bill was likewise carried through the house of peers. The chief justice was become hateful for dismissing the grand jury in an irregular manner, and thereby disappointing that bold measure of Shaftesbury and his friends, who had presented the duke of York as a recusant. For this crime the commons sent up an impeachment against him; as also against Jones and Weston, two of the judges, who, in some speeches from the bench, had given to many of the first reformers the appellation of fanatics.

In rejecting the exclusion-bill, the king had sheltered himself behind the authority of the house of peers; and the commons were deprived of the usual pretence, to attack the sovereign himself, under colour of attacking his ministers and counsellors. In prosecution of the scheme, which he had formed, of blaming the commons in case of a rupture, he warned them in a speech, that a neglect of this opportunity would never be retrieved, and added, "I did promise you the fullest satisfaction, which your hearts could wish, for the security of the Protestant religion, and to concur with you in any remedies, which might consist with preserving the succession of the crown in its due and legal course of descent. I do again with the same reservations, renew the same promises to you: and being thus ready on my part to do all that can reasonably be expected from me, I should be glad to know from you, as soon as may be, how far I shall be assisted by you, and what it is you desire from me."

The commons, however, still hoped, from the king's urgent necessities, that he would throw himself wholly into their hands; by which means they might render themselves absolute masters of the government. The commons besides insisting still on the exclusion, brought in bills of an important, and some of them of an alarming nature: one to renew the trennial act, which had been so inadvertently repealed in the beginning of the reign: a second to make the office of judge during good behaviour: a third to declare the levying of money without consent of parliament to be high treason: a fourth to order an association for the safety of his majesty's person, for the defence of the Protestant religion, for the preservation of the Protestant subjects against all invasions and opposition whatever, and for preventing the duke of York or any Papist from succeeding to the crown.

The commons also voted, that whoever had advised his majesty to refuse the exclusion-bill, were promoters of popery and enemies to the king and kingdom. In another vote, they named the marquis of Worcester, the earls of Clarendon, Feversham, and Halifax, Laurence Hyde, and Edward Seymour, as those dangerous enemies; and requested his majesty to remove them from his person and councils for ever: they voted that, till the exclusion-bill were passed, they could not, consistent with the trust reposed in them, grant the king any manner of supply (r).

The king, fearful of the commons in their present temper, came secretly to a resolution of proroguing them. They got intelligence about a quarter of an hour before the black rod came to their door, on the 10th of January, 1681. Not to lose such precious time, they passed some extraordinary resolutions. They voted, that whosoever advised his majesty to prorogue this parliament to any other purpose than in order to pass the bill of exclusion, was a betrayer of the king, of the Protestant religion, and of the kingdom of England; a promoter of the French interest, and a pensioner of France: That thanks be given to the city of London for their manifest loyalty, and for their care and vigilance in the preservation of the king and of the Protestant religion: That it is the opinion of this house, that that city was burned in the year 1666 by the Papists, designing thereby to introduce arbitrary power and popery into the kingdom: That humble application be made to his majesty for restoring the duke of Monmouth to all his offices and commands, from which, it appears to the house

(p) It is remarkable that, after Charles, as is usual in such cases, had remitted to Stafford the hanging and quartering, the two sheriffs, Bethel and Cornish, indulging their own republican humour, and complying with the prevalent spirit of their party, ever jealous of monarchy, started a doubt with regard to the king's power of exercising even this small degree of lenity. "Since he cannot pardon the whole," said they, "how can he have power to remit any part of the sentence?" They proposed the doubt to both houses: the peers pronounced it superfluous; and even the commons, apprehensive lest a question of this nature might make way for Stafford's escape, gave this singular answer: "This house is content, that the sheriffs do execute William late viscount Stafford by severing his head from his body only." Nothing can be a stronger proof of the fury of the times, than that lord Russel, notwithstanding the virtue and humanity of his character, seconded in the house this barbarous scruple of the sheriffs.

(q) It is worthy of remark, that the populace, who had exulted at Stafford's trial and condemnation, were now melted into tears at the sight of that tender fortitude which shone forth in each feature, and motion, and accent of this aged noble. Their profound silence was only interrupted by sighs and groans: with difficulty they found speech to assent to those protestations of innocence, which he frequently repeated: "We believe you, my lord! God bless you, my lord!" These expressions with a faultering accent flowed from them. The executioner himself was touched with sympathy. Twice he lifted up the ax, with an intent to strike the fatal blow; and twice he let the destructive instrument drop from his trembling hand. A deep sigh was heard to accompany his last effort, which laid Stafford for ever at rest. All the spectators seemed to feel the blow. And when the head was held up to them with the usual cry, "This is the head of a traitor," no clamour of assent was uttered. Pity, remorse, and astonishment, had taken possession of every heart, and displayed itself in lively colours on the countenances of every bystander.

This was the last blood which was shed on account of the popish plot: an incident which, for the credit of the nation, it were better to bury in eternal oblivion; but which it is necessary to perpetuate, as well to maintain the truth of history, as to warn, if possible, their posterity and all mankind never again to fall into so shameful, and so barbarous a delusion!

(r) Lest he should be enabled, by any other expedient, to support the government, and preserve himself independent, they passed another vote, in which they declared that whoever should hereafter lend, by way of advance, any money upon those branches of the king's revenue, arising from customs, excise, or hearth-money, should be judged a hinderer of the sitting of parliament, and be responsible for the same in parliament.

he had been removed by the influence of the duke of York: and that it is the opinion of the house that the prosecution of the Protestant dissenters upon the penal laws is at this time grievous to the subject, a weakening of the Protestant interest, an encouragement of popery, and dangerous to the peace of the nation.

Charles passed some laws of no great importance; but the bill for repealing the thirty-fifth of Elizabeth, he privately ordered the clerk of the crown not to present to him. This artifice implied some timidity in the king. The last votes of the commons seemed to be an attempt of forming an association against the crown, after they found that the king would not assent to their association bill: the dissenting interest, the city, and the duke of Monmouth, they endeavoured to connect with the country party. A civil war indeed never appeared so likely as at present; and the king dissolved the parliament. Soon after, he summoned another; but the country party had established their interest so strongly in all the electing boroughs, that he could not hope for any disposition more favourable in the new parliament. The new parliament was summoned to meet at Oxford; for the king was apprehensive of danger if they met at Westminster (s). Monmouth with fifteen peers presented a petition against assembling the parliament at Oxford, "where the two houses," they said, "could not be in safety; but would be easily exposed to the swords of the papists and their adherents, of whom too many had creeped into his majesty's guards." These insinuations, which pointed so evidently at the king himself, were not calculated to persuade him, but to inflame the minds of the populace.

The leaders came to the parliament, attended not only by their servants, but by numerous bands of their partizans. The four city members in particular were followed by great multitudes, wearing ribbons, in which were woven these words, "No popery! no slavery!" The king had his guards regularly mustered: his party likewise endeavoured to make a show of their strength: and on the whole, the parliament at Oxford bore the appearance of a tumultuous assembly.

The king, on the 21st of March, addressed himself to the present parliament in a more authoritative manner than he had been accustomed to; and said that, as he would never use arbitrary government himself, neither would he ever suffer it in others. He now afforded them, he added, another opportunity of providing for the public safety. But notwithstanding the magisterial air of the king's speech, the commons were not in the least overawed. They consisted almost entirely of the same members; they chose the same speaker; and instantly fell into the same measures, the impeachment of Danby, the repeal of the persecuting statute of Elizabeth, the inquiry into the popish plot, and the bill of exclusion. So violent were they on this last article, that no other expedient, however plausible, could so much as be hearkened to. The past disappointments of the country party, and the opposition made by the court, had only rendered them more united, more haughty, and more determined. No method but their own, of excluding the duke, could give them satisfaction in the present state of affairs.

There was one Fitz-harris, an Irish Catholic, who had insinuated himself into the duchess of Portsmouth's acquaintance, and had been very busy in conveying to her, intelligence of a libel written by the country party, or of any designs entertained against her or the court. For services of this kind he had received from the king a present of two hundred and fifty pounds. This man met with one Everard, a Scotchman, a spy of the exclusionists, and an informer concerning the popish plot; who engaged him to write a libel against the king, the duke, and the whole administration. Everard, who was well pleased to have the merit of a discovery with his patrons, resolved to betray his friend: he posted sir William Waller, a justice of the peace, and two persons more, behind the hangings, and gave them an opportunity of seeing and hearing the whole transaction. The libel, sketched out by Fitz-harris, and executed partly by him, partly by Everard, was the most furious, indecent, and outrageous performance imaginable; and such as was calculated to hurt rather than serve any party, which should be so imprudent as to adopt it. Waller carried the intelligence to the king, and obtained a warrant for committing Fitz-harris, who happened, at that very time, to have a copy of the libel in his pocket. Finding himself now delivered over to the law, he resolved to pay court to the popular party, who were alone able to protect him. He affirmed, that he had been employed by the court to write the libel, in order to throw the odium of it on the exclusionists. The intention of the ministers, he said, was to send about copies to all the heads of the country party; and the moment they received them, they were to be arrested, and a conspiracy to be imputed to them. That he might merit favour by still more important intelligence, he commenced a discoverer of the great popish plot; and he failed not to confirm all the tremendous circumstances insisted on by his predecessors (t)

The commons, finding that Fitz-harris was willing to accuse the duke, were not ashamed to adopt his evidence, and resolved to save him from the destruction with which he was at present threatened. The king had removed him from the city-prison, where he was exposed to be tampered with by the exclusionists; and sent him to the Tower; and had ordered him to be prosecuted by an indictment at common law. In order to prevent his trial and execution, an impeachment was voted by the commons against him, and sent up to the lords. That they might shew the greater contempt of the court, they ordered, by way of derision, that the impeachment should be carried up by secretary Jenkins; who was so provoked by the intended affront, that he at first refused obedience; though afterwards, being threatened with commitment, he was induced to comply. The lords voted to remit the affair to the ordinary courts of justice, before whom, as the attorney-general informed them, it was already determined to try Fitz-harris. The commons maintained, that the peers were obliged to receive every impeachment from the commons; and this indeed seems to have been the first instance of their refusal: they therefore voted, that the lords, in rejecting their impeachment, had denied justice, and had violated the constitution of parliament. Great heats were likely to ensue; and as the king saw no appearance of any better temper in the commons, he proceeded to a dissolution of the parliament.

In consequence of this dissolution, party spirit ran extremely high, and the king and the parliament were equally afraid lest the other should enter upon some forcible means. Both parties therefore hurried from Oxford; and in an instant, that city, so crowded and so busy, was left in its usual emptiness and peace.

The court party gathered force from the dispersion and astonishment of their antagonists, and adhered more firmly to the king, whose resolutions, they now saw, could be depended on. The violences of the exclusionists were exclaimed against and aggravated; and even the reality of the plot was openly called in question. The clergy especially were busy in this great revolution; and being moved, partly by their own fears, partly by the insinuations of the court, they represented all their antagonists as sectaries and republicans, and rejoiced in escaping those perils, which they believed to have been hanging over them. Principles the most opposite to civil liberty were every where inforced from the pulpit, and adopted in numerous addresses; where the king was flattered in his present measures, and congratulated on his escape from parliaments.

The first step, taken by the court, was the trial of Fitz-harris. Doubts were raised by the jury with regard to their power of trying him, after the concluding vote of the commons: but the judges took upon them to decide the question in the affirmative; and the jury were obliged to proceed. The writing of the libel was clearly proved upon Fitz-harris: the only question was with regard to his intentions. He asserted, that he was a spy of the court, and (s) The city of London showed how just a judgement he had formed of their dispositions. Besides re-electing the same members, they voted thanks to them for their former behaviour, in endeavouring to discover the depth of the horrid and hellish popish plot, and to exclude the duke of York, the principal cause of the ruin and misery impending over the nation.

(t) He said, that the second Dutch war was entered into with a view of extirpating the Protestant religion, both abroad and at home; that father Parry, a Jesuit, on the disappointment by the peace, told him, that the Catholics resolved to murder the king, and had even engaged the queen in that design; that the envoy of Modena offered him ten thousand pounds to kill the king, and upon his refusal the envoy said, that the duchess of Mazarine, who was as expert at poisoning as her sister, the countess of Soissons, would, with a little phial, execute that design; that upon the king's death the army in Flanders was to come over, and massacre the Protestants; that money was raised in Italy for recruits and supplies, and there should be no more parliaments; and that the duke was privy to this whole plan, and had even entered into the design of Godfrey's murder.

had accordingly carried the libel to the duchess of Portsmouth; and he was desirous that the jury should, in this transaction, consider him as a cheat, not as a traitor. He failed however somewhat in the proof; and was brought in guilty of treason by the jury. Finding himself entirely in the hands of the king, he now retracted all his former impostures with regard to the popish plot, and even endeavoured to atone for them by new impostures against the country party. He affirmed, that these fictions had been extorted from him by the suggestions and artifices of Treby the recorder, and of Bethel and Cornish, the two sheriffs: this account he persisted in even at his execution; and though men knew, that nothing could be depended on, which came from one so corrupt, and so lost to all sense of honour; yet were they inclined, from his perseverance, to rely somewhat more on his veracity in these last asseverations. But it appears, that his wife had some connections with Mrs. Wall, the favourite maid of the duchess of Portsmouth; and Fitz-harris hoped, if he persisted in a story agreeable to the court, that some favour might, on that account, be shown to his family (u).

The whole gang of spies, witnesses, informers, suborners, who had so long been supported and encouraged by the leading patriots, finding now that the king was entirely master, turned upon their old patrons, and offered their service to the ministers. To the disgrace of the court and of the age, they were received with hearty welcome; and their testimony or rather perjury made use of, in order to commit legal murder upon the opposite party. With an air of triumph and derision it was asked, "Are not these men good witnesses, who have established the popish plot, upon whose testimony Stafford and so many Catholics have been executed, and whom you yourselves have so long celebrated as men of credit and veracity? You have admitted them into your bosom: they are best acquainted with your treasons: they are determined in another shape to serve their king and country: and you cannot complain, that the same measure, which you meted to others, should now, by a righteous doom or vengeance, be measured out to you."

The first person, on whom the ministers wreaked their vengeance, was one Stephen College, a London joiner, who had become noted for his zeal against popery, and was much connected with Shaftesbury and the leaders of the country party: for as they relied much upon the populace, men of College's rank and station were useful to them. College had been in Oxford armed with sword and pistol during the sitting of the parliament; and this was made the foundation of his crime. It was pretended that a conspiracy had been entered into to seize the king's person, and detain him in confinement, till he should make the concessions demanded of him. The sheriffs of London were in strong opposition to the court; and the grand jury named by them rejected the bill against College. The prisoner was therefore sent to Oxford, where the treason was said to have been committed. Lord Norris, a courtier, was sheriff of the county. A jury was named, consisting entirely of royalists; and such was the factious rage which prevailed, that little justice could be expected by the prisoner. Some papers, containing hints and directions for his defence, were taken from him, as he was conducted to his trial: an iniquity, which some even pretended to justify. Against College were produced as witnesses Dugdale, Turberville, Haynes, Smith; men who had before given evidence against the Catholics; and whom the jury, for that very reason, regarded as the most perjured villains. College defended himself with spirit, courage, capacity, presence of mind; and he invalidated the evidence of the crown, by convincing arguments and undoubted testimony: yet did the jury, after half an hour's deliberation, bring in a verdict against him. The inhuman spectators received the verdict with a shout of applause; but the prisoner was not in the least dismayed. At his execution, he maintained the same manly fortitude, and still denied the crime imputed to him. His whole conduct and demeanour prove him to have been a man led astray only by the fury of the times, and to have been governed by an honest, but indiscreet, zeal for his country and his religion.

The system of fabricating plots, however, was not confined to England alone, for it was carried even into Ireland. In England, where the catholics were scarcely one to a hundred, means had been found to excite an universal panic, on account of insurrections, and even massacres, projected by that sect; yet in Ireland, where they exceeded the Protestants six to one, no symptoms appear of any combination or conspiracy. Such an incident, when duly considered, might even in England shake the credit of the plot, and diminish the authority of those leaders, who had so long, with such industry, inculcated the belief of it on the nation. Rewards, therefore, were published in Ireland to any that would bring intelligence or become witnesses; and some profligates were sent over to that kingdom, with a commission to seek out evidence against the catholics. Under pretence of searching for arms or papers, they broke into houses, and plundered them: they threw innocent men into prison, and took bribes for their release: and after all their diligence, it was with difficulty that that country, commonly fertile enough in witnesses, could furnish them with any fit for their infamous projects. At length, one Fitzgerald appeared, followed by Ivey, Sanson, Dennis, Bourke, two Macnamaras, and some others. These men were sent over to England; and though they possessed neither character sufficient to gain belief even for truth, nor sense to invent a credible falsehood, they were caressed, rewarded, supported, and recommended by the earl of Shaftesbury. Oliver Plunket, the titular primate of Ireland, a man of peaceable disposition, was condemned and executed upon such wretched testimony. And the Oxford parliament voted, that they were entirely satisfied in the reality of the horrid and damnable Irish plot. But such decisions, though at first regarded as infallible, had now lost much of their authority; and the public remained somewhat indifferent and incredulous as to its truth.

On the dissolution of the parliament, and the subsequent victory of the royalists, Shaftesbury's evidences, with Turberville, Smith, and others, applied to the ministers, and gave information of high treason against their former patron. It is sufficiently scandalous, that intelligence, conveyed by such men, should have been attended to; but there is some reason to think, that the court agents, nay the ministers, nay the king himself, went farther, and were active in endeavouring, though in vain, to find more reputable persons to support the blasted credit of the Irish witnesses. Shaftesbury was committed to prison, and his indictment was presented to the grand jury. The new sheriffs of London, Shute and Pilkington, were engaged as deeply as their predecessors in the country party; and they took care to name a jury devoted to the same cause: a precaution quite necessary, when it was scarcely possible to find men indifferent or attached to neither party (v). The draught of an association, it is true, against popery and the duke, was found in Shaftesbury's cabinet; and dangerous inferences might be drawn from many clauses of that paper. But it did not appear, that it had been framed by Shaftesbury, or so much as approved by him; yet as projects of an association had been proposed in parliament, it was natural for this nobleman, or his correspondents, to be thinking of some plan, which it might be proper to lay before that assembly. The grand jury, therefore, after weighing all these circumstances, rejected the indictment; and the people, who attended the hall, testified their joy by the loudest acclamations.

A scheme of oppression was laid in Scotland, about this time, after a manner still more flagrant, against a nobleman much less hated than Shaftesbury; and as that country was reduced to a state of almost total subjection, the project succeeded. From his youth the earl of Argyle had distinguished himself by his loyalty, and his attachment to the royal family. His father was at the head of the covenanters, but himself refused to concur in any of their measures; even when a commission of colonel was given him by the convention of states, he forbore to act upon it, till ratified by the king. By his respectful behaviour, as well as by his services, he was acceptable to Charles, when that prince was in Scotland: and even after the battle of Worcester he could not be persuaded to desert the royal (u) This was no less than the fifteenth false plot, or sham-plot, as they were then called, with which the court, it was imagined, had endeavoured to load their adversaries.

(v) As far as swearing could go, the treason was clearly proved against Shaftesbury; or rather so clearly as to merit no kind of credit or attention. That veteran leader of a party, enured from his early youth to faction and intrigue, to cabals and conspiracies, was represented as opening without reserve his treasonable intentions to these obscure banditti, and throwing out such violent and outrageous reproaches upon the king, as none but men of low education, like themselves, could be supposed to employ.

cause. Under Middleton he obstinately persevered to harrass the victorious English; and it was not till he received orders from that general, that he submitted to a capitulation. Such jealousy of his loyal attachments was entertained by the commonwealth and protector, that he was committed to prison; and his confinement was rigorously continued till the restoration. The king, sensible of his services, had remitted to him his father's forfeiture, and created him earl of Argyle; and when a most unjust sentence was passed upon him by the Scottish parliament, Charles had again remitted it. A parliament was summoned at Edinburgh this summer, and the duke was appointed commissioner. Besides granting money to the king, and voting the indefeasible right of succession, this parliament enacted a test, which all persons, possessed of offices, civil, military, or ecclesiastical, were bound to take. In this test, the king's supremacy was asserted, the covenant renounced, passive obedience assented to, and all obligations disclaimed of endeavouring any alteration in civil or ecclesiastical establishments. This was the state of the test, as proposed by the courtiers; but the country party proposed also to insert a clause, which could not with decency be refused, expressing the person's adherence to the Protestant religion. Among other things, the doctrine of resistance was inculcated; so that the test, being voted in a hurry, was found on examination to be a medley of contradiction and absurdity. Several persons, the most attached to the crown, scrupled to take it: the bishops and many of the clergy remonstrated: the earl of Queensberry refused to swear, except he might be allowed to add an explanation: and even the privy council thought it necessary to publish for general satisfaction a solution of some difficulties attending the test. All princes of the blood were exempted from taking the oath. This exception was opposed by Argyle; who observed, that the sole danger to be dreaded for the Protestant religion must proceed from the perversion of the royal family. By insisting on such topics, he drew on himself the secret indignation of the duke of York, of which he soon felt the fatal consequences.

When Argyle took the test as a privy counsellor, he subjoined, in the duke's presence, an explanation, which he had beforehand communicated to that prince, and which he believed to have been approved by him. It was in these words: "I have considered the test, and am very desirous of giving obedience as far as I can. I am confident that the parliament never intended to impose contradictory oaths: therefore, I think no man can explain it but for himself. Accordingly, I take it as far as it is consistent with itself, and the Protestant religion. And I do declare, that I mean not to bind myself, in my station, and in a lawful way, from wishing, and endeavouring any alteration, which I think to the advantage of church or state, and not repugnant to the Protestant religion and my loyalty: and this I understand as a part of my oath." The duke, as was natural, heard these words with tranquillity: no one took the least offence: Argyle was admitted to sit that day in council; and it was impossible to imagine, that a capital offence had been committed, where occasion seemed not in the least to have been given.

A few days after, a warrant was issued for committing Argyle to prison; and he was surprized to find, that he was indicted for high-treason, leasing-making, and perjury; and that from these innocent words an accusation was extracted, by which he was to forfeit honours, life, and fortune. The iniquity of the whole transaction is apparent. Of five judges, three did not scruple to find the guilt of treason and leasing-making to be incurred by the prisoner: a jury of fifteen noblemen gave verdict against him: and the king, being consulted, ordered the sentence to be pronounced; but the execution of it to be suspended till farther orders (w).

About this time, Cameron and Cargil, two furious preachers, publicly excommunicated the king for his tyranny and breach of the covenant; and renounced all allegiance to him. Cameron was killed by the troops in an action at Airs-Moss; Cargil was taken and hanged. Many of their followers were tried and convicted. Their lives were offered them if they would say, "God save the king;" but they would only agree to pray for his repentance; and they were put to death.

The king being now master in England, and no longer dreading the clamours of the country party, he permitted the duke to pay him a visit; and was soon after prevailed on to allow of his return to England, and of his bearing a part in the administration. The duke went to Scotland, in order to bring up his family, and settle the government of that country; and he chose to take his passage by sea. The ship struck on a sand-bank, and was lost: the duke escaped in the barge; and it is said that, while many persons of rank and quality were drowned, and among the rest Hyde, his brother-in-law, he was very careful to save several of his dogs and priests. During his abode in Scotland, the duke had behaved with great civility towards the gentry and nobility; and by his courtly demeanour had much won upon their affections: but his treatment of the enthusiasts was extremely rigorous and unrelenting. It is even asserted, that he sometimes assisted at the torture of criminals, and looked on with tranquillity, as if he were considering some curious experiment. He left the authority in the hands of the earl of Aberdeen, chancellor, and the earl of Queensberry, treasurer (x). Above two thousand persons were outlawed on pretence of their conversing or having intercourse with rebels, and they were continually hunted in their retreat by soldiers, spies, informers, and oppressive magistrates. It was usual to put ensnaring questions to people living peaceably in their own houses; such as, "Will you renounce the covenant? Do you esteem the rising at Bothwel to be rebellion? Was the killing of the archbishop of St. Andrew's murder?" And when the poor deluded creatures refused to answer, capital punishments were inflicted on them. Even women were brought to the gibbet for this pretended crime. A number of fugitives, rendered frantic by oppression, had published a seditious declaration; renouncing allegiance to Charles Stuart, whom they called, as they, for their parts, had indeed some reason to esteem him, a tyrant. This incident afforded the privy council a pretence for an unusual kind of oppression. Soldiers were dispersed over the country, and power was given to all commission-officers, even the lowest, to oblige every one they met with to abjure the declaration; and upon refusal, instantly, without farther questions, to shoot the delinquent. It were endless, as well as shocking, to enumerate all the instances of persecution, or, in other words, of absurd tyranny, which at that time prevailed in Scotland. One of them, however, is so singular, says Hume, that I cannot forbear relating it.

"Three women were seized, and the customary oath was tendered to them, by which they were to abjure the seditious declaration above mentioned. They all refused, and were condemned to a capital punishment by drowning. One of them was an elderly woman: the other two were young; one eighteen years of age, the other only thirteen. Even these violent persecutors were ashamed to put the youngest to death: but the other two were conducted to the place of execution, and were tied to stakes within the sea-mark at low water: a contrivance which

(w) It was pretended by the duke of York and his creatures, that Argyle's life and fortune were not in any danger, and that the sole reason for pushing the trial to such extremities against him was in order to make him renounce some hereditary jurisdictions, which gave his family a dangerous authority in the highlands, and obstructed the course of public justice. But if the end were justifiable, the means were infamous, and such as were incompatible, not only with a free, but a civilized government. Argyle had therefore no reason to trust any longer to the justice or mercy of such enemies: he made his escape from prison; and till he should find a ship for Holland, he concealed himself during some time in London. The king heard of the place of his retreat, but would not allow him to be arrested. All the parts, however, of his sentence, as far as the government in Scotland had power, were rigorously executed; his estate confiscated, his arms reversed and torn.

(x) A very arbitrary spirit appeared in their administration: a gentleman of the name of Weir was tried, because he had kept company with one who had been in rebellion; though that person had never been marked out by process or proclamation. The inferences upon which Weir was condemned (for a prosecution by the government and a condemnation were in Scotland the same thing) were extremely arbitrary. In the conclusion it was said to him, "You have conversed with a rebel; therefore you are yourself a rebel." A reprieve was, with some difficulty, procured for Weir; but it was seriously determined to make use of the precedent. Courts of judicature were erected in the southern and western counties, and a strict inquisition carried on against this new species of crime. The term of three years was appointed for the continuance of these courts; after which an indemnity was promised. Whoever would take the test, was instantly entitled to the benefit of this indemnity. The presbyterians, alarmed with such tyranny, from which no man could deem himself safe, began to think of leaving the country; and some of their agents were sent to England, in order to treat with the proprietors of Carolina for a settlement in that colony. Any condition seemed preferable to the living in their native country, which, by the prevalence of persecution and violence, was become as insecure to them as a den of robbers.

rendered their death lingering and dreadful. The elderly woman was placed farthest in, and by the rising of the waters was first suffocated. The younger, partly terrified with the view of her companion's death, partly subdued by the entreaty of her friends, was prevailed with to say, "God save the king." Immediately the spectators called out that she had submitted; and she was loosened from the stake. Major Winram, the officer who guarded the execution, again required her to sign the abjuration; and upon her refusal, he ordered her instantly to be plunged in the water, where she was suffocated."

This severity of administration is in part to be ascribed to the duke of York's temper, to whom the king had committed the government of that country, and who allowed nothing of moment to escape him. Even the government of England, from the same cause, began to be infected with the same severity. The duke's credit was great at court.

The king knowing how hateful the dissenters were to the church, resolved, contrary to the maxims of toleration which he had hitherto supported in England, to gratify his friends by the persecution of his enemies. The laws against conventicles were rigorously executed; an expedient which, Charles knew, would diminish neither the numbers nor influence of the non-conformists; and which is therefore to be deemed more the result of passion than of policy. Scarcely any persecution serves the intended purpose but such as amounts to a total extermination.

The king's authority had made every day great advances, yet it still met with considerable obstacles, chiefly from the city, which was entirely in the hands of the malcontents. The juries, in particular, named by the sheriffs, were not likely to be impartial judges between the crown and the people; and, after the experiments already made in the case of Shaftesbury and that of College, treason, it was apprehended, might there be committed with impunity. Sir John Moore, the mayor, was gained by secretary Jenkins, and encouraged to insist upon the privilege of his office, of naming one of the sheriffs. Accordingly, when the time of election came, he drank to North, a Levant merchant, who accepted of that expensive office. The country party said, that, being lately returned from Turkey, he was, on that account, better qualified to serve the purposes of the court. A poll was opened for the election of another sheriff; and here began the contest. The majority of the common-hall, headed by the two sheriffs of the former year, refused to acknowledge the mayor's right of appointing one sheriff, but insisted that both must be elected by the livery. Papillon and Dubois were the persons whom the country party agreed to elect: Box was pointed out by the courtiers. The poll was opened on the 24th of June, 1682; but as the mayor would not allow the election to proceed for two vacancies, the sheriffs and he separated, and each carried on the poll apart. The country party, who voted with the sheriffs for Papillon and Dubois were much more numerous than those who voted with the mayor for Box: but as the mayor insisted, that his poll was the only legal one, he declared Box to be duly elected. All difficulties, however, were not surmounted. Box, apprehensive of the consequences which might attend so dubious an election, fined off; and the mayor found it necessary to proceed to a new choice. When the matter was proposed to the common-hall, a loud cry was raised, "No election! No election!" The two sheriffs already elected, Papillon and Dubois, were insisted on as the only legal magistrates. But as the mayor still maintained, that Box alone had been legally chosen, and that it was now requisite to supply his place, he opened books afresh; and during the tumult and confusion of the citizens, a few of the mayor's partizans elected Rich, unknown to and unheeded by the rest of the livery. North and Rich were accordingly sworn in sheriffs for the ensuing year; but it was necessary to send a guard of the train bands to protect them in entering upon their office. A new mayor of the court party was chosen on the 25th of October, by means still more violent and irregular.

The court and church party, who were now named on juries, made justice subservient to their factious views; the king had a prospect of obtaining full revenge on his enemies; and it was not long before the effects of these alterations were seen. When it was first reported, that the duke intended to leave Scotland, Pilkington, at that time sheriff, had said, "He has already burned the city; and he is now coming to cut all our throats!" For these expressions, the duke sued Pilkington; and enormous damages, to the amount of one hundred thousand pounds, were decreed him (y).

Though the crown had obtained so great a victory in the city, it was not decisive; and the contest might be renewed every year at the election of magistrates. An important project, therefore, was formed, not only to make the king master of the city, but by that precedent to gain him uncontrolled influence in all the corporations of England, and thereby give the greatest wound to the legal constitution, which the most powerful and most arbitrary monarchs had ever yet been able to inflict. A writ of quo warranto was issued against the city; that is, an inquiry into the validity of its charter. It was pretended, that the city had forfeited all its privileges, and ought to be declared no longer a corporation, on account of two offences which the court of aldermen and common council had committed. After the great fire in 1666, all the markets had been rebuilt, and had been fitted up with many conveniences; and, in order to defray the expence, the magistrates had imposed a small toll on goods brought to market: in the year 1679, they had addressed the king against the prorogation of parliament, and had employed the following terms: "Your petitioners are greatly surprized at the late prorogation, whereby the prosecution of the public justice of the kingdom, and the making of necessary provisions for the preservation of your majesty and your Protestant subjects, have received interruption." These words were pretended to contain a scandalous reflection on the king and his measures. The cause of the city was defended against the attorney and solicitor generals, by Treby and Pollexfen. The advocates for the city pleaded their cause in a most able and justifiable manner; but they were borne down by the overbearing power of the judges, who caused a sentence of condemnation to be passed against the city (z), on the 12th of June, 1683. After sentence was pronounced, the city applied in a humble manner to the king; and he agreed to restore their charter; but in return they were obliged to submit to the following regulations; "That no mayor, sheriff, recorder, common serjeant, town clerk, or coroner, should be admitted to the exercise of his office without his majesty's approbation: that if the king disapprove twice of the mayor or sheriffs elected, he may by commission appoint these magistrates: that the mayor and court of aldermen may, with his majesty's leave, displace any magistrate: and that no alderman, in case of a vacancy, shall be elected without consent of the court of aldermen, who, if they disapprove twice of the choice, may fill the vacancy (a).

As long as so great a faction adhered to the crown, resistance, however justifiable, could never be prudent; and nothing was left but peaceably to submit to the present grievances. But there was a party in England which still cherished their former ideas of freedom, and were resolved to hazard every danger in its defence. This, like all other combinations, was made up of men, some guided by principle to the subversion of the present despotic power, some by interest, and still more by revenge. Some time before, in 1681, the king had been seized with a fit of sickness at Windsor, which gave great alarm to the public. Shaftesbury had even then attempted to exclude the duke of York from the succession, and united with the duke of Monmouth, lord Russel, and lord Grey. In case of the king's death, they conspired to rise in arms, and vindicate their opinions by the sword. Shaftesbury's imprisonment and trial put a stop to these designs for some time; but they soon revived with his release. Monmouth engaged the earl of Macclesfield, lord Brandon, sir Gilbert Gerrard, and other gentlemen in Cheshire. Lord Russel fixed a correspondence with sir William Courtney, sir Francis Rolles, and sir Francis Drake, who promised to raise the West. Shaftesbury, with one Ferguson, an independent (y) By the law of England, ratified in the Great Charter, no fines or damages ought to extend to the total ruin of a criminal. Sir Patience Ward, formerly mayor, who gave evidence for Pilkington, was sued for perjury, and condemned to the pillory: a severe sentence, and sufficient to deter all witnesses from appearing in favour of those who were prosecuted by the court.

(z) The office of judge it is to be observed, was at that time held during pleasure; and it was impossible that any cause, where the court bent its force, could ever be carried against it.

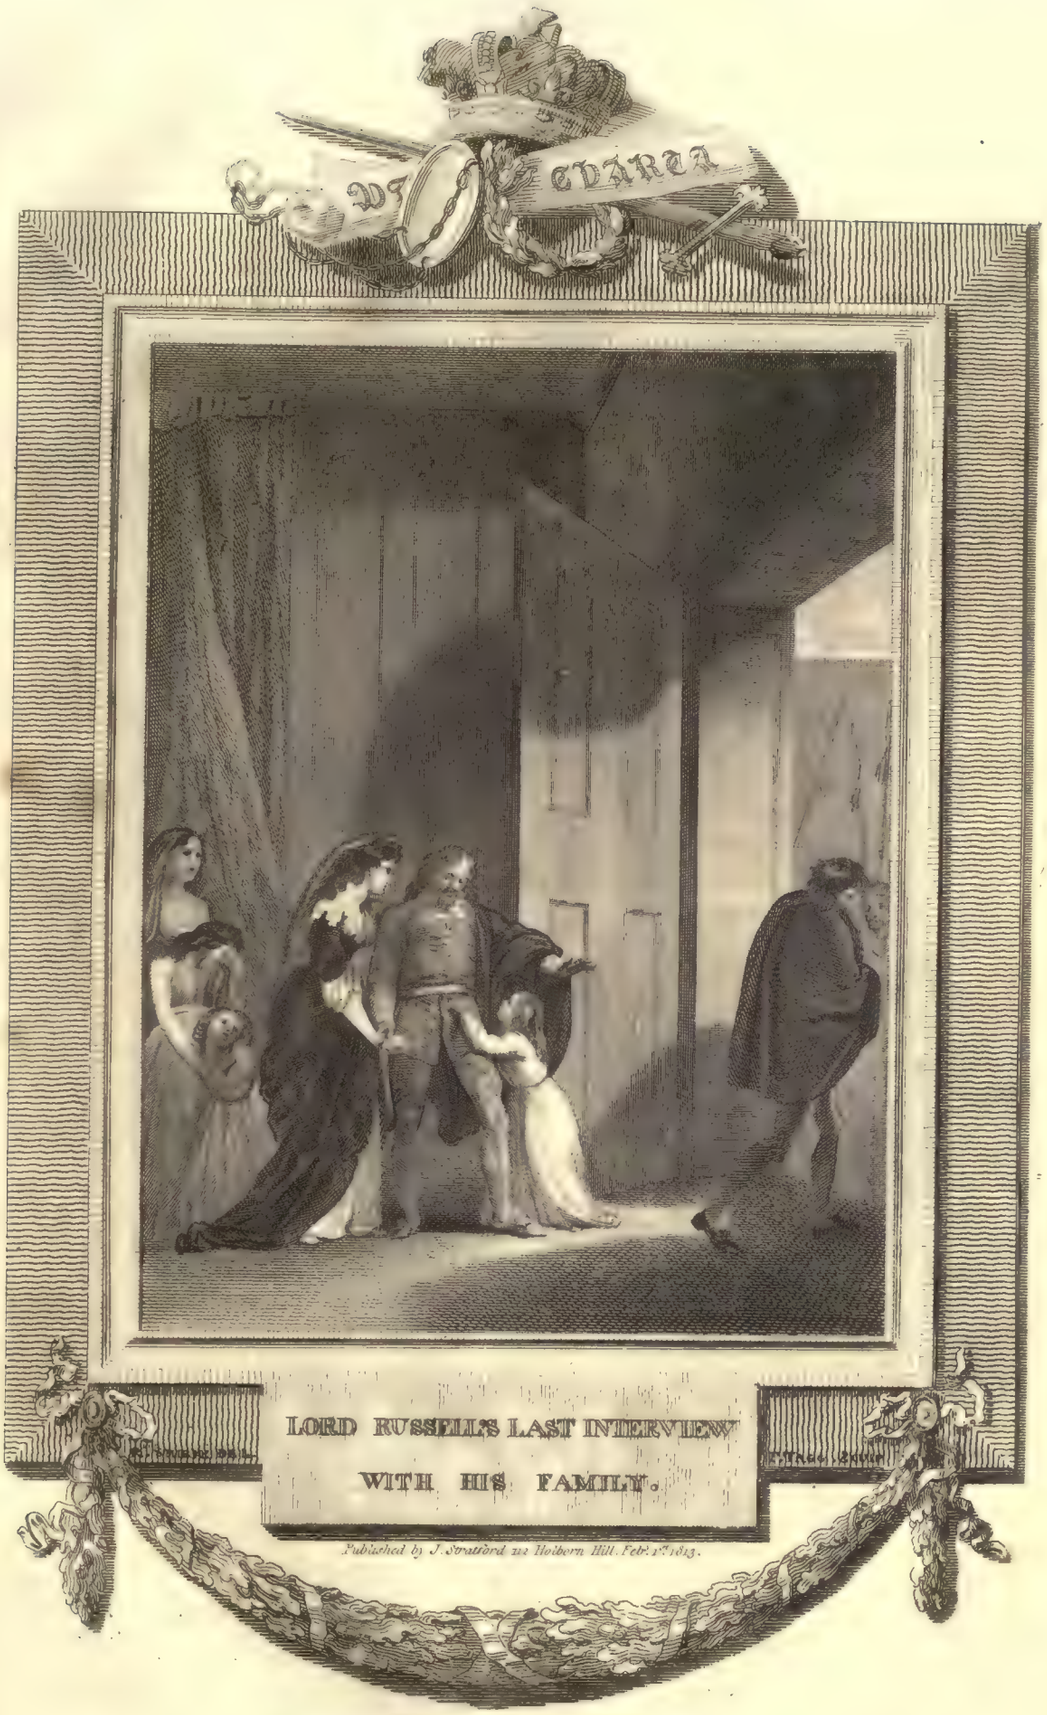
(a) Most of the corporations in England, having the example of London before their eyes, were successively induced to surrender their charters into the king's hands. Considerable sums were exacted for restoring the charters; and all offices of power and profit were left at the disposal of the crown.

clergyman, managed the city, upon which the confederates chiefly relied. The turbulent Shaftesbury now found that his schemes were more likely to take effect: but this scheme, like all the former, was disappointed. The caution of lord Russel, who induced the duke of Monmouth to put off the enterprize, saved the kingdom from the horrors of a civil war; while Shaftesbury was so struck with a sense of his impending danger that he left his house, and, lurking about the city, attempted, but in vain, to drive the Londoners into open insurrection. At last, enraged at the numberless cautions and delays which clogged and defeated his projects, he threatened to begin with his friends alone. However, after a long struggle between fear and rage, he abandoned all hopes of success, and fled to Amsterdam, where he soon after ended his life, without being pitied by his friends, or feared by his enemies.

The loss of Shaftesbury, though it retarded the views of the conspirators, did not suppress them. A council of six was erected, consisting of Monmouth, Russel, Essex, Howard, Algernon Sidney, and John Hampden, grandson to the great man of that name. These corresponded with Argyle and the malcontents in Scotland, and resolved to prosecute the scheme of the insurrection, though they differed in principles. Monmouth aspired at the crown; Russel and Hampden proposed to exclude the duke of York from the succession, and redress the grievances of the nation; Sidney was for restoring the republic, and Essex joined in the same wish. Lord Howard was an abandoned man, who, having no principles, sought to embroil the nation, to gratify his private interest in the confusion.

Such were the leaders of the conspiracy, and such their motives: but there was also a set of subordinate conspirators, who frequently met together, and carried on projects unknown to Monmouth and his council. Among these men was colonel Rumsey, an old republican officer, with lieutenant colonel Walcot, of the same principles, Goodenough, under sheriff of London, Ferguson beforementioned, and several attorneys, merchants, and tradesmen of London. But Rumsey and Ferguson were the only persons who had access to the great leaders of the conspiracy. These men in their meetings embraced the most desperate resolutions. They proposed to assassinate the king in his way to Newmarket, whither he went commonly once a year on account of the races. Rumbald, one of the party, possessed a farm upon that road called the Rye House, and from thence the conspiracy was denominated the Rye House Plot. They deliberated on a scheme for stopping the king's coach, by overturning a cart on the highway at this place, and shooting him through the hedges. The house in which the king resided at Newmarket took fire accidentally, and he was obliged to leave that place eight days sooner than was expected, to which circumstance his safety was ascribed.

Among the conspirators was one Keiling, who was in danger of a prosecution for arresting the lord mayor of London; but he was resolved to purchase his pardon by discovering this plot to the ministry. Colonel Rumsey, and West, a lawyer, understanding that this man had informed against them, they agreed to save their lives by turning king's evidence, and surrendered themselves accordingly. Shephard, another conspirator, being apprehended, confessed all he knew, and orders were issued for apprehending the rest of the conspirators. Monmouth absconded, Russel was sent to the Tower, Grey escaped, Howard was taken concealed in a chimney; Essex, Sidney, and Hampden were soon after arrested, and had the mortification to find lord Howard an evidence against them.



Lieutenant colonel Walcot was first brought to trial and condemned, together with Hone and Rouse, two of their associates, upon the evidence of Rumsey, West, and Shephard. They died penitent, acknowledging the justice of the sentence. Lord Russel, son of the earl of Bedford, was next brought to trial. He was a nobleman of numberless good qualities, and led into this conspiracy from a conviction of the duke of York's intention to restore popery. He was liberal, popular, humane, and brave; but all his virtues were looked upon as crimes. The chief evidence against him was lord Howard, a man of very bad character, and one of the conspirators. He swore that Russel was engaged in the design of an insurrection, but acquitted him, as did also Rumsey and West, of being privy to the assassination. To the fact which principally affected his life there was but one witness, and the law required two: this was over-ruled; for justice, during this whole reign, was not strictly adhered to. The jury, after a short deliberation, brought the prisoner in guilty. After his condemnation, the king was strongly solicited in his favour. Even two hundred thousand pounds were offered to the duchess of Portsmouth by lord Russel's father, the duke of Bedford; but the king was inexorable (b). Lord Cavendish, the intimate friend of Russel, offered to effect his escape, by exchanging apparel with him, and remaining a prisoner in his room. The duke of Monmouth sent a message to him, offering to surrender himself, if he thought that step would contribute to his safety. Lord Russel, however, generously rejected both these expedients, and resigned himself to his fate with admirable fortitude. His consort, the daughter and heiress of the earl of Southampton, finding that all supplications were vain, took leave of her husband without shedding a tear; while, as he parted from her, he turned to those about him, and said, "Now the bitterness of death is over." A little before the sheriffs conducted him to the scaffold, he wound up his watch, and said, "I have now done with time, and must henceforth think of eternity." The scaffold for his execution was erected in Lincoln's Inn Fields; where, without the least change of countenance, he laid his head on the block, which, at two strokes, was severed from his body, on the 21st of July, 1683.

The celebrated Algernon Sidney, son to the earl of Leicester, was next brought to his trial. He had been formerly engaged in the parliamentary army against the late king, and was even named on the high court of justice that tried him, but had not taken his seat among the judges. He had ever opposed Cromwell's usurpation, and went into voluntary exile upon the Restoration. His affairs, however, requiring his return, he applied to the king for a pardon, and obtained his request. But all his hopes and all his reasonings were formed upon republican principles. For his adored republic he had written and fought, and went into banishment, and ventured to return. It may easily be conceived how hateful a man of such principles was to a court that now was not even content with limitations to its power. They therefore took illegal measures to procure his condemnation. The only witness that deposed against Sidney was lord Howard, and the law required two. In order to make out a second witness, the court had recourse to a very extraordinary expedient. In ransacking his closet, some discourses on government were found in his own hand-writing, containing principles favourable to liberty, and in themselves no way subversive of a limited government. By overstraining some of these they were construed into treason. All the arguments used against their illegal proceedings were of no service; and the inhuman Jefferies, now chief justice, easily prevailed on a partial jury to bring him in guilty, and his execution followed soon after.

In a short time Hampden was brought to trial, and as there was nothing to affect his life, he was fined forty thousand pounds. Holloway, a merchant of Bristol, who had fled to the West Indies, was brought over, condemned, and executed. Sir Thomas Armstrong also, who had fled to Holland, was brought over, and shared the same fate. Lord Essex, who had been imprisoned in the Tower, was found in an apartment with his throat cut; but whether he was guilty of suicide, or whether the bigotry of the times might not have induced some assassin to commit the crime, cannot be now ascertained.

This was the last blood that was shed for an imputation of plots and conspiracies, which continued during the greatest part of Charles's reign. Nevertheless the cruelty, and the gloomy suspicion of the duke of York, who, since the dissolution of the last parliament, daily came into power, was dreadful to the nation. Titus Oates was fined one hundred thousand pounds for calling the duke a popish traitor, and he was imprisoned till he could pay it, which he was utterly incapable of. A like illegal sentence was passed upon Dutton Colt, for the same offence. Sir Samuel Barnardiston was fined ten thousand pounds, for having, in some private letters, reflected on the government. Of all those who were concerned in the late conspiracy, scarcely one escaped the severity of the court, except the duke of Monmouth, and he was the most culpable of any.

(b) So intent was the king upon taking the life of lord Russel, that he said, "Lord Russel shall find, that I am possessed of that prerogative, which, in the case of lord Stafford he thought proper to deny me." He, however, remitted the more ignominious part of the sentence.

LORD RUSSELL'S LAST INTERVIEW WITH HIS FAMILY.

Published by J. Stratford 112 Holborn Hill. Febr. 1st 1813.

The government of Charles was at this period as absolute as that of any monarch in Europe; but in 1684, he endeavoured to please his subjects by an act of popularity, and knowing that the suspicion of popery was of all others the most dangerous, he judged it proper to marry his niece, the lady Anne, to prince George, (a protestant,) brother to the king of Denmark. This was the last transaction worthy of note in Charles's extraordinary reign.

On the 1st of February, 1685, the king was seized with a sudden fit, which resembled an apoplexy; and though he was recovered from it by bleeding, yet he languished only for a few days, and then expired, on the 6th of February, in the fifty-fifth year of his age, and twenty-fifth of his reign.

During the few days of the king's illness, clergymen of the church of England attended him; but he discovered a total indifference towards their devotions and exhortations. Catholic priests were brought, and he received the sacrament from them, accompanied with the other rites of the Romish church. Two papers were found in his cabinet, written with his own hand, and containing arguments in favour of that communion. The duke had the imprudence immediately to publish these papers, and thereby both confirmed all the reproaches of those who had been the greatest enemies to his brother's measures, and afforded to the world a specimen of his own bigotry.

With respect to the character of this prince, says the celebrated Mr. Fox, at the close of his Introductory Chapter, upon the delineation of which so much pains have been employed, by the various writers who treat of the history of his time, it must be confessed that the facts which have been noticed in the foregoing pages, furnish but too many illustrations of the more unfavourable parts of it. From these we may collect, that his ambition was directed solely against his subjects, while he was completely indifferent concerning the figure which he or they might make in the general affairs of Europe; and that his desire of power was more unmixed with the love of glory than that of any other man whom history has recorded; that he was unprincipled, ungrateful, mean, treacherous, to which may be added vindictive, and remorseless. For Burnet, in refusing to him the praise of clemency and forgiveness, seems to be perfectly justifiable, nor is it conceivable upon what pretence his partizans have taken this ground of panegyric. I doubt, says the same elegant writer, whether a single instance can be produced, of his having spared the life of any one whom motives, either of policy, or of revenge, prompted him to destroy. To alledge that of Monmouth, as it would be an affront to human nature, so would it likewise imply the most severe of all satires against the monarch himself, and we may add too, an undeserved one. For in order to consider it as an act of meritorious forbearance on his part, that he did not follow the example of Constantine, and Philip the Second, by imbruing his hands in the blood of his son, we must suppose him to have been wholly void of every natural affection, which does not appear to have been the case. His declaration that he would have pardoned Essex, being made when that nobleman was dead, and not followed by any act evincing its sincerity, can surely obtain no credit from men of sense. If he had really had the intention, he ought not to have made such a declaration, unless he accompanied it with some mark of kindness to the relations, or with some act of mercy to the friends of the deceased. Considering it as a mere piece of hypocrisy, we cannot help looking upon it as one of the most odious passages of his life. This ill-timed boast of his intended mercy, and the brutal taunt with which he accompanied his mitigation, (if so it may be called,) of Russel's sentence, shew his insensibility and hardness to have been such, that in questions where right and feelings are concerned, his good sense, and even the good taste for which he has been so much extolled, seemed wholly to desert him.

On the other hand, it would be want of candour to maintain, that Charles was entirely destitute of good qualities; nor was the propriety of Burnet's comparison between him and Tiberius ever felt, I imagine, by any one but its author. He was gay and affable, and, if incapable of the sentiments belonging to pride of a laudable sort, he was at least free from haughtiness and insolence. The praise of politeness, which the Stoics are not perhaps wrong in classing among the moral virtues, provided they admit it to be one of the lowest order, has never been denied him, and he had in an eminent degree that facility of temper which, though considered by some moralists as nearly allied to vice, yet, inasmuch as it contributes greatly to the happiness of those around us, is, in itself, not only an engaging, but an estimable quality. His support of the queen during the heats raised by the popish plot, ought to be taken rather as a proof that he was not a monster, than to be ascribed to him as a merit; but his steadiness to his brother, though it may and ought, in a great measure, to be accounted for upon selfish principles, had at least a strong resemblance to virtue.

The best part of this prince's character seems to have been his kindness towards his mistresses, and his affection for his children, and others nearly connected to him by the ties of blood. His affection for the duke of Glocester, and for the duchess of Orleans, seems to have been sincere and cordial. To attribute, as some have done, his grief for the loss of the first to political considerations, founded upon an intended balance of power between his two brothers, would be an absurd refinement, whatever were his general disposition; but when we reflect upon that carelessness which, especially in his youth, as a conspicuous feature of his character, the absurdity becomes still more striking. And though Burnet more covertly, and Ludlow more openly, insinuate that his fondness for his sister was of a criminal nature, I never could find that there was any ground whatever for such a suspicion; nor does the little that remains of their epistolary correspondence give it the smallest countenance. Upon the whole, continues Mr. Fox, Charles the Second was a bad man, and a bad king: let us not palliate his crimes; but neither let us adopt false or doubtful imputations, for the purpose of making him a monster.

CHAP. VIII.

JAMES THE SECOND.

THE duke of York, who succeeded his brother on the 6th of February, 1685, had been bred a Papist by his mother, and was strongly bigotted in his principles. The intellects of this prince were naturally weak, and the education he had received made his mind still more feeble. He therefore conceived the impracticable project of reigning in the arbitrary manner of his predecessor, and of changing the established religion of his country, at a time when his person was hated, and the established religion highly approved. The people, though they despised the administration of Charles, yet had an affection for him: they were willing to bear with his faults, because Charles's whole behaviour was a continued instance of affability; but they were by no means willing to grant the same indulgence to James, as they knew him to be gloomy, proud, bigotted, and cruel.

The first act of James's reign was to assemble the privy council; where, after some praises bestowed on the memory of his predecessor, he said, "I have been reported to be a man for arbitrary power; but that is not the only story that has been made of me: and I shall make it my endeavour to preserve this government, both in church and state, as it is now by law established. I know the principles of the church of England are for monarchy, and the members of it have shewn themselves good and loyal subjects; therefore I shall always take care to defend and support it. I know too, that the laws of England are sufficient to make the king as great a monarch as I can wish; and as I shall never depart from the just rights and prerogatives of the crown, so I shall never invade any man's property. I have often heretofore ventured my life in defence of this nation; and I shall go as far as any man in preserving it in all its just rights and liberties (c)."

This discourse was received with applause, not only by the council, but by the nation. The king passed for a man of sincerity and honour; and as the current of favour ran at that time for the court, men believed that his intentions were conformable to his expressions. "We have," it was said by the court party, "the word of a king, and a word never yet broken." Addresses came from all quarters, full of duty, nay of the most servile adulation. Every one hastened to pay court to the new monarch (d): and James had

(c) See Fox's History of the Early Part of James the Second.

(d) The quaker's address was esteemed somewhat singular for its plainness and simplicity. It was conceived in these terms: "We are come to testify our sorrow for the death of our good friend Charles, and our joy for had the vanity to think, that, notwithstanding the violent efforts made by so potent a party as the Whigs for his exclusion, no throne in Europe was better established than that of England.

The king, however, in the first exercise of his authority, shewed, that either he was not sincere in his professions of attachment to the laws, or that he had entertained so lofty an idea of his own legal power, that even his utmost sincerity would tend very little to secure the liberties of the people. All the customs and the greater part of the excise had been settled by parliament on the late king during life, and consequently the grant was now expired; nor had the successor any right to levy these branches of revenue. But James issued a proclamation, ordering the customs and excise to be paid as before; and this exertion of power he would not deign to qualify by the least act or even appearance of condescension.

To the above arbitrary measure, by which James displeased a great many of his friends, may be added, that his bigotry was so extreme that he went openly to mass, an illegal meeting, with all the ensigns of his dignity. He even sent one Caryl, as his agent, to Rome, to make submissions to the pope, and to pave the way for the re-admission of England into the bosom of the catholic church. The pope, Innocent the Eleventh, being better acquainted with the nature of man, prudently advised the king not to be too precipitate in his measures, nor rashly attempt what repeated experience might convince him was impracticable. These were but inauspicious symptoms in the very beginning of his reign; but the progress by no means fell short of the commencement.

James had, long before the beginning of his reign, had an intrigue with Mrs. Sedley, daughter of sir Charles Sedley, whom he afterwards created countess of Dorchester; but being now told that as he was to convert his people, the sanctity of his manners ought to correspond with his professions, Mrs. Sedley was discarded, and he resigned himself to the advice of the queen, who was as much governed by priests as he. From the suggestions of these men, and particularly the Jesuits, all measures were taken. One day, when the Spanish ambassador, Ronquillo, ventured to advise his majesty not to place too much confidence in the dangerous counsels of such kind of people, James said, "Is it not the custom in Spain for the king to consult his confessor?" "Yes," replied the ambassador, "and it is for that reason that our affairs succeed so very ill." But though his actions might serve to demonstrate his aims, yet his first parliament, which assembled on the 19th of May, 1685, and which was mostly composed of zealous Tories, were strongly inclined to comply with all the measures of the crown. They voted unanimously that they would settle on the present king, during his life, all the revenue enjoyed by the late king until the time of his decease. For this favour, James assured them of his resolution to secure them in the full enjoyment of their laws; but no answer could be extorted from him with regard to religion, for that he was secretly resolved to alter.

Notwithstanding the king's prejudices, all the chief offices of the crown continued still in the hands of Protestants. Rochester was treasurer; his brother Clarendon chamberlain; Godolphin chamberlain to the queen; Sunderland (e) secretary of state; Halifax president of the council. This nobleman had stood in opposition to James during the last years of his brother's reign; and when he attempted, on the accession, to make some apology for his late measures, the king told him, that he would forget every thing past, except his behaviour during the bill of exclusion. On other occasions, however, James appeared not of so forgiving a temper. When the principal exclusionists came to pay their respects to the new sovereign, they either were not admitted, or were received very coldly, sometimes even with frowns. This conduct might suit the character, which the king so much affected, of sincerity: but by showing, that a king of England could resent the quarrels of a duke of York, he gave his people no high idea either of his lenity or magnanimity.

To pave the way for his intended conversion of the kingdom, James thought it necessary to undeceive the nation with regard to the late rumour of a popish plot; and Titus Oates, the contriver, was the first object of royal indignation. He was tried for perjury on two indictments. One, for swearing he was present at a consultation of Jesuits in London, on the 24th of April, 1679; and another for swearing that father Ireland was in London in the beginning of September of the same year. He was convicted on the evidence of two and twenty persons who had been students at St. Omer's, (most of them men of credit and family,) on the first; and of forty-seven on the latter indictment. Oates's sentence was to pay a fine of a thousand marks on each indictment; to be whipped on two different days from Aldgate to Newgate, and from Newgate to Tyburn; to be imprisoned during life, and to be pilloried five times every year. Oates, long accustomed to a life of infamy, supported himself under every punishment that justice could inflict. He made solemn appeals to Heaven, and protestations of the veracity of his testimony. Though the whipping was so severe, that it appeared evidently the intention of the court to put him to death by that dreadful punishment; yet Oates survived it all, and lived till the reign of king William, when a pension of four hundred pounds per annum was settled upon him. Thus Oates remains as a stain upon the times in every part of his conduct. It is a stain upon them that he was first believed, it is a stain upon them that he was caressed, that he was tyrannically punished, and that he was afterwards rewarded by so considerable a pension.

The duke of Monmouth, when ordered to depart the kingdom, during the late reign, had retired to Holland, where he was well received by the prince of Orange; but who, after the accession of James thought it necessary to dismiss Monmouth and all his followers; and that illustrious fugitive retired to Brussels. Finding himself still pursued by the king's severity, he resolved to retaliate, and make an attempt on the kingdom. Monmouth had always been the darling of the people; and it was even asserted, that Charles declared he had married Mrs. Walters, the duke's mother, and that a little before his death he owned the duke's legitimacy. The duke of Argyle seconded his views in Scotland, and they formed the scheme of a double insurrection; so that while Monmouth should attempt to make a rising in the West, Argyle was also to try his endeavours in the North.

Argyle was the first who landed in Scotland, where he published his manifestoes, put himself at the head of two thousand five hundred men, and strove to influence the people in his cause. But a formidable body of the king's forces coming against him, his army fell away, and himself, after being wounded in attempting to escape, was taken prisoner by a peasant, who found him standing up to his neck in a pool of water. He was from thence carried to Edinburgh, where after enduring many indignities with a gallant spirit, he was publicly executed.

The fate of Argyle was but a bad encouragement to the unfortunate Monmouth, who, on the 11th of June, 1685, landed at Lyme in Dorsetshire, with scarcely a hundred followers. His name, however, was so popular, and so great was the hatred of the people both for the person and the religion of James, that in four days he had assembled above two thousand horse and foot. They were indeed all of them the lowest of the people, and his declarations were suited entirely to their prejudices. He called the king the duke of York, and denominated him a traitor, a tyrant, a murderer, and a popish usurper. He imputed to James the fire of London, the murder of sir Edmundsbury Godfrey, and the earl of Essex, and charged him with poisoning the late king.

The parliament was no sooner informed of Monmouth's landing, than they presented an address to the king, as-for thy being made our governor." We are told thou art not of the persuasion of the church of England, no more than we: wherefore we hope thou wilt grant us the same liberty which thou allowest thyself. Which doing, we wish thee all manner of happiness."

(e) Robert Spencer, earl of Sunderland, had been at one period a supporter of the exclusion bill, and had been suspected of having offered the duchess of Portsmouth to obtain the succession of the crown for her son, the duke of Richmond. Nay more, king James, in his Memoirs, charges him with having intended, just at the time of Charles's death, to send him into a second banishment; but with regard to this last point, says Mr. Fox, chap. ii. p. 81. it appears to me, that many things in those memoirs relative to this earl, were written after James's abdication, and in the greatest bitterness of spirit, when he was probably in a frame of mind to believe any thing against a person by whom he conceived himself to have been basely deserted. The re-appointment, therefore, of this nobleman to so important an office, is to be accounted for partly upon the general principle of making the new reign a mere continuation of the former, and partly upon Sunderland's extraordinary talents for ingratiating himself with persons in power, and persuading them that he was the fittest instrument for their purposes; a talent in which he seems to have surpassed all the intriguing statesmen of his time, or perhaps of any other. Fox.

suring him of their loyalty, zeal, and assistance. They even granted him four hundred thousand pounds to aid him in suppressing the rebellion. The duke of Albemarle, son to him who had restored the royal family, assembled the militia of Devonshire, to the number of four thousand men, and took post at Axminster, in order to oppose the rebels; but observing that his troops bore a great affection to Monmouth, he thought proper to retreat. Monmouth, though he had formerly given many proofs of personal courage, had not the vigour of mind requisite for an undertaking of this nature. From an ill-grounded diffidence of his men, he neglected to attack Albemarle; an easy enterprize, by which he might both have acquired credit, and have supplied himself with arms. Lord Gray, who commanded his horse, discovered himself to be a notorious coward; yet such was the softness of Monmouth's nature, that Gray was still continued in his command. Fletcher of Saltown, a Scotchman, a man of signal probity and fine genius, had been engaged by his republican principles in this undertaking, and commanded the cavalry together with Gray: but being insulted by one who had newly joined the army, and whose horse he had in a hurry made use of, he was prompted by passion, to which he was much subject, to discharge a pistol at the man; and he killed him on the spot. This incident obliged him immediately to leave the camp; and the loss of so gallant an officer was a great prejudice to Monmouth's expedition.

The next station of the rebels was at Taunton in Somersetshire, a disaffected town, which gladly and even fondly received them, and reinforced them with considerable numbers. Twenty young maids of some rank presented Monmouth with a pair of colours of their handiwork, together with a copy of the Bible. Monmouth was here persuaded to take upon him the title of king, and assert the legitimacy of his birth; a claim which he advanced in his first declaration, but whose discussion he was determined, he then said, during some time to postpone. His numbers had now increased to six thousand; and he was obliged every day, for want of arms, to dismiss a great many who crowded to his standard. He entered Bridgewater, Wells, and Frome; and was proclaimed in all these places: but forgetting that such desperate enterprizes can only be rendered successful by the most adventurous courage, he allowed the expectations of the people to languish, without attempting any considerable undertaking.

But while Monmouth, by his imprudent and misplaced caution, was thus wasting time in the west, the king employed himself in making preparations to oppose him. Six regiments of British troops were called over from Holland: the army was considerably augmented; and regular forces, to the number of three thousand men, were dispatched under the command of the earl of Feversham and Churchill, in order to check the progress of the rebels.

Monmouth, observing that no considerable men joined him, finding that an insurrection, which was projected in the city, had not taken place, and hearing that Argyle, his confederate, was already defeated and taken; sunk into such despondency, that he had once resolved to withdraw himself, and leave his unhappy followers to their fate. His adherents expressed more courage than their leader, and seemed determined to remain with him in every fortune. The negligent disposition, made by Feversham, invited Monmouth to attack the king's army at Sedgemoor near Bridgewater, on the 5th of July; and his men in this action showed what a native courage and a principle of duty, even when unassisted by discipline, is able to perform. They threw the veteran forces into disorder; drove them from their ground; continued the fight till their ammunition failed them; and would at last have obtained a victory, had not the misconduct of Monmouth and the cowardice of Gray prevented it. After a combat of three hours the rebels gave way; and were followed with great slaughter. About three hundred fell in the battle, and one thousand in the pursuit. And thus was concluded in a few weeks this enterprize, which was rashly undertaken, and as feebly conducted.

Monmouth fled from the field of battle above twenty miles, till his horse sunk under him. He then changed clothes with a peasant in order to conceal himself. The peasant was discovered by the pursuers, who now redoubled the diligence of their search. At last, the unhappy Monmouth was found lying in the bottom of a ditch, covered with fern, and a few raw pease in his pocket which he had gathered in the fields to sustain life: his body depressed with fatigue and hunger; his mind by the memory of past misfortunes, by the prospect of future disasters. Human nature is unequal to such calamitous situations; much more, the temper of a man, softened by early prosperity, and accustomed to value himself solely on military bravery. He burst into tears when seized by his enemies; and he seemed still to indulge the fond hope and desire of life. Though he might have known from the severity of James's temper, that no mercy could be expected, he wrote him the most submissive letters, and conjured him to spare the issue of a brother, who had ever been so strongly attached to his interest. James, finding such symptoms of depression and despondency in the unhappy prisoner, and desirous of feasting his eyes with the miseries of a fallen enemy, admitted him to his presence, in hopes of extorting a discovery of his accomplices: but Monmouth would not purchase life, however loved, at the price of so much infamy. James, however, offered him a paper, which he signed, declaring his own illegitimacy; and then the stern tyrant assured him, that his crime was of such a nature as could not be pardoned. Finding all efforts vain, he assumed courage from despair, and prepared himself for death, with a spirit better suited to his rank and character. This favourite of the people was attended to the scaffold with a plentiful effusion of tears. He warned the executioner not to fall into the error which he had committed in beheading Russel, where it had been necessary to repeat the blow. This precaution served only to dismay the executioner. He struck a feeble blow on Monmouth, who raised his head from the block, and looked him in the face, as if reproaching him for his failure. He gently laid down his head a second time; and the executioner struck him again and again to no purpose. He then threw aside the axe, and cried out that he was incapable of finishing the bloody office. The sheriff obliged him to renew the attempt; and at two blows more the head was severed from the body, on the 15th of July, 1685 (f).

This victory, obtained by the king's forces in the commencement of his reign, would naturally, had it been managed with prudence, have tended to increase his power and authority. But by reason of the cruelty with which it was prosecuted, and of the temerity with which it afterwards inspired him, it was a principal cause of his sudden ruin and downfal.

So tyrannical and arbitrary were the principles that the court instilled into all its servants, that Feversham, immediately after the victory, hanged above twenty prisoners; and was proceeding in his executions, when William Kenn, bishop of Bath and Wells, warned him, that these unhappy men were now by law entitled to a trial, and that their execution would be deemed a real murder. This remonstrance, however, did not stop the savage nature of colonel Kirke, a soldier of fortune, who had long served at Tangiers, and had contracted, from his intercourse with the Moors, an inhumanity less known in European and in free countries. At his first entry into Bridgewater, he hanged nineteen prisoners, without the least inquiry into the merits of their cause. As if to make sport with death, he ordered a certain number to be executed, while he and his company should drink the king's health, or the queen's, or that of chief-justice Jefferies. Observing their feet to quiver in the agonies of death, he cried that he would give them music to their dancing; and he immediately commanded the drums to beat and the trumpets to sound. By way of experiment, he ordered one man to be hung up three times, questioning him at each interval, whether he repented of his crime: but the man obstinately asserting, that, notwithstanding the past, he still would willingly engage in the same cause, Kirke ordered him to be hung in chains. One story, commonly told of him, is memorable for the treachery, as well as barbarity, which attended it. A young maid pleaded for the life of her brother, and flung herself at Kirke's feet, armed with all the charms which beauty and innocence, bathed in tears, could bestow upon her. The tyrant was inflamed with desire, not softened into love or clemency. He promised to grant her request, provided that she, in her turn, would be equally compliant to him. The maid yielded to the conditions: but, after she had passed the night with him, the wanton savage, next morning, showed her, from the window, her brother, the darling object for whom she had sacrificed her virtue, hanging on a gibbet, which he had secretly ordered to be there erected for the execution. Rage and despair and indignation took possession of her mind, and deprived her for ever of her senses (g). All the inhabitants of that country, innocent as well as guilty, were exposed to the ravages of this barbarian. The soldiery were let loose to live at free quarters; and his own regiment, instructed by his example, and encouraged by his exhortations, distinguished themselves in a particular manner by their outrages. By way of pleasantry he used to call the most inhuman of his mercenaries his lambs; an appellation which was long remembered with horror in the west of England.

(f) Thus perished, in the thirty-sixth year of his age, James duke of Monmouth, a nobleman, who, in less turbulent times, was well qualified to be an ornament of the court, even to be serviceable to his country. The favour of his prince, the caresses of faction, and the allurements of popularity, seduced him into enterprizes which exceeded his capacity. The good-will of the people still followed him in every fortune. Even after his execution, their fond credulity flattered them with hopes of seeing him once more at their head. They believed that the person executed was not Monmouth, but one who, having the fortune to resemble him nearly, was willing to give this proof of his extreme attachment, and to suffer death in his stead.

The violent Jefferies succeeded after some interval; and showed the people, that the rigours of law might equal, if not exceed, the ravages of military tyranny. This man, who wantoned in cruelty, had already given a specimen of his character in many trials, where he presided; and he now set out with a savage joy, as to a full harvest of death and destruction. He began at Dorchester; and thirty rebels being arraigned, he exhorted them, but in vain, to save him, by their free confession, the trouble of trying them: and when twenty-nine were found guilty, he ordered them, as an additional punishment of their disobedience, to be led to immediate execution. Most of the other prisoners, terrified with this example, pleaded guilty; and no less than two hundred and ninety-two received sentence of death at Dorchester. Of these, eighty were executed. Exeter was the next stage of his cruelty: two hundred and forty-three were there tried, of whom a great number were condemned and executed. He also opened his commission at Taunton and Wells; and every where carried consternation along with him. The juries were so struck with his menaces, that they gave their verdict with precipitation; and many innocent persons were involved with the guilty. And on the whole, besides those who were butchered by the military commanders, two hundred and fifty-one are computed to have fallen by the hand of what was called justice. The whole country was strewed with the heads and limbs of traitors. Every village almost beheld the dead carcase of a wretched inhabitant. And all the rigours of justice, unabated by any appearance of clemency, were fully displayed to the people by the inhuman Jefferies (h).

It might have been hoped, that, by all these bloody executions, a rebellion, so precipitate, so ill supported, and of such short duration, would have been sufficiently expiated: but nothing could satiate the spirit of rigour which possessed the administration. Even those multitudes, who received pardon, were obliged to atone for their guilt by fines, which reduced them to beggary; or where their former poverty made them incapable of paying, they were condemned to cruel whippings or severe imprisonments. Nor could the innocent escape the hands, no less rapacious than cruel, of the chief justice. Prideaux, a gentleman of Devonshire, being thrown into prison, and dreading the severe and arbitrary spirit, which at that time met with no control, was obliged to buy his liberty of Jefferies at the price of fifteen thousand pounds; though he could never so much as learn the crime of which he was accused.

Goodenough, the seditious under-sheriff of London, who had been engaged in the most bloody and desperate part of the Rye-house conspiracy, was taken prisoner after the battle of Sedgemoor, and resolved to save his own life by an accusation of Cornish, the sheriff, whom he knew to be extremely hateful to the court. Colonel Rumsey joined him in the accusation; and the prosecution was so hastened, that the prisoner was tried, condemned, and executed, in the space of a week. The perjury of the witnesses appeared immediately after; and the king seemed to regret the execution of Cornish. He granted his estate to his family, and condemned the witnesses to perpetual imprisonment (i).

It was not to be supposed that the king could by these slaughters acquire the love or the confidence of his people; yet he thought this a very favourable juncture for carrying on his schemes of religion and arbitrary power. Such attempts in Charles, however unjust, were in some measure politic, as he had a republican faction to contend with; but the same designs in James were as imprudent as they were impracticable; the republicans were then diminished to an inconsiderable number, and the people thought the advantage lay on the side of a limited monarchy. However, James began to throw off all disguise; and, when the parliament met, on the 9th of November, 1685, in the house of commons, by his speech, he seemed to think himself exempted from all rules of prudence or necessity of dissimulation. He told the house, that the militia were found by experience to be of no use; that it was necessary to augment the standing army; and that he had employed a great many catholic officers, in whose favour he had thought proper to dispense with the test, required to be taken by all entrusted by the crown: he found them useful, he said, and he was determined to keep them employed. These stretches of power naturally led the lords and commons into some degree of opposition; but they soon acquiesced in the king's measures, and then the parliament was dissolved for their tardy compliance. This was a happy circumstance for the nation; for it was perhaps impossible to pick out another house of commons, that could be more ready to acquiesce in the measures of the crown.

The parliament being dismissed, the king began the year 1686, with endeavouring to secure a catholic interest in the privy council. Accordingly four catholic lords were admitted: these were Powis, Arundel, Bellasis, and Dover. The king made no secret of his desires to have his courtiers converted to his own religion; and Sunderland, who saw that the only way to preferment was by popery, scrupled not to gain favour at that price. Rochester, the treasurer, though the king's brother-in-law, was turned out of his office, because he refused to conform. In these schemes, James was entirely governed by the counsels of his queen and his confessor, father Petre, a jesuit, whom he soon after created a privy counsellor. Even in Ireland, where the duke of Ormond had long supported the royal cause, (g) Pomfret's admirable poetical essay, entitled "Cruelty and Lust," on this inhuman scene of wantonness, treachery, and cruelty, is too long for insertion, but is nevertheless worthy of perusal.

(h) Of all the executions, during this dismal period, the most remarkable were those of Mrs. Gaunt and lady Lisle, who had been accused of harbouring traitors. Mrs. Gaunt was an anabaptist, noted for her beneficence, which she extended to persons of all professions and persuasions. One of the rebels, knowing her humane disposition, had recourse to her in his distress, and was concealed by her. Hearing of the proclamation, which offered an indemnity and rewards to such as discovered criminals, he betrayed his benefactress, and bore evidence against her. He received a pardon as a recompense for his treachery; she was burned alive for her charity!

Lady Lisle was widow of one of the regicides who had enjoyed great favour and authority under Cromwell, and who having fled, after the restoration, to Lauzanne in Switzerland, was there assassinated by three Irish ruffians, who hoped to make their fortune by this piece of service. His widow was now prosecuted for harbouring two rebels the day after the battle of Sedgemoor; and Jefferies pushed on the trial with an unrelenting violence. The persons she was said to have concealed were Mr. Hicks, a presbyterian minister, and one Nelthorpe, who was a stranger to her. In vain did the aged prisoner plead, that these criminals had been put into no proclamation; had been convicted by no verdict; nor could any man be denominated a traitor, till the sentence of some legal court was passed upon him: that it appeared not by any proof, that she was so much as acquainted with the guilt of the persons, or had heard of their joining the rebellion of Monmouth: that though she might be disliked on account of her family, it was well known, that her heart was ever loyal, and that no person in England had shed more tears for that tragical event, in which her husband had unfortunately borne too great a share: and that the same principles, which she herself had ever embraced, she had carefully instilled into her son, and had, at that very time, sent him to fight against those rebels whom she was now accused of harbouring. Though these arguments did not move Jefferies, they had influence on the jury. Twice they seemed inclined to bring in a favourable verdict: they were as often sent back with menaces and reproaches; and at last were constrained to give sentence against the prisoner. Notwithstanding all applications for pardon, the cruel sentence was executed. The king said, that he had given Jefferies a promise not to pardon her: an excuse, which could serve only to aggravate the blame against himself.

(i) The injustice of this sentence against Cornish, was not wanted to disgust the nation with the court: the continued rigour of the other executions had already impressed an universal hatred against the ministers of justice, attended with compassion for the unhappy sufferers, who, as they had been seduced into this crime by mistaken principles, bore their punishment with the spirit and zeal of martyrs. The people might have been willing on this occasion to distinguish between the king and his ministers; but care was taken to prove, that the latter had done nothing but what was agreeable to their master. Jefferies, on his return, was immediately, for those eminent services, created a peer; and was soon after vested with the dignity of chancellor.

this nobleman was dismissed as being a protestant; and the lord Tyrconnel, a furious and bigotted Roman catholic, was placed in his stead (k).

It was not, however, to be expected that the favour shewn by James to the catholics, would be tamely submitted to by the members of the English church. They had hitherto, indeed, supported the king against the republicans, and to their assistance he chiefly owed his crown; but finding his great partiality to the catholics, the clergy of the church of England began to take the alarm, and commenced an opposition to the measures of the court. The pulpits now became places of declamation against popery, and it was urged that it was more formidable from the support which was granted it by the king. It was in vain that James attempted to impose silence on these topics; for, instead of gratifying him in this particular, and avoiding the controversy, the protestant ministers pursued it with still greater vehemence.

Among those who distinguished themselves on this occasion, was one doctor Sharpe, a clergyman of London, who declaimed with just severity against those who had changed their religion, by such arguments as the popish missionaries were accustomed to produce. This being supposed to reflect upon the king, gave great offence to the court: and positive orders were given to the bishop of London to suspend Sharpe till his majesty's pleasure should be farther known. The bishop refused to comply; and the king resolved to punish the bishop for disobeying his commands.

In order to effect his designs, James determined to revive the high commission court, a measure which had given the nation so much disgust in the times of his father, and which had been for ever abolished by an act of parliament. But the laws were no obstacle to James, when they were in opposition to his inclination. An ecclesiastical commission was issued by his order, and seven commissioners (l) were invested with a full and unlimited authority over the whole church of England. This was so severe a blow to the church, that the kingdom became greatly alarmed at it; and if the authority of the court could have been carried into effect, the king's intentions of establishing popery would naturally follow. Before this tribunal the bishop was summoned; and by a majority of votes, not only he, but doctor Sharpe were suspended.

The next step was to allow a liberty of conscience to all sectaries; and James was taught to believe, that the truth of the catholic religion would then, upon a fair trial, gain the victory. In such a case, the same power that granted liberty of conscience might restrain it; and the catholic religion alone be then permitted to predominate. He therefore, in 1687, issued a declaration of general indulgence, and asserted that nonconformity to the established religion was no longer penal. In order to procure a favourable reception to this edict, he began to pay court to the dissenters, as if it had been principally intended for their benefit; but the dissenters were too suspicious to be so easily deceived. They knew that the king only meant to establish his own religion at the expence of theirs; and that both his own temper, and the genius of popery, had nothing of the true spirit of toleration in them. They dissembled, however, their distrust for some time, and James went on silently applauding himself on the success of his machinations. But what afforded the most alarming prospect, was the continuance and even increase of the violent and precipitate conduct of affairs in Ireland. Tyrconnel was now vested with full authority; and carried over with him as chancellor one Fitton, a man who had been taken from a jail, and who had been convicted of forgery and other crimes, but who compensated for all his enormities by a furious zeal for the catholic religion. He was even heard to say from the bench, that the protestants were all rogues, and that there was not one among forty thousand that was not a traitor, a rebel, and a villain. The whole strain of the administration was suitable to such sentiments. The catholics were put in possession of the council table, of the courts of judicature, and of the bench of justices. In order to make them masters of the parliament, the same violence was exercised that had been practised in England. The charters of Dublin and of all the corporations were annulled; and new charters were granted, subjecting the corporations to the will of the sovereign. The protestant freemen were expelled, catholics introduced; and the latter sect, as they always were the majority in number, were now invested with the whole power of the kingdom. The act of settlement was the only obstacle to their enjoying the whole property; and Tyrconnel had formed a scheme for calling a parliament, in order to reverse that act, and empower the king to bestow all the lands of Ireland on his catholic subjects. In this scheme, however, he met with opposition from the moderate catholics in the king's council. Lord Bellasis even affirmed with an oath, "that that fellow in Ireland was fool and madman enough to ruin ten kingdoms." The decay of trade, from the desertion of the protestants, was represented; the sinking of the revenue; the alarm communicated to England: and by these considerations the king's resolutions were for some time suspended; though it was easy to foresee, from his conduct, which side was likely to preponderate.

But the king was not content with discovering in his own kingdoms the imprudence of his conduct: he was resolved that all Europe should be witness of it. Therefore, to complete his work, for James did nothing by halves, he publicly sent the earl of Castlemaine ambassador extraordinary to Rome, in order to express his obeisance to the pope, and to reconcile his kingdoms, in form, to the catholic communion. Never man, who came on so important an errand, met with so many neglects, and even insults, as Castlemaine. His holiness, instead of being pleased with this forward step, concluded that a scheme, conducted with so much weakness, could never possibly be successful. And as he was engaged in a violent quarrel with the French monarch, a quarrel which interested him more nearly than the conversion of England, he bore little regard to James, whom he believed too closely connected with his capital enemy. Even the cardinals were heard facetiously to declare, that the king should be excommunicated, for thus endeavouring to overturn the small remains of popery that yet subsisted in England.

The only proof of complaisance which James received from the pontiff was his sending a nuncio to England, in return for the embassy. By act of parliament any communication with the pope was made treason: yet so little regard did the king pay to the laws, that he gave the nuncio a public and solemn reception at Windsor. The duke of Somerset, one of the lords of the bed-chamber, because he refused to assist at this ceremony, was dismissed from his employment. The nuncio resided openly in London during the rest of this reign. The Jesuits were soon after permitted to erect colleges in different parts of the kingdom, and exercised the catholic worship in the most public manner. Four catholic bishops were publicly consecrated in the king's chapel, and sent out under the title of vicars apostolical, to exercise the episcopal function in their respective dioceses. Their pastoral letters, directed to the lay catholics of England, were printed by the king's printer, and dispersed by the express allowance and permission of James. The regular clergy of that communion appeared at court in the habits of their order, and a great number of priests and friers came over to England. Some of them were so indiscreet as to boast, that, in a little time, they hoped to walk in procession through the metropolis.

Every great office the crown had to bestow was now gradually transferred from the protestants: even the earls of Rochester and Clarendon, the king's brothers-in-law, though they had been ever faithful to his interests, were, because they were protestants, dismissed from their employments; and the violent Jefferies himself, though he had sacrificed every principle of justice and humanity to the court, yet, because he refused to give up his religion, was declining in favour and interest. Nothing now remained but to open the door of the church and universities to the intrusion of the catholics, and an attempt to effect this was soon afterwards begun.

Father Francis, a Benedictine monk, was recommended by the king to the university of Cambridge for the degree of master of arts; but his religion was a stumbling-block which the university could not get over; and they presented a petition, beseeching the king to recall his man-

(k) The king one day, in his attempts to convert his subjects, stooped so low as colonel Kirke; but this daring soldier told him that he was pre-engaged, for he had promised the king of Morocco, when he was quartered at Tangiers, that if he ever changed his religion, he would turn Mohammedan.

(l) The persons named in this commission were, the archbishop of Canterbury, Sancroft; the bishop of Durham, Crew; of Rochester, Sprat; the earl of Rochester; Sunderland; chancellor Jefferies; and lord chief justice Herbert. The archbishop of Canterbury, however, refused to act, and the bishop of Chester was substituted in his place.

date. Their petition was disregarded, and their deputies denied a hearing: the vice-chancellor himself was summoned to appear before the high commission court, and deprived of his office; yet the university persisted, and father Francis was refused. The king thus foiled, thought proper at that time to drop his pretensions, but he carried on his attempts upon the university of Oxford with still greater vigour.

The place of president of Magdalen College, one of the richest foundations in Europe, being vacant, the king sent a mandate in favour of one Farmer, a new convert, and a man of a bad character in other respects. The fellows of the college made very submissive applications to the king for recalling his mandate; but before they received an answer, the day came, on which, by their statutes, they were required to proceed to an election. The person now recommended by the king was Dr. Parker, lately created bishop of Oxford, a man of prostitute character, but who atoned for all his vices by his willingness to embrace the catholic religion. The fellows refused to comply with this injunction; which so incensed the king, that he repaired in person to Oxford, and ordered the fellows to be brought before him. He reproached them with their insolence and disobedience in the most imperious terms, and commanded them to choose Parker without delay. Another refusal on their part served still more to exasperate him; and finding them resolute in the defence of their privileges, he ejected them all, except two who complied, from their benefices, and Parker was put in possession of the place. Upon this the college was filled with catholics, and Charnock, who was one of the two that remained, was made vice-president. This act of violence, of all those which were committed during the reign of James, is perhaps the most illegal and arbitrary.

The next measure of the court was an insult still more open on the ecclesiastics, and rendered the breach between the king and that powerful body fatal, as well as incurable. A second declaration for liberty of conscience, almost in the same terms with the former, was published in 1688; and the king subjoined an order, that, immediately after divine service, it should be read by the clergy in all the churches. As they were known universally to disapprove of the use made of the suspending power, this clause, they thought, could be meant only as an insult upon them; and they were sensible, that, by their compliance, they should expose themselves, both to public contempt, on account of the tameness of their behaviour, and to public hatred, by their indirectly patronising so noxious a prerogative (m). They were determined, therefore, almost universally to preserve the regard of the people; their only protection, while the laws were become of so little validity, and while the court was so deeply engaged in opposite interests. In order to encourage them in this resolution, six prelates, namely Lloyd bishop of St. Asaph, Kenn of Bath and Wells, Turner of Ely, Lake of Chichester, White of Peterborough, and Trelawney of Bristol, met privately with William Sancroft the primate, and concerted the form of a petition to the king. They there represent in few words, that, though possessed of the highest sense of loyalty, a virtue of which the church of England had given such eminent testimonies; and though desirous of affording ease, in a legal way, to all protestant dissenters; yet, because the declaration of indulgence was founded on a prerogative formerly declared illegal by parliament, they could not, in prudence, honour, or conscience, so far make themselves parties as the distribution of it all over the kingdom would be interpreted to amount to. They therefore besought the king, that he would not insist upon their reading that declaration.

The king was incapable, not only of yielding to the greatest opposition, but of allowing the slightest and most respectful contradiction to pass uncensured. He immediately embraced a resolution (and his resolutions, when once embraced, were inflexible) of punishing the bishops, for a petition so popular in its matter, and so prudent and cautious in the expression. As the petition was delivered him in private, he summoned them before the council; and questioned them whether they would acknowledge it. The bishops saw his intention, and seemed long desirous to decline answering: but being pushed by the chancellor, they at last avowed the petition. On their refusal to give bail, an order was immediately drawn for their commitment to the Tower; and the crown lawyers received directions to prosecute them for the seditious libel which, it was pretended, they had composed and uttered (n).

The people were already aware of the danger to which the prelates were exposed; and were raised to the highest pitch of anxiety and attention with regard to the issue of this extraordinary affair. But when they beheld these fathers of the church brought from court under the custody of a guard, when they saw them embarked in vessels on the river, and conveyed towards the Tower, all their affection for liberty, all their zeal for religion, blazed up at once; and they flew to behold this affecting spectacle. The whole shore was covered with crowds of prostrate spectators, who at once implored the blessing of those holy pastors, and addressed their petitions towards Heaven for protection during this extreme danger, to which their country and their religion stood exposed. Even the soldiers, seized with the contagion of the same spirit, flung themselves on their knees before the distressed prelates, and craved the benediction of those criminals whom they were appointed to guard. Some persons ran into the water, that they might participate more nearly in those blessings, which the prelates were distributing on all around them. The bishops themselves, during this triumphant suffering, augmented the general favour, by the most lowly submissive deportment; and they still exhorted the people to fear God, honour the king, and maintain their loyalty; expressions more animating than the most inflammatory speeches. And no sooner had they entered the precincts of the Tower than they hurried to chapel, in order to return thanks for those afflictions, which Heaven, in defence of its holy cause, had thought them worthy to endure.

Their passage, when conducted to their trial, was, if possible, attended by greater crowds of anxious spectators. All men saw the dangerous crisis to which affairs were reduced, and were sensible that the king could not have put the issue on a cause more unfavourable for himself than that in which he had so imprudently engaged. Twenty-nine temporal peers (for the other prelates kept aloof) attended the prisoners to Westminster Hall; and such crowds of gentry followed the procession, that scarcely was any room left for the populace to enter. The lawyers for the bishops were sir Robert Sawyer, sir Francis Pemberton, Pollexfen, Treby, and Somers. No cause, even during the prosecution of the popish plot, was ever heard with so much zeal and attention. The popular torrent, which, of itself, ran fierce and strong, was now farther irritated by the opposition of government. The counsel for the bishops pleaded, "that the law allowed subjects, if they thought themselves aggrieved in any particular, to apply by petition to the king, provided they kept within certain bounds, which the same law prescribed to them, and which, in the present petition, the prelates had strictly observed: that an active obedience in cases which were contrary to conscience, was never pretended to be due to government; and law was allowed to be the great measure of the compliance and submission of subjects: that when any person found commands to be imposed upon him which he could not obey, it was more respectful in him to offer his reasons for refusal, than to remain in a sullen and refractory silence: that it was no breach of duty in subjects, even though not called upon, to discover their sense of public measures, in which every one had so intimate a concern: that the bishops in the present case were called upon, and must either express their approbation by compliance, or their disapprobation by petition: that it could be no sedition to deny the prerogative of suspending the laws; because there really was no such prerogative, nor ever could be, in a legal and limited government: that even if this prerogative were real, it had yet been frequently controverted before the whole nation, both in Westminster Hall, and in both houses of parliament; and no one had ever dreamed of punishing the denial of it as

(m) When Charles dissolved his last parliament, he set forth a declaration giving his reasons for that measure, and this declaration the clergy had been ordered to read to the people after divine service. These orders were agreeable to their party prejudices, and they willingly submitted to them. The contrary was now the case.

(n) It may be here observed, that, although the bishops of Durham and Rochester, who were members of the ecclesiastical court, ordered the declaration to be read in the respective churches of their dioceses, the audiences could not hear them with any degree of patience. One minister in particular told his congregation, that though he had positive orders to read the declaration, they had none to hear it, and therefore they might leave the church; a hint which the congregation quickly obeyed.

criminal: that the prelates, instead of making an appeal to the people, had applied in private to his majesty, and had even delivered their petition so secretly, that, except by the confession extorted from them before the council, it was found impossible to prove them the authors: and that though the petition was afterwards printed and dispersed, it was not so much as attempted to be proved that they had the least knowledge of the publication." These arguments were convincing in themselves, and were heard with a favourable disposition by the audience. Even some of the judges, Holloway and Powel, though their seats were held during pleasure, declared themselves in favour of the prisoners. The jury, however, from what cause is unknown, took several hours to deliberate, and kept, during so long a time, the people in the most anxious expectation. But when the wished-for verdict, "Not guilty," was at last pronounced, on the 17th of June, the intelligence was echoed through the hall, was conveyed to the crowds without, was carried into the city, and was propagated with infinite joy throughout the kingdom (o).

If the bishops testified the readiness of martyrs in support of their religion, James shewed no less ardour in his attempts towards the establishment of his own. Grown odious to every class of his subjects, he still resolved to persist; for it was a part of his character, that those measures he once adopted he always persevered in pursuing. He struck out two of the judges, Powel and Holloway, because they had declared in favour of the bishops. He issued orders to prosecute all those clergymen who had not read his declaration, and all had refused it, except about two hundred. He sent a mandate to the new fellows, whom he had obtruded on Magdalen College, to elect for president, in the room of Parker, lately deceased, one Gifford, a doctor of the Sorbonne, and titular bishop of Madura.

Finding that the clergy were every where averse to the harshness of his proceedings, he was willing to try next what he could do with the army. He apprehended, that if one regiment should promise implicit obedience, their example would soon induce others to comply. He therefore ordered one of the regiments to be drawn up in his presence, and desired that such as were against his late declaration for liberty of conscience, should lay down their arms. He was surprized to see the whole battalion ground their arms, except two officers and a few soldiers of the Romish communion.

The opposition which was made to this infatuated monarch's measures served only to inflame his zeal. He was continually stimulated by the queen, and the priests about him, to go forward in his glorious work without receding. A fortunate circumstance happened in his family. A few days before the acquittal of the bishops, the queen was brought to bed of a son, on the 10th of June, 1688, who was baptized by the name of James. This would, if any thing could at that time, have served to establish him on the throne; but so great was the animosity against him, that a story was propagated that the child was supposititious, and brought to the queen's apartment in a warming-pan. So great, however, was this monarch's pride, that he scorned to take any precautions to refute the calumny. Indeed all his measures were marked with the characters of pride, of cruelty, of bigotry, and of weakness. In his arbitrary schemes James was chiefly supported by Father Petre, his confessor, an ambitious, ignorant, and intriguing priest, whom some historians have asserted was a concealed creature belonging to the prince of Orange. By that prince's secret directions, it was asserted, that James was hurried on, under the guidance of Petre, from one precipice to another, until he was obliged to give up the reins of that government which he went near to overthrow.

William, prince of Orange, had married Mary, the eldest daughter of king James. This princess had been bred a protestant; and as she was for a long time heir-apparent to the throne, the people bore the encroachments of the king, in hopes that his protestant successor would rectify those measures he had taken towards the establishment of popery, and the extension of the prerogative of the crown. For this reason, the prince gave the king not only advice but assistance in all emergencies, and had actually supplied him with six thousand troops upon Monmouth's invasion. But now, when a young prince was born, that excluded his hopes by succession, he lent more attention to the complaints of the nation; and began to favour those discontents which he had before endeavoured to suppress.

The politic William now perceived that James had incurred the most violent hatred of his subjects. He was minutely informed of their discontents; and by seeming to discourage, still farther increased them. He therefore began by giving Dykevelt, his envoy, instructions to apply in his name to every sect and denomination in the kingdom. To the church party he sent assurances of favour and regard; and declared that his education in Holland had no way prejudiced him against episcopacy. To the nonconformists he sent exhortations not to be deceived by the insidious caresses of their crown enemy, but to wait for a real and sincere protector. Dykevelt executed his commission with such dexterity, that all orders of men cast their eyes towards Holland, and expected from thence a deliverance from those dangers with which they were threatened at home.

The prince soon found that every rank was ripe for defection, and received invitations from some of the most considerable persons in the kingdom (p). The people of England indeed, though long divided between Whig and Tory, were unanimous in their measures against the king. The Whigs hated him upon principles of liberty, the Tories upon principles of religion. The former had ever shewn themselves tenacious of their political rights; the latter were equally obstinate in defence of their religious tenets. James had invaded both; so that for a time all factions were laid asleep, except the general one of driving the tyrant from a throne, which upon every account, he was so ill qualified to fill. William determined to accept the invitations of the kingdom; and still more readily embarked in the cause, as he saw that the malcontents had conducted their measures with prudence and secrecy.

The prince of Orange entered upon his enterprize just when the people were in a flame from the recent insult offered to their bishops. He had before this considerably increased the Dutch fleet, and the ships were then lying ready in the harbour. Some additional troops were also levied, and sums of money raised for other purposes were converted to the advancement of this expedition. Even troops from some of the German powers were marched down to Holland to protect his authority during his absence. Every place was in motion; all Europe saw and expected the descent, except the unfortunate James himself, who, secure in the piety of his intentions, thought nothing could injure his schemes for promoting the cause of his dearly beloved church.

The king of France was the first who apprised him of his danger; but James could not be persuaded that his son-in-law intended an invasion. He therefore rejected the French king's proposal of assisting him with ships and men. James having thus rejected the assistance of his friends, and being left to face the danger alone, was astonished with an advice from his minister in Holland, that an invasion was not only projected, but avowed. When he first read the letter, containing this information, he grew pale, and the letter dropped from his hand. He saw the gulph into which he was fallen, and he knew not where to seek for protection. His only resources was in retreating from those various precipitate measures into which he had plunged himself. He paid court to the Dutch, and

(o) Ever since Monmouth's rebellion, the king had, every summer, encamped his army on Hounslow Heath, that he might both improve their discipline, and by so unusual a spectacle overawe the mutinous people. A popish chapel was openly erected in the midst of the camp, and great pains were taken, though in vain, to bring over the soldiers to that communion. The few converts, whom the priests had made, were treated with such contempt and ignominy, as deterred every one from following the example. Even the Irish officers, whom the king introduced into the army, served rather, from the aversion borne them, to weaken his interest among them. It happened, that the very day on which the trial of the bishops was finished, James had reviewed the troops, and had retired into the tent of lord Feversham, the general, to take some refreshment; when he was surprized to hear a great uproar in the camp, attended with the most extravagant symptoms of tumultuary joy. He suddenly inquired the cause, and was told by Feversham, "It was nothing but the rejoicing of the soldiers for the acquittal of the bishops." "Do you call that nothing?" replied he, "but so much the worse for them."

(p) Admiral Herbert, and admiral Russel, assured him in person of their own and the national attachment. Henry Sidney, brother to Algernon, and uncle to the earl of Sunderland, came over to him with assurances of an universal combination against the king. Lord Dumblaine, son to the earl of Danby, being master of a frigate, made several voyages to Holland, and carried from many of the nobility tenders of duty, and even considerable sums of money to the prince of Orange. Soon after the bishop of London, the earls of Danby, Nottingham, Devonshire, Dorset, with several other lords, gentlemen, and principal citizens, united in their addresses to him, and intreated his speedy descent.

offered to enter into any alliance with them for their common security. He replaced in all the counties the deputy-lieutenants and justices, who had been deprived of their commissions for their adherence to the test and penal laws. He restored the charters of such corporations as he had possessed himself of; he annulled the high commission court; he reinstated the expelled president and fellows of Magdalen College; and he was even reduced to caress those bishops, whom he had so lately persecuted and insulted. But all James's concessions were now too late. They were regarded as the symptoms of fear, and not of repentance; as the cowardice of guilt, and not the conviction of error. Indeed he soon shewed the people the insincerity of his reformation; for, hearing that the Dutch fleet was dispersed, he recalled those concessions which he had made in favour of Magdalen College; and, to shew his attachment to the Romish church, at the baptism of his new-born son, he appointed the pope one of the sponsors.

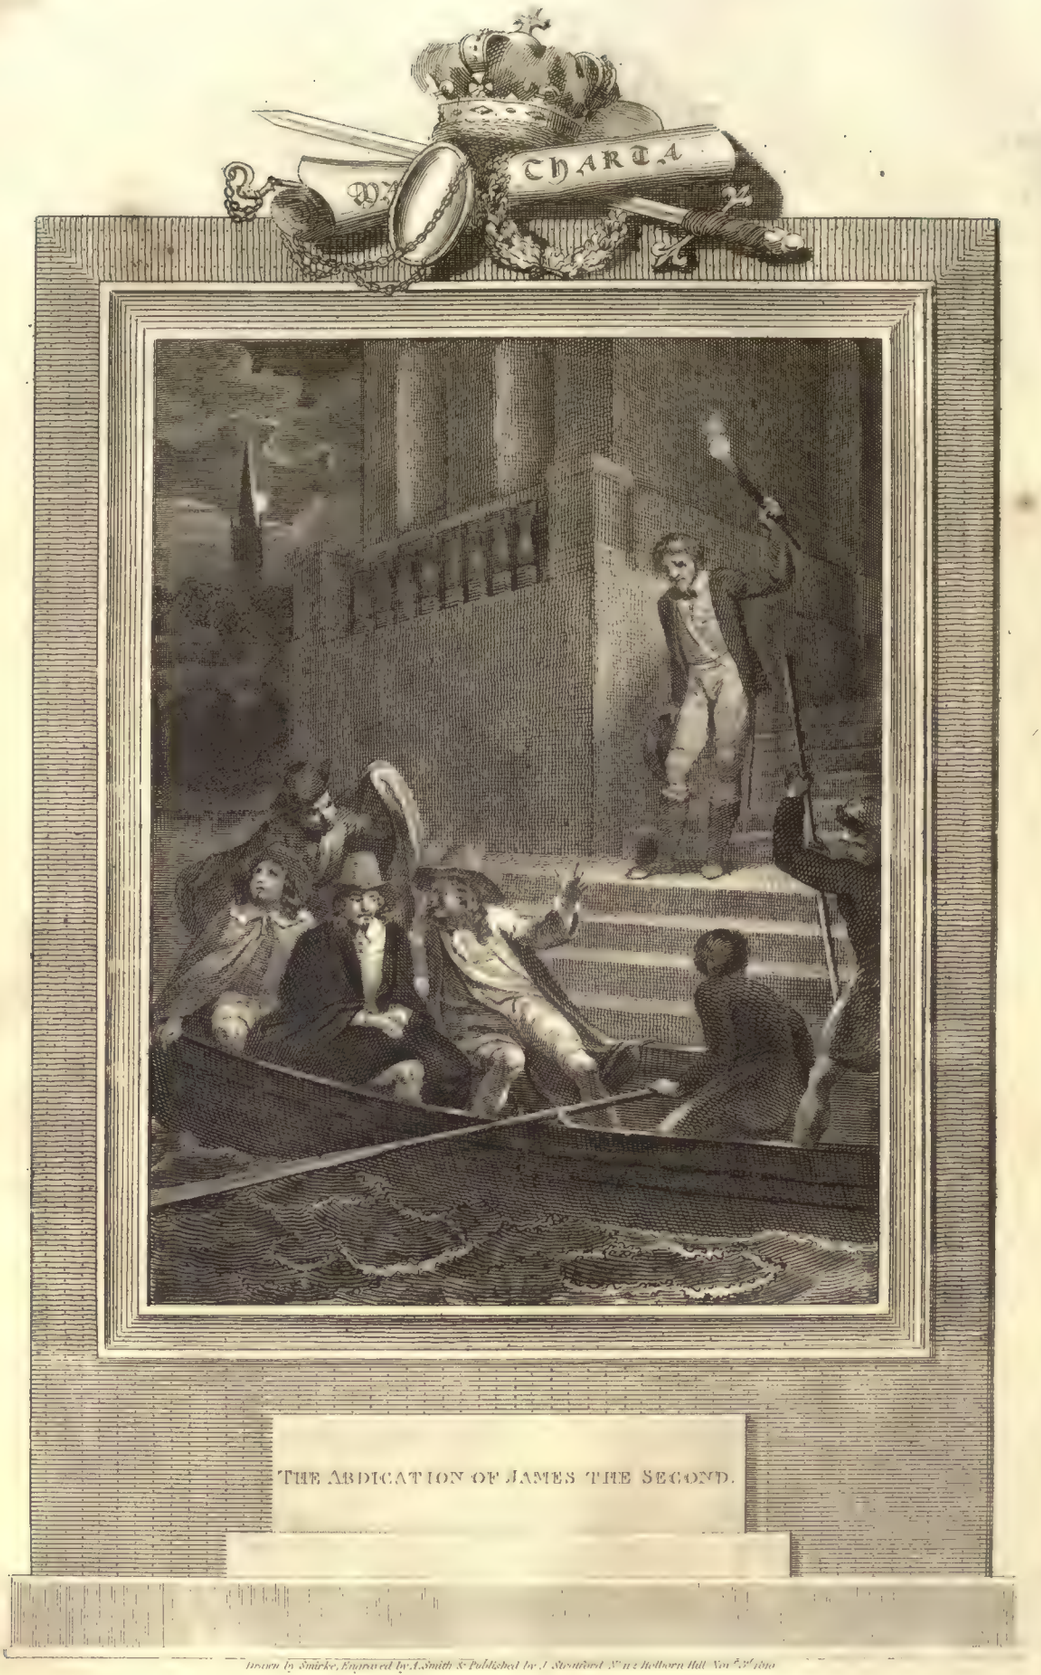
In the mean time the prince of Orange's declaration was dispersed over the kingdom, and met with universal approbation. All the grievances of the nation were then enumerated: the dispensing and suspending power; the court of ecclesiastical commission; the filling of all offices with Catholics, and the raising of a Jesuit to be privy-counsellor; the open encouragement given to popery, by building every where churches, colleges, and seminaries, for that sect; the displacing of judges if they refused to give sentence according to orders received from court; the annulling of the charters of all the corporations, and the subjecting of elections to arbitrary will and pleasure; the treating of petitions, even the most modest, and from persons of the highest rank, as criminal and seditious; the committing of the whole authority of Ireland, civil and military, into the hands of papists; the assuming of an absolute power over the religion and laws of Scotland, and openly exacting in that kingdom an obedience without reserve; and the violent presumptions against the legitimacy of the prince of Wales. In order to redress all these grievances, the prince said that he intended to come over to England with an armed force, which might protect him from the king's evil counsellors; and that his sole aim was to have a legal and free parliament assembled, who might provide for the safety and liberty of the nation, as well as examine the proofs of the prince of Wales's legitimacy. No one, he added, could entertain such hard thoughts of him as to imagine, that he had formed any other design than to procure the full and lasting settlement of religion, liberty, and property. The force which he meant to bring with him was totally disproportioned to any views of conquest; and it were absurd to suspect, that so many persons of high rank, both in church and state, would have given him so many solemn invitations for such a pernicious purpose. Though the English ministers, terrified with his enterprize, had pretended to redress some of the grievances complained of; there still remained the foundation of all grievances, that upon which they could in an instant be again erected, an arbitrary and despotic power in the crown. And for this usurpation there was no possible remedy, but by a full declaration of all the rights of the subject in a free parliament.

So well concerted indeed were the prince's measures, that, in three days, above four hundred transports were hired; the army quickly fell down the rivers and canals from Nimeguen; the artillery, arms, stores, and horses, were embarked; and the prince set sail from Helvoet-Sluys, with a fleet of near five hundred vessels, and an army of above fourteen thousand men, on the 21st of October. He first encountered a storm, which drove him back; but his loss being soon repaired, the fleet put to sea under the command of admiral Herbert, and made sail with a fair wind towards the west of England. The same wind detained the king's fleet in their station near Harwich, and enabled the Dutch to pass the streights of Dover without opposition. Both shores were covered with multitudes of people, who, besides admiring the grandeur of the spectacle, were held in anxious suspense by the prospect of an enterprize, the most important, which, during some ages, had been undertaken in Europe. The prince had a prosperous voyage, and landed his army safely at the village of Broxholme in Torbay on the fifth of November, the anniversary of the gun-powder treason.

The Dutch army marched first to Exeter; and the prince's declaration was there published. That the whole county was so terrified with the executions which had ensued upon Monmouth's rebellion, that no one for several days joined the prince. The bishop of Exeter in a fright fled to London, and carried to court intelligence of the invasion. As a reward for his zeal, he received the archbishopric of York, which had long been kept vacant, with an intention, as was universally believed, of bestowing it on some Catholic. The first person who joined the prince was major Borringdon; and he was quickly followed by the gentry of the counties of Devon and Somerset. Sir Edward Seymour made proposals for an association, which every one signed. By degrees, the earl of Abingdon, Mr. Russel, son of the earl of Bedford, Mr. Wharton, Godfrey, Howe, came to Exeter. All England was in commotion, Lord Delamere took arms in Cheshire, the earl of Danby seized York, the earl of Bath, governor of Plymouth, declared for the prince, the earl of Devonshire made a like declaration in Derby. The nobility and gentry of Nottinghamshire embraced the same cause; and every day there appeared some effect of that universal combination into which the nation had entered against the measures of the king. Even those who took not the field against him, were able to embarrass and confound his counsels. A petition for a free parliament was signed by twenty-four bishops and peers of the greatest distinction, and was presented to the king. No one thought of opposing or resisting the invader.

But the most dangerous symptom was the disaffection which from the general spirit of the nation, not from any particular reason, had creeped into the army. The officers seemed all disposed to prefer the interests of their country and of their religion to those principles of honour and fidelity, which are commonly esteemed the most sacred ties by men of that profession. Lord Colchester, son to the earl of Rivers, was the first officer who deserted to the prince. Lord Lovelace was taken in the like attempt by the militia, under the duke of Beaufort. Lord Cornbury, son to the earl of Clarendon, carried off the greatest part of three regiments of cavalry to the prince: and several officers of distinction informed Feversham, the general, that they could not in conscience fight against the prince of Orange.

The defection of the officers was followed by that of the king's own servants and creatures. Lord Churchill had been raised from the rank of a page, and had been invested with a high command in the army; had been created a peer, and owed his whole fortune to the king's bounty; even he deserted among the rest, and carried with him the duke of Grafton, natural son to the late king, colonel Berkeley, and some others.



In this universal defection, the unfortunate monarch, not knowing where to turn, nor on whom to rely, began to think of requesting assistance from France, but it was now too late. He wrote to Leopold, emperor of Germany, but in vain; for that monarch only returned for answer, that what he had foreseen had happened. James had some dependence on his fleet; but that was entirely disaffected. In a word, his interests were deserted by all; for he had long deserted them himself.

He however repaired to Salisbury, the head quarters of his army, and he found that this body amounted to twenty thousand men. Instead of leading them to the combat he allowed them time to deliberate. Indeed he was involved in a maze of fears and suspicions; the defection of those he most confided in took away his confidence in all, and deprived him even of the power of action. It was likewise no small addition to his present distress that George, prince of Denmark, and Anne, his favourite daughter, resolved to take part with the prevailing side. When informed that the prince and princess had followed the rest of his favourites, he was stung with the most bitter anguish. "God help me," cried he, in the extremity of his agony, "my own children have forsaken me!"

During this distraction and perplexity, he embraced a sudden resolution of drawing off his army, and retiring towards London; a measure which could only serve to betray his fears, and provoke farther treachery. Thus driven to the precipice of his fortunes, invaded by one son-in-law, abandoned by another, despised by his subjects, and hated by those that had suffered beneath his cruelty, he assembled the few noblemen that still adhered to his interests. There, in his forlorn council, he demanded the advice of those he most confided in. Addressing himself to the earl of Bedford, father to lord Russel, who had been executed in the reign of Charles by the intrigues of James, "My lord," said the king, "you are an honest man, have credit, and can do me signal service." "Ah, sir!" replied the earl,

"I

THE ABDICATION OF JAMES THE SECOND.

Drawn by Smirke, Engraved by A. Smith & Published by J. Stockdale N.° 11 Piccadilly Hall Nov.r 30.th 1810

"I am old and feeble; I can do you but little service. I had indeed a son!"—James was so struck with the allusion in this reply, that he could not speak for some minutes.

The king's fortune now exposed him to the contempt of his enemies; and his behaviour was such as could not procure him the esteem of his friends and adherents. He was naturally timid; and some counsellors about him, either sharing his fears, or secretly attached to the prince of Orange, contributed to increase his apprehensions. They reminded him of the fate of his father, and aggravated the turbulence and inconstancy of the people. They at length persuaded him to fly from a nation he could no longer govern, and seek for refuge at the court of France, where he was sure of assistance and protection. The popish courtiers, and above all the priests, were sensible that they would be made the first sacrifice upon the opposite party's prevailing. They were therefore desirous of carrying the king along with them, as his presence would be still their honour and protection abroad.

The prince of Orange was no less desirous of the king's flying over to France than his most zealous counsellors could be. He was determined to use every expedient to intimidate the king, and drive him out of the kingdom. He declined treating with the king's commissioners, and sent the earls of Clarendon and Oxford to treat with them. The terms which he proposed implied almost a present participation of the sovereignty; and to urge his measures, he stopped not a moment in his march towards London.

The king, alarmed every day more and more by the prospect of a general disaffection, was resolved to hearken to those who advised his quitting the kingdom. To prepare for this he first sent away the queen, who arrived safely at Calais, under the conduct of the count de Lauzun, an old favourite of the French king. James himself soon after disappeared in the night time, attended only by sir Edward Hales, a new convert; and, disguising himself in a plain dress, went to Feversham in Kent, where he embarked on board a small vessel for France. But his misfortunes still continued to pursue him. The vessel in which he had embarked was detained by the populace, who, not knowing the person of the king, robbed, insulted, and abused him. He was now persuaded by the earl of Winchester to return to London, where the mob, moved by his distresses, and guided by their natural levity, received him, contrary to his expectations, with shouts and acclamations.

Indeed nothing could be more disagreeable to the prince of Orange than to hear that James was brought back to his capital. The prince had before taken measures to seize upon that authority, which the king's dereliction had put into his hands. The bishops and peers, who were now the only authorized magistrates in the state, gave directions in the present dissolution of government, for keeping the peace of the city. They issued orders, which were readily obeyed, to the fleet, the garrisons, and the army (q). They made applications to the prince, whose enterprize they highly applauded, and whose success they joyfully congratulated. It was not therefore, without extreme mortification, that he found the king returned once more to embarrass his proceedings.

William, however, determined to dissemble, and received the news of his return with an haughty air. His aim from the beginning was to cause James to relinquish the throne; and his proceedings argued the refined politician. The king having sent lord Feversham on a civil message to the prince, desiring a conference previous to the settlement of the throne, that nobleman was put under arrest, on pretence of his wanting a passport. The Dutch guards were ordered to take possession of Whitehall, where the king then lodged, and to displace the English. The king was soon after commanded, by a message which he received in bed at midnight, to leave his palace next morning, and to depart for Ham, a seat belonging to the duchess of Lauderdale. He desired permission to retire to Rochester, which was readily granted him; and it was now perceived that James was meditating an escape from the kingdom. He lingered, however, some days at Rochester, under the protection of a Dutch guard, and seemed desirous of an invitation still to keep possession of the throne. He was undoubtedly sensible, that, as he had at first trusted too much to his people's loyalty, and, in confidence of their submission, had offered the greatest violence to their principles and prejudices; so had he, at last, on finding his disappointment, gone too far in the other extreme, and had hastily supposed them destitute of all sense of duty or allegiance. But observing that the church, the nobility, the city, the country, all concurred in neglecting him, and leaving him to his own counsels, he submitted to his melancholy fate; and being urged by earnest letters from the queen, he privately embarked on board a frigate (on the 23rd of December, attended by his natural son the duke of Berwick) which waited for him; and he arrived safely at Ambleteuse in Picardy, whence he hastened to St. Germain. Louis received him with the highest generosity, sympathy, and regard; a conduct which, more than his most signal victories, contributes to the honour of that great monarch.

Thus the courage and abilities of the prince of Orange, seconded by surprizing fortune, effected the deliverance of this island; and thus with very little effusion of blood (for only one officer of the Dutch army and a few private soldiers fell in an accidental skirmish) had dethroned a great prince, supported by a formidable fleet and a numerous army. Still the more difficult task remained, and what perhaps the prince regarded as not the least important: the obtaining for himself that crown, which had fallen from the head of his father-in-law. Some lawyers, entangled in the subtilties and forms of their profession, could think of no expedient, but that the prince should claim the crown by right of conquest; should immediately assume the title of sovereign; and should call a parliament, which, being thus legally summoned by a king in possession, could ratify whatever had been transacted before they assembled. But this measure, being destructive of the principles of liberty, the only principles on which his future throne could be established, was prudently rejected by the prince, who, finding himself possessed of the good-will of the nation, resolved to leave them entirely to their own guidance and direction. The peers and bishops, to the number of near ninety, made an address, desiring him to summon a convention by circular letters; to assume, in the mean time, the management of public affairs; and to concert measures for the security of Ireland. At the same time, they refused reading a letter, which the king had left, in order to apologize for his late desertion, by the violence which had been put upon him. This step was a sufficient indication of their intentions with regard to that unhappy monarch.

The prince of Orange, however, seemed still unwilling to act upon an authority, which might be deemed so imperfect: he was desirous of obtaining a more express declaration of the public consent. A judicious expedient was fallen on for that purpose. All the members, who had sitten in the house of commons during any parliament of Charles II. were invited to meet; and to them were added the mayor, aldermen, and fifty of the common council of the city of London. This was regarded as the most proper representative of the people that could be summoned on the present occasion. They voted the same address with the lords; and the prince, being thus supported by all the legal authority which could possibly be obtained in this critical juncture, wrote circular letters to the counties and corporations of England; and his orders were universally complied with. A profound tranquillity prevailed throughout the kingdom; and the prince's administration was submitted to, as if he had succeeded in the most regular manner to the vacant throne. The fleet received his orders: the army allowed him to new-model them; and the city supplied him with a loan of two hundred thousand pounds.

The conduct of the prince, with regard to Scotland, was founded on the same prudent and moderate maxims. Finding that there were many Scotchmen of rank at that time in London, he summoned them together on the 7th of January, 1689, laid before them his intentions, and asked their advice in the present emergency. This assembly, consisting of thirty noblemen and about fourscore gentlemen, chose duke Hamilton president. The duke's eldest son, the earl of Arran, professed an adherence to king James, and proposed to invite back the king upon conditions; but as he was vehemently opposed by sir Patrick Hume, the assembly made an offer to the prince of Orange of the present administration, which he willingly accepted. To anticipate a little in our narration; a convention, by circular letters from the prince, was summoned at Edinburgh on the 22nd of March; where it was soon visible, that the interest of the malcontents would entirely prevail. As soon as the purpose of the convention was discovered, the earl of Balcarrass and viscount Dundee, leaders of the tories, withdrew from Edinburgh; and the convention having passed a bold and decisive vote, that king James, by his mal-administration and his abuse of power, had forfeited all title to the crown, they made a tender of the royal dignity to the prince and princess of Orange.

(q) Among other acts of authority, the peers imprisoned the lord chancellor Jefferies. That infamous minister, dreading the vengeance of the people, had disguised himself with a view of escaping beyond sea; but, being discovered at Wapping, he was for some time in great danger of being torn in pieces by the fury of the rabble. Being rescued from this peril, he was committed to the Tower, where he soon after died of a fever, which is supposed to have been occasioned by the anxiety of his mind, and the intemperance in which he indulged himself, with a view of drowning all reflections on his guilt, and dissipating the dread of public punishment. He was privately buried, but the place of his interment was concealed. It has, however, lately been ascertained to have been in the parish church of St. Mary, Aldermanbury, where, in 1810, while that church was under repair, the lord-chancellor's coffin was discovered under the communion table.

The English convention was assembled on the 22nd of January; and it immediately appeared, that the house of commons were mostly chosen from among the Whig party. After thanks were unanimously given by both houses to the prince of Orange, for the deliverance which he had brought them, a less decisive vote than that of the Scottish convention was in a few days passed by a great majority of the commons, and sent up to the peers for their concurrence. It was contained in these words: "That king James II. having endeavoured to subvert the constitution of the kingdom, by breaking the original contract between king and people; and having, by the advice of Jesuits and other wicked persons, violated the fundamental laws, and withdrawn himself out of the kingdom, has abdicated the government, and that the throne is thereby vacant." This vote, when carried to the upper house, met with great opposition.

The Tories and the high-church party were inclined to steer a middle course; and, though generally determined to oppose the king's return, they resolved not to consent to dethroning him, or altering the line of succession. A regent with kingly power was the expedient they proposed. In favour of this scheme the Tories urged, that, by the uniform tenor of the English laws, the title to the crown was ever regarded as sacred, and could, on no account, and by no mal-administration, be forfeited by the sovereign: that to dethrone a king and to elect his successor, was a practice unknown to the constitution, and had a tendency to render kingly power dependent and precarious: that where the sovereign, from his tender years, from lunacy, or from other natural infirmity, was incapacitated to hold the reins of government, both the laws and former practice agreed in appointing a regent, who, during the interval, was invested with the whole power of the administration: that the inveterate and dangerous prejudices of king James had rendered him as unfit to sway the English sceptre, as if he had fallen into lunacy; and it was therefore natural for the people to have recourse to the same remedy: that the election of one king was a precedent for the election of another; and the government, by that means, would either degenerate into a republic, or, what was worse, into a turbulent and seditious monarchy: that the case was still more dangerous, if there remained a prince, who claimed the crown by right of succession, and disputed, on so plausible a ground, the title of the present sovereign: that though the doctrine of non-resistance might not, in every possible circumstance, be absolutely true, yet was the belief of it very expedient; and to establish a government, which should have the contrary principle for its basis, was to lay a foundation for perpetual revolutions and convulsions: that the appointment of a regent was indeed exposed to many inconveniencies; but so long as the line of succession was preserved entire, there was still a prospect of putting an end to the public disorders: and that scarcely an instance occurred in history, especially in the English history, where a disputed title had not, in the issue, been attended with much greater ills, than all which the people had sought to shun, by departing from the lineal successor.

The leaders of the Whig party, on the other hand, asserted, that, if there were any ill in the precedent, that ill would result as much from establishing a regent, as from dethroning one king, and appointing his successor; nor would the one expedient, if wantonly and rashly embraced by the people, be less the source of public convulsions than the other: that if the laws gave no express permission to depose the sovereign, neither did they authorize resisting his authority, or separating the power from the title: that a regent was unknown, except where the king, by reason of his tender age or his infirmities, was incapable of a will; and in that case, his will was supposed to be involved in that of the regent: that it would be the height of absurdity to try a man for acting upon a commission, received from a prince, whom we ourselves acknowledge to be the lawful sovereign; and no jury would decide so contrary both to law and common sense, as to condemn such a pretended criminal: that even the prospect of being delivered from this monstrous inconvenience was, in the present situation of affairs, more distant than that of putting an end to a disputed succession: that allowing the young prince to be the legitimate heir, he had been carried abroad; he would be educated in principles destructive of the constitution and established religion; and he would probably leave a son, liable to the same insuperable objection: that if the whole line were cut off by law, the people would in time forget or neglect their claim; an advantage which could not be hoped for, while the administration was conducted in their name, and while they were still acknowledged to possess the legal title: and that a nation thus perpetually governed by regents or protectors, approached much nearer to a republic than one subject to monarchs, whose hereditary regular succession, as well as present authority, was fixed and appointed by the people.

This question was agitated with great zeal by the opposite parties in the house of peers. The chief speakers among the Tories were Clarendon, Rochester, and Nottingham; among the Whigs, Halifax and Danby. The question was carried for a king by two voices only, fifty-one against forty-nine. All the prelates, except two, the bishops of London and Bristol, voted for a regent. The primate, a disinterested but pusillanimous man, kept at a distance, both from the prince's court and from parliament.

The house of peers proceeded next to examine the vote sent up to them by the commons. They debated, "Whether there were an original contract between king and people?" and the affirmative was carried by fifty-three against forty-six; a proof that the Tories were already losing ground. The next question was, "Whether king James had broken that original contract?" and, after a slight opposition, the affirmative prevailed. The lords proceeded to take into consideration the word abdicated; and it was carried that deserted was more proper. The concluding question was, "Whether king James, having broken the original contract, and deserted the government, the throne was thereby vacant?" This question was debated with more heat and contention than any of the former; and upon a division, the Tories prevailed by eleven voices, and it was carried to omit the last article, with regard to the vacancy of the throne. The vote was sent back to the commons with these amendments.

The earl of Danby had entertained the project of bestowing the crown solely upon the princess of Orange, and of admitting her as hereditary legal successor to king James; passing by the infant prince, as illegitimate or suppositious. His change of party in the last question gave the Tories so considerable a majority in the number of voices.

The commons still insisted on their own vote, and sent up reasons why the lords should depart from their amendments. The lords were not convinced; and it was necessary to have a free conference, in order to settle this controversy. A vehement debate took place on this occasion, and it was argued whether the crown should be declared forfeited or abdicated. It was also strenuously maintained, as a maxim of English law, that the throne was never vacant; but instantly, upon the demise of one king, was filled with his legal heir, who was entitled to all the authority of his predecessor. During these debates, a great part of which was mere declamation without much solidity of reasoning, the prince entered into no intrigues, either with the electors or the members: he kept himself in a total silence, as if he had been nowise concerned in these transactions: and, so far from forming cabals with the leaders of parties, he disdained even to bestow caresses on those whose assistance might be useful to him. This conduct was highly meritorious, and discovered great moderation and magnanimity; even though the prince unfortunately, through the whole course of his life, and on every occasion, was noted for an address so cold, dry, and distant, that it was very difficult for him, on account of any interest, to soften or familiarize it. At length, the prince broke silence, and expressed, though in a private manner, his sentiments on the present situation of affairs. He called together Hallifax, Shrewsbury, Danby, and a few more; and told them, that having been invited over to restore their liberty, he had engaged in this enterprize, and had at last happily effected his purpose. That it belonged to the parliament, now chosen and assembled with freedom, to concert measures for the public settlement; and he pretended not to interpose in their determinations. That he heard of several schemes proposed for establishing the government: some insisted on a regent; others were desirous of bestowing the crown on the princess: it was their concern alone to chuse the plan of administration most agreeable or advantageous to them. That if they judged it proper to settle a regent, he had no objection: he only thought it incumbent on him to inform them, that he was determined not to be the regent, nor ever to engage in a scheme which, he knew, would be exposed to such insuperable difficulties. That no man could have a juster or deeper sense of the princess's merit than he was impressed with; but he would rather remain a private person than enjoy a crown which must depend on the will or life of another. And that they must therefore make account, if they were inclined to either of these two plans of settlement, that it would be totally out of his power to assist them in carrying it into execution; his affairs abroad were too important to be abandoned for so precarious a dignity, or even to allow him so much leisure as would be requisite to introduce order into their disjointed government.

These laudable views of the prince were seconded by the princess herself, who, as she possessed many virtues, was a most obsequious wife to a husband, who, in the judgement of the generality of her sex, would have appeared so little attractive and amiable. All considerations were neglected, when they came in competition with what she deemed her duty to the prince. When Danby and others of her partizans wrote her an account of their schemes and proceedings, she expressed great displeasure; and even transmitted their letters to her husband, as a sacrifice to conjugal fidelity. The princess Anne likewise concurred in the same plan for the public settlement; and being promised an ample revenue, was content to be postponed in the succession to the crown. And as the title of her infant brother was, in the present establishment, entirely neglected, she might, upon the whole, deem herself, in point of interest, a considerable gainer by this revolution in the affairs of the kingdom.

The principal parties therefore being agreed, the convention passed a bill, in which they settled the crown on the prince and princess of Orange, the sole administration to remain in the prince: the princess Anne of Denmark to succeed after the death of the prince and princess of Orange; her posterity after those of the princess, but before those of the prince by any other wife. The convention annexed to this settlement of the crown a declaration of rights, wherein all the points which had, of late years, been disputed between the king and the people, were finally determined; and the powers of royal prerogative were more narrowly circumscribed and more exactly defined, than in any former period of the English government.

Of the character of James the Second as a monarch it may be necessary to speak. His talents did not arise above mediocrity; they were neither contemptibly dull, nor eminently brilliant. He cultivated them with great assiduity; and at length attained, by indefatigable diligence, such a degree of knowledge as would have enabled him to fill the throne with reputation, had not his pertinacious adherence to an odious superstition vitiated all his attainments, hurried him into intemperate measures, and precipitated him from the sovereign of three kingdoms into an abyss of ruin and disgrace. He was remarkably attentive to every branch of public affairs, and studiously informed himself of the particular as well as general interests of his people. He entered with great zeal into the concerns of navigation and commerce; improved and augmented the maritime force of the realm; and introduced into the naval service an order and discipline which had been before neglected. He managed his revenue with care and frugality, and vigilantly superintended the official conduct of his ministers. He was firm and persevering in his enterprizes; bold and open in his designs; and generally upright and honourable in those transactions in which religion had no concern. He was steady in his political attachments, as well as in those of love and friendship. His personal courage was respectable, and had been displayed, before his accession, both in the military and naval departments; but, in the decline of life, he seems to have been enervated by superstition, and to have lost all the manly spirit of his youth. An invincible bigotry to the Romish persuasion, and an implicit adoption of those extravagant notions of the royal prerogative, to which the princes of the house of Stuart were so remarkably devoted, were the undoubted causes of James's ruin. He considered himself as the vicegerent of Heaven, ruling by indefeasible right over a herd of slaves. The laws of the realm, he thought, were only obligatory on the people; and, as the established religion of the country was inconsistent with his own creed, he deemed the private ties of his perverted conscience a sufficient reason for offering violence and insult to the religious sentiments of the community. He was encouraged in his views by the strong declarations of unreserved obedience and blind submission, which the Tories, during their temporary triumph over the Whigs, had lavished on the crown; but when he had invaded the constitution, and aimed at the subversion of the protestant establishment, he found that those from whom he expected a full submission to his will, were more inclined to practise the maxims of their adversaries, than to follow the servile lessons which had been lately inculcated by themselves.

In his exterior demeanour James was courteous and polite; but he had not that graceful address, or that suavity of manners, which distinguished his brother Charles the Second. In the domestic relations of life, he was mild and humane; though, in his public character he was barbarously severe and vindictive. He was temperate, but not chaste; for even his pretensions to the praise of piety, and the remonstrances of father Petre, his confessor and chief counsellor, could not restrain him from indulging himself in adulterous commerce (r).

CHAP. IX.

Observations on the Manners, Finances, Arms, Commerce, and the Arts and Sciences of the Kingdom.

IT may not be improper at this period, to take a general survey of the age, so far as regards its manners, finances, arms, commerce, arts and sciences. The chief use of history is, that it affords materials for disquisitions of this nature; and it seems the duty of an historian to point out the proper inferences and conclusions.

No nation could undergo a change more sudden and entire in their manners, than did the English during this period. From tranquillity, concord, submission, sobriety, they passed in an instant to a state of faction, fanaticism, rebellion, and almost frenzy. The violence of the English parties exceeded any thing which we can now imagine: had they continued but a little longer, there was just reason to dread all the horrors of the ancient massacres and proscriptions. The military usurpers would, doubtless, have been impelled into such sanguinary measures; and if these expedients had been employed on one side, revenge would naturally have pushed the other party, after a return of power, to retaliate upon their enemies. No social intercourse was maintained between the parties; no marriages or alliances contracted. The royalists, though oppressed, harassed, and persecuted, disdained all affinity with their masters. The more they were reduced to subjection, the greater superiority did they affect above those persons, who had acquired an ascendant over them.

The manners of the two factions were as opposite as those of the most distant nations. "Your friends, the Cavaliers," said a parliamentarian to a royalist, "are very dissolute and debauched." "True," replied the royalist, "they have the infirmities of men; but your friends, the Round-heads, have the vices of devils, tyranny, rebellion, and spiritual pride (s)." Riot and disorder, it is certain, prevailed very much among the partizans of (r) By his first wife, the daughter of lord chancellor Clarendon, James had four sons, all of whom died in their infancy; and four daughters, one only of whom (Anne) survived him. By the princess of Modena, his second wife, he had two sons and four daughters. Five natural children, of whom the duke of Berwick was the most distinguished, are attributed to him.

Charles the First. Being commonly men of birth and fortune, they indulged themselves in all pleasures, particularly those of the table. This good fellowship, as they called it, was affected among them, as a sure pledge of attachment to the church and monarchy. Even when ruined by confiscations and sequestrations, they endeavoured to maintain the appearance of a careless and social jollity. "As much as hope is superior to fear," said a poor and merry cavalier, "so much is our situation preferable to that of our enemies. We laugh while they tremble."

The gloomy enthusiasm which prevailed among the parliamentary party, is the most curious spectacle presented by any history. All recreations were in a manner suspended by the rigid severity of the presbyterians and independents. Horse-races and cock-matches were prohibited as enormities (t). Bear-baiting was esteemed an heathenish and unchristian sport; which gave great offence by reason of its inhumanity. Colonel Hewson, from his pious zeal, marched with his regiment into London, and destroyed all the bears, which were there kept for what was called the diversion of the citizens. This adventure seems to have given birth to the fiction of Hudibras.

We have had occasion, in the course of this work, to speak of many of the sects which prevailed in England: to enumerate them all would be impossible. The quakers, however, are so considerable, at least so singular, as to merit some attention; and as they renounced by principle the use of arms, they never made such a figure in public transactions as to enter into any part of our narrative.

The religion of the quakers, like most others, began with the lowest vulgar, and, in its progress, came at last to comprehend people of better quality and fashion. George Fox, born at Drayton in Lancashire, in 1624, was the founder of this sect. He was the son of a weaver, and was himself bound apprentice to a shoe-maker. Feeling a stronger impulse towards spiritual contemplations than towards that mechanical profession, he left his master, and went about the country clothed in a leathern doublet, a dress which he long affected, as well for its singularity as its cheapness. That he might wean himself from sublunary objects, he broke off all connexions with his friends and family, and never dwelled long in one place; lest habit should beget new connexions, and depress the sublimity of his aërial meditations. He frequently wandered into the woods, and passed whole days in hollow trees, without company, or any other amusement than his Bible. Having reached that pitch of perfection as to need no other book, he soon advanced to another state of spiritual progress, and began to pay less regard even to that divine composition itself. His own breast, he imagined, was full of the same inspiration which had guided the prophets and apostles themselves; and by this inward light must every spiritual obscurity be cleared; by this living spirit must the dead letter be animated. When he had been sufficiently consecrated in his own imagination, he felt that the fumes of self-applause soon dissipate, if not continually supplied by the admiration of others; and he began to seek proselytes. Proselytes were easily gained, at a time when all men's affections were turned towards religion, and when the most extravagant modes of it were sure to be most popular. All the forms of ceremony, invented by pride and ostentation, Fox and his disciples, from a superior pride and ostentation, carefully rejected: even the ordinary rites of civility were shunned, as the nourishment of carnal vanity and self-conceit. They would bestow no titles of distinction: the name of friend was the only salutation with which they indiscriminately accosted every one. To no person would they make a bow, or move their hat, or give any signs of reverence. Instead of that affected adulation, introduced into modern tongues, of speaking to individuals as if they were a multitude, they returned to the simplicity of ancient languages; and thou and thee were the only expressions which, on any consideration, they could be brought to employ. Dress too, a material circumstance, distinguished the members of this sect. Every superfluity and ornament was carefully retrenched: no plaits to their coat, no buttons to their sleeves: no lace, no ruffles, no embroidery. Even a button to the hat, though sometimes useful, yet not being always so, was universally rejected by them with horror and detestation.

The violent enthusiasm of this sect, like all high passions, being too strong for the weak nerves to sustain, threw the preachers into convulsions, and shakings, and distortions in their limbs; and they thence received the appellation of quakers. Amidst the great toleration which was then granted to all sects, and even encouragement given to all innovations, this sect alone suffered persecution. From the fervour of their zeal, the quakers broke into churches, disturbed public worship, and harassed the minister and audience with railing and reproaches. When carried before a magistrate, they refused him all reverence, and treated him with the same familiarity as if he had been their equal. Sometimes they were thrown into madhouses, sometimes into prisons; sometimes whipped, sometimes placed on the pillory. The patience and fortitude with which they suffered, begat compassion, admiration, esteem (u). A supernatural spirit was believed to support them under those sufferings, which the ordinary state of humanity, freed from the illusions of passion, is unable to sustain. The quakers creeped into the army: but as they preached universal peace, they seduced the military zealots from their profession, and would soon, had they been suffered, have put an end, without any defeat or calamity, to the dominion of those religious partizans. These attempts became a fresh ground of persecution, and a new reason for their progress among the people.

Morals with this sect were carried, or affected to be carried, to the same degree of extravagance as religion. The greatest interest could not engage a quaker, in any court of judicature, to swear even to the truth: he never asked more for his wares than the precise sum which he was determined to accept. This last maxim is laudable, and continues even at the present day to be religiously observed by that sect. No fanatics ever carried farther the hatred to ceremonies, forms, orders, rites, and positive institutions. Even baptism and the Lord's supper, by all other sects believed to be interwoven with the very vitals of Christianity, were disdainfully rejected by them. The very sabbath they profaned. The holiness of churches they derided; and they would give to these sacred edifices no other appellation than that of shops or steeple-houses. No priests were admitted in their sect: every one had received from immediate illumination a character much superior to the sacerdotal. When they met for divine worship, each rose up in his place, and delivered the extemporary inspirations of the Holy Ghost: women also were admitted to teach the brethren, and were considered as proper vehicles to convey the dictates of the spirit. Sometimes a great many preachers were moved to speak at once: sometimes a total silence prevailed in their congregations, and they returned from their places of worship without a word having been spoken by any person. It is likewise customary for the men to sit in their religious assemblies with their hats on, and the women with their bonnets off.

Some quakers attempted to fast forty days in imitation of Christ; and one of them bravely perished in the experiment (v). A female quaker came naked into the church where the protector sate; being moved by the spirit, as she said, to appear as a sign to the people. A number of them fancied, that the renovation of all things had commenced, and that clothes were to be rejected together with other superfluities. The sufferings which followed the practice of this doctrine, were a species of persecution not well calculated for promoting it.

James Naylor was a quaker, noted for blasphemy, or rather madness, in the time of the protectorship. He fancied that he himself was transformed into Christ, and was become the real Saviour of the world; and in consequence of this frenzy, he endeavoured to imitate many actions of the Messiah related in the Evangelists. As he bore a resemblance to the common pictures of Christ; he allowed his beard to grow in a like form: he raised a person from the dead (w): he was ministered unto by women (x): he entered Bristol mounted on a horse; perhaps from the difficulty in that place of finding an ass: his (u) The following story is told by Whitlocke, p. 599. Some quakers at Hasington in Northumberland coming to the minister on the Sabbath day and speaking to him, the people fell upon the quakers, and almost killed one or two of them, who going out fell on their knees, and prayed God to pardon the people, who knew not what they did; and afterwards speaking to the people, so convinced them of the evil they had done in beating them, that the country people fell a quarrelling, and beat one another more than they had before beaten the quakers.

disciples spread their garments before him, and cried, "Hosannah to the highest; holy, holy, is the Lord God of Sabbaoth." When carried before the magistrate, he would give no other answer to all questions than "thou hast said it." What is remarkable, the parliament thought that the matter deserved their attention. Near ten days they spent in inquiries and debates about him (y). They condemned him to be pilloried, whipped, burned in the face, and to have his tongue bored through with a red-hot iron. All these severities he bore with the usual patience. But the sequel spoiled all. He was sent to Bridewell, confined to hard labour, fed on bread and water, and debarred from all his disciples, male and female. His illusion dissipated; and after some time, he was contented to come out an ordinary man, and return to his usual occupations.

The chief taxes in England, during the time of the commonwealth, were the monthly assessments, the excise, and the customs. The assessments were levied on personal estates as well as on land (z); and commissioners were appointed in each county for rating the individuals. The highest assessment amounted to one hundred and twenty thousand pounds a-month in England; the lowest was thirty-five thousand. The assessments in Scotland were sometimes ten thousand pounds a-month (a); commonly six thousand. Those on Ireland nine thousand. At a medium, this tax might have afforded about a million a-year. The excise, during the civil wars, was levied on bread, flesh-meat, as well as beer, ale, strong waters, and many other commodities. After the king was subdued, bread and flesh-meat were exempted from excise. The customs on exportation were lowered in 1656 (b). In 1650, commissioners were appointed to levy both customs and excises. Cromwell in 1657 returned to the old practice of farming. Eleven hundred thousand pounds were then offered, both for customs and excise, a greater sum than had ever been levied by the commissioners (c): the whole taxes during that period might at a medium amount to above two millions a-year; a sum which, though moderate, much exceeded the revenue of any former king (d). Sequestrations, compositions, sale of crown and church lands, and of the lands of delinquents, yielded also considerable sums, but very difficult to be estimated. Church lands are said to have been sold for a million (e). None of these were ever valued at above ten or eleven years purchase (f). The estates of delinquents amounted to above two hundred thousand pounds a-year (g). Cromwell died more than two millions in debt (h); though the parliament had left him in the treasury above five hundred thousand pounds; and in stores, the value of seven hundred thousand pounds (i).

The committee of danger, in April 1648, voted to raise the army to forty thousand men (k). The same year, the pay of the army was estimated at eighty thousand pounds a-month (l). The establishment of the army in 1652, was in Scotland fifteen thousand foot, two thousand five hundred and eighty horse, five hundred and sixty dragoons; in England, four thousand seven hundred foot, two thousand five hundred and twenty horse, garrisons six thousand one hundred and fifty-four. In all, thirty-one thousand five hundred and nineteen, besides officers (m). The army in Scotland was afterwards considerably reduced. The army in Ireland was not much short of twenty thousand men; so that upon the whole, the commonwealth maintained in 1652 a standing army of more than fifty thousand men. Its pay amounted to a yearly sum of one million forty-seven thousand seven hundred and fifteen pounds (n). Afterwards the protector reduced the establishment to thirty thousand men, as appears by the Instrument of Government and Humble Petition and Advice. His frequent enterprizes obliged him from time to time to augment them. Richard had on foot in England an army of thirteen thousand two hundred and fifty-eight men, in Scotland nine thousand five hundred and six, in Ireland about ten thousand men (o). The foot soldiers had commonly a shilling a-day (p). The horse had two shillings and six-pence; so that many gentlemen and younger brothers of good family inlisted in the protector's cavalry (q). We need not wonder then that such men were averse from the re-establishment of civil government, by which, they well knew, they must be deprived of so gainful a profession.

At the time when Cromwell fought against Charles, and gained the battle of Worcester, the parliament had on foot about eighty thousand men, partly militia, partly regular forces. The vigour of the commonwealth, and the great capacity of those members who were at the head of the government, never at any time appeared so conspicuous (r).

The whole revenue of the public, during the protectorship of Richard, was estimated at one million eight hundred and sixty-eight thousand seven hundred and seventeen pounds: his annual expences at two millions two hundred and one thousand five hundred and forty pounds. An additional revenue was demanded from parliament (s).

The revenue of Charles II. as settled by the long parliament, was put upon a very bad footing. It was too small, if they intended to make him independent in the common course of his administration: it was too large, and settled during too long a period, if they resolved to keep him in entire dependence. The great debts of the republic, which were thrown upon that prince; the necessity of supplying the naval and military stores, which were entirely exhausted (t); that of repairing and furnishing his palaces: all these causes involved the king in great difficulties immediately after his restoration; and the parliament was not sufficiently liberal in supplying him. Perhaps too he had contracted some debts abroad; and his bounty to the distressed cavaliers, though it did not correspond either to their services or expectations, could not fail, in some degree, to exhaust his treasury. The extraordinary sums granted the king during the first years, did not suffice for these extraordinary expences; and the excise and customs, the only constant revenue, amounted not to nine hundred thousand pounds a-year, and fell much short of the ordinary burdens of government. The addition of hearth-money in 1662, and of other two branches in 1669 and 1670, brought up the revenue to one million three hundred and fifty-eight thousand pounds, as we learn from lord Danby's account: but the same authority informs us, that the yearly expence of government was at that time one million three hundred eighty-seven thousand seven hundred and seventy pounds (u); without mentioning contingencies, which are always considerable, even under the most prudent administration. Those branches of revenue, granted in 1669 and 1670, expired in 1680, and were never renewed by parliament: they were computed to be above two hundred thousand pounds a-year. It must be allowed, because asserted by all cotemporary authors of both parties, and even confessed by himself, that Charles the Second was profuse and negligent. But it is likewise certain, that a rigid frugality was requisite to support the government under such difficulties.

If we estimate the ordinary revenue of Charles II. at one million two hundred thousand pounds a-year during his whole reign, the whole computation will rather exceed than fall below the true value. The convention parliament, after all the sums which they had granted the king towards the payment of old debts, threw, the last day of their meeting, a debt upon him amounting to one million seven hundred forty-three thousand two hundred and sixty-three pounds (v). All the extraordinary sums which were afterwards voted him by parliament, amounted to eleven millions four hundred forty-three thousand four hundred and seven pounds. To these sums we must add about one million two hundred thousand pounds, which had been detained from the bankers on shutting up the Exchequer in 1672. The king payed six per cent. for this money during the rest of his reign (w). It is remarkable, that notwithstanding this violent breach of faith, the king, two years after, borrowed money at eight per cent.; the same rate of interest which he had paid before that event (x).

The revenue of James the Second was raised by parliament to about one million eight hundred and fifty thousand pounds (y); and his income, as duke of York, being added, made the whole amount to two millions a-year; a sum well proportioned to the public necessities, but enjoyed by him in too independent a manner. The national debt at the revolution amounted to one million fifty-four thousand nine hundred and twenty-five pounds (z).

The commerce and industry of England increased extremely during the peaceable period of Charles the First's reign: the trade to the East-Indies and to Guinea became considerable. The English possessed almost the sole trade with Spain. Twenty thousand cloths were annually sent to Turkey (a). Commerce met with many interruptions, no doubt, from the civil wars and convulsions which afterwards prevailed; though it soon recovered after the establishment of the commonwealth. The war with the Dutch, by distressing the commerce of so formidable a rival, served to encourage trade in England: the Spanish war was to an equal degree pernicious. All the effects of the English merchants, to an immense value, were confiscated in Spain. The prevalence of democratical principles engaged the country gentlemen to bind their sons apprentices to merchants (b); and commerce has ever since been more honourable in England than in any other European kingdom. The exclusive companies, which formerly confined trade, was never expressly abolished by any ordinance of parliament during the commonwealth; but as men paid no regard to the prerogative whence the charters of these companies were derived, the monopoly was gradually invaded, and commerce increased by the increase of liberty. Interest in 1659 was reduced to six per cent.

The customs in England, before the civil wars, are said to have amounted to five hundred thousand pounds a-year (c): a sum ten times greater than during the best period in queen Elizabeth's reign: but there is probably some exaggeration in this matter.

The post-house in 1633, was farmed at ten thousand pounds a-year, which was deemed a considerable sum for the three kingdoms. Letters paid only about a fourth part of the present postage.

From 1619 to 1638, there had been coined six million nine hundred thousand and forty-two pounds. From 1638 to 1657, the coinage amounted to seven million seven hundred and thirty-three thousand five hundred and twenty-one pounds (d). Dr. Davenant has told us, from the registers of the mint, that between 1558 and 1659, there had been coined nineteen million eight hundred and thirty-two thousand four hundred and seventy-six pounds in gold and silver.

The first mention of tea, coffee, and chocolate, is about 1660 (e). Asparagus, artichokes, cauliflowers, and a variety of sallads, were about the same time introduced into England (f).

The colony of New England increased by means of the puritans, who fled thither, in order to free themselves from the constraint which archbishop Laud and the church party had imposed upon them; and, before the commencement of the civil wars, it is supposed to have contained twenty-five thousand souls (g). For a like reason, the Catholics, afterwards, who found themselves exposed to many hardships, and dreaded still worse treatment, went over to America in great numbers, and settled the colony of Maryland.

Before the civil wars, learning and the fine arts were favoured at court, and a good taste began to prevail in the nation. The king loved pictures, sometimes handled the pencil himself, and was a good judge of the art. The pieces of foreign masters were brought up at a vast price; and the value of pictures doubled in Europe by the emulation between Charles I. and Philip IV. of Spain, who were touched with the same elegant passion. Vandyke was caressed and enriched at court. Inigo Jones was master of the king's buildings; though afterwards persecuted by the parliament, on account of the part which he had in rebuilding St. Paul's, and for obeying some orders of council, by which he was directed to pull down houses, in order to make room for that edifice. Laws, who had not been surpassed by any musician before him, was much beloved by the king, who called him the father of music. Charles was a good judge of composition, and was thought by some more anxious with regard to purity of style than became a monarch (h). Notwithstanding his narrow revenue, and his freedom from vanity, he lived in great magnificence; he possessed four and twenty palaces, all of them completely furnished; insomuch that, when he removed from one to another, he was not obliged to transport any thing along with him.

Cromwell himself was not insensible to literary merit. Usher, notwithstanding his being a bishop, received a pension from him. Marvel and Milton were in his service. Waller, who was his relation, was caressed by him. The poet always said, that the protector himself was not so illiterate as was commonly imagined. He gave a hundred pounds a-year to the divinity professor at Oxford; which an historian of eminence mentions as an instance of his love of literature (i). He intended to have erected a college at Durham for the benefit of the northern counties.

Civil wars, when founded on principles of liberty, are not unfavourable to the arts of eloquence and composition; or rather, by presenting nobler and more interesting objects, they compensate that tranquillity of which they bereave the muses. The speeches of the parliamentary orators during this period are of a strain much superior to what any former age had produced in England; and the force and compass of our tongue were then first put to trial. It must, however, be confessed, that the zeal which so much infected the parliamentary party, was no less destructive of taste and science, than of the former established law and order. It was an article positively insisted on in the preliminaries to the treaty of Uxbridge, that all play-houses should for ever be abolished; and perhaps it would be better for the nation if they were. Sir John Davenant, says Whitlocke (k), speaking of the year 1658, published an opera, notwithstanding the nicety of the times. All the king's furniture was put to sale: his pictures, disposed of at very low prices, enriched all the collections in Europe: the cartoons, when complete, were only appraised at three hundred pounds, though the whole collection of the king's curiosities was sold at above fifty thousand pounds (l). Even the royal palaces were pulled in pieces, and the materials of them sold. The very library and medals at St. James's were intended by the generals to be brought to auction, in order to pay the arrears of some regiments of cavalry quartered near London: but Selden, apprehensive of the loss, engaged his friend Whitlocke, then lord-keeper for the commonwealth, to apply for the office of librarian. This expedient saved that valuable collection.

Charles the Second, in the beginning of his reign, had in pay near five thousand men, of guards and garrisons. At the end of his reign he augmented this number to near eight thousand. James the Second, on Monmouth's rebellion, had on foot about fifteen thousand men; and when the prince of Orange, with fourteen thousand men, invaded him, there were no fewer than thirty thousand regular troops in England.

The English navy, during the greater part of Charles the Second's reign, made a considerable figure, for number of ships, valour of the men, and conduct of the commanders. Even in 1678, the fleet consisted of eighty-three ships (m); besides thirty, which were at that time on the stocks. On the king's restoration he found only sixty-three vessels of all sizes (n). During the latter part of Charles's reign, the navy fell somewhat to decay, by reason of the narrowness of the king's revenue: but James, soon after his accession, restored it to its former power and glory; and before he left the throne, carried it much farther. The administration of the admiralty under Pepys, is still regarded as a model for order and œconomy. The fleet at the revolution consisted of one hundred and seventy-three vessels of all sizes; and required forty-two thousand seamen to man it (o). That king, when duke of York, had been the first inventor of sea-signals.

The commerce and riches of England did never, during any period, increase so fast as from the restoration to the revolution. The two Dutch wars, by disturbing the trade of that republic, promoted the navigation of this island; and after Charles had made a separate peace with the States, his subjects enjoyed, unmolested, the trade of Europe. The only disturbance which they met with, was from a few French privateers who infested the Channel; and Charles interposed not in behalf of his subjects with sufficient spirit and vigour. The recovery or conquest of New York and the Jerseys was a considerable accession to the strength and security of the English colonies; and, together with the settlement of Pennsylvania and Carolina, which was effected during that reign, extended the English empire in America. The persecutions of the dissenters contributed to augment and people these colonies. Dr. Davenant affirms (p), that the shipping of England more than doubled during these twenty-eight years. Several new manufactures were established; in iron, brass, silk, hats, glass, paper, &c. One Brewer, leaving the Low Countries, when they were threatened with a French conquest, brought the art of dying woollen cloth into England, and by that improvement saved the nation great sums of money. The increase of coinage during these two reigns was ten millions two hundred sixty-one thousand pounds. A board of trade was erected in 1670; and the earl of Sandwich was made president. Charles revived and supported the charter of the East-India company; a measure whose utility is by some thought doubtful: he granted the charter to the Hudson's Bay company; a measure probably hurtful.

We learn from sir Josiah Child (q), that in 1688 there were on the 'Change more men worth ten thousand pounds than there were in 1650 worth a thousand; that five hundred pounds with a daughter was, in the latter period, deemed a larger portion than two thousand in the former; that gentlewomen, in those earlier times, thought themselves well clothed in a serge gown, which a chambermaid would, in 1688, be ashamed to be seen in; and that, besides the great increase of rich clothes, plate, jewels, and household furniture, coaches were in that time augmented a hundred fold.

The duke of Buckingham introduced from Venice the manufacture of glass and crystal into England. Prince Rupert was also an encourager of useful arts and manufactures: he himself was the inventor of etching.

The first law for erecting turnpikes was passed in 1662: the places of the turnpikes were Wadesmill, Caxton, and Stilton: but the general and great improvement of highways took not place till the reign of George II.

In 1663, was passed the first law for allowing the exportation of foreign coin and bullion.

In 1667 was concluded the first American treaty between England and Spain: this treaty was made more general and complete in 1670. The two states then renounced all right of trading with each other's colonies; and the title of England was acknowledged to all the territories in America, of which she was then possessed.

Lord Clarendon tells us, that, in 1665, when money, in consequence of a treaty, was to be remitted to the bishop of Munster, it was found, that the whole trade of England could not supply above one thousand pounds a-month to Frankfort and Cologne, nor above twenty thousand pounds a-month to Hamburgh: these sums appear surprisingly small (r).

At the same time that the boroughs of England were deprived of their privileges, a like attempt was made on the colonies. King James recalled the charters, by which their liberties were secured; and he sent over governors invested with absolute power. The arbitrary principles of that monarch appear in every part of his administration.

The people, during the reigns of Charles II. and James II. were, in a great measure, cured of that wild fanaticism, by which they had formerly been so much agitated; but they certainly acquired new vices. By the example of Charles II. and the cavaliers, licentiousness and debauchery became prevalent in the nation. The pleasures of the table were much pursued. Love was treated more as an appetite than a passion. The one sex began to abate of the national character of chastity, without being able to inspire the other with sentiment or delicacy.

The abuses in the reign of Charles the First and the Republic, arising from overstrained piety, had much propagated the spirit of irreligion; and many of the ingenious men of this period lie under the imputation of deism. Besides wits and scholars by profession, Shaftesbury, Halifax, Buckingham, Mulgrave, Sunderland, Essex, Rochester, Sidney, Temple, are supposed to have adopted these principles.

The same factions, which formerly distracted the nation, were revived, and exerted themselves against each other. King Charles the Second, being in his whole deportment a model of easy and gentleman-like behaviour, improved the politeness of the nation; as much as faction, which of all things is most destructive to that virtue, could possibly permit. His courtiers were long distinguishable in England by their obliging and agreeable manners.

Till the Revolution, the liberty of the press was very imperfectly enjoyed in England, and during a very short period. The star-chamber, while that court subsisted, put effectual restraints upon printing. On the suppression of that tribunal in 1641, the long parliament, after their rupture with the king, assumed the same power with regard to the licensing of books; and this authority was continued during all the period of the republic and protectorship (s). Two years after the restoration, an act was passed, reviving the republican ordinances. This act expired in 1679; but was revived in the first of James II. The liberty of the press did not even commence with the Revolution. It was not till 1694, that the restraints were taken off; to the great displeasure of the king and his ministers, who, seeing no where, in any government, during present or past ages, any example of such unlimited freedom, doubted much of its salutary effects, and probably thought, that no books or writings would ever so much improve the general understanding of men, as to render it safe to entrust them with an indulgence so easily abused.

In 1677, the old law for burning heretics was repealed; a prudent measure, while the nation was in continual dread of the return of popery.

It is remarkable, that the greatest genius by far that shone out in England during this period, was deeply engaged with the Independents, and even made use of his pen in theological controversy, in factious disputes, and in justifying the measures of his party. This was John Milton, whose poems as well as his prose writings, are admirable, and esteemed some of the first compositions in the English language. His Paradise Lost, his Comus, and some others, shine out with superior lustre, and place at a distance every other performance of a similar nature. The natural inequality in Milton's genius was much increased by the inequalities in his subject; of which some parts are of themselves the most lofty that can enter into human conception; others would have required the most laboured elegance of composition to support them. It is certain, that, when in a happy mood, and employed on a noble subject, he is the most wonderfully sublime of any poet in any language; Homer and Lucretius and Tasso not excepted. More concise than Homer, more simple than Tasso, more nervous than Lucretius; had he lived in a later age, and learned to polish some rudeness in his verses; had he enjoyed better fortune, and possessed leisure to watch the returns of genius in himself, he had attained the pinnacle of perfection, and borne away the palm of epic poetry.

It is well known, that Milton never enjoyed in his lifetime the reputation which he deserved. His Paradise Lost was long neglected: prejudices against an apologist for the regicides kept the ignorant world from perceiving the prodigious merit of that performance. John lord Somers, by encouraging a good edition of it in folio, about twenty years after the author's death, first brought it into request; and Jacob Tonson, in his dedication of a smaller edition, to the same nobleman, says, "It was your lordship's opinion and encouragement that occasioned the first appearing of this poem in the folio edition, which from thence has been so well received, that notwithstanding the price of it was four times greater than before, the sale encreased double the number every year. The work is now generally known and esteemed."

It is not strange that Milton received no encouragement after the restoration: it is more to be admired that he escaped with his life. Many of the cavaliers blamed extremely that lenity towards him, which was so honourable in the king, and so advantageous to posterity. It is said, that he had saved Davenant's life during the protectorship; and Davenant in return afforded him like protection after the restoration. It was during a state of poverty, blindness, disgrace, danger, and old age, that Milton composed his wonderful poem (t), which not only surpassed all the performances of his contemporaries, but all the compositions which had flowed from his pen, during the vigour of his age and the height of his prosperity. This circumstance is not the least remarkable of all those which attend that great genius. He died in 1674, aged sixty-six.

Edmund Waller is generally esteemed as the first refiner of English poetry, at least of English rhyme; but his performances still abound with many faults, and, what is more material, they contain but feeble and superficial beauties. Gaiety, wit, and ingenuity, are their ruling character: they aspire not to the sublime; still less to the pathetic. They treat of love, without making us feel any tenderness; and abound in panegyric, without exciting admiration. The panegyric, however, on Cromwell, is a masterly composition, and contains more force than Waller's other poems. Waller was born to an ample fortune, was early introduced to court, and lived in the best company. He possessed talents for eloquence as well as poetry; and till his death, which happened in a good old age, he was the delight of the house of commons. He was one of Cromwell's partizans, and was a person of honour and integrity. He died in 1687, aged eighty-two.

Abraham Cowley is an author whose verses were extremely corrupted by the bad taste of his age; many of them being composed in the Pindaric measure, but not with the fire of Pindar. Had he lived even in the purest times of Greece or Rome, he would perhaps have shone with peculiar elegance. Great ingenuity and vigour of thought, break out in his allegories and allusions. His Anacreontics surprize us by their ease and gaiety: his prose writings please, by the honesty and goodness, which they express, and even by their spleen and melancholy. Cowley was an excellent Greek and Latin scholar: while at Westminster School, where he was educated under the celebrated Dr. Busby, he was employed by that great critic in assisting him to compose the Greek Grammar still continued to be used at that seminary: a strong proof of the high opinion which his master had of his abilities. His Latin play, called "Naufragium," was frequently acted by the scholars of that foundation. He died in 1667, aged forty-nine.

Sir John Denham, in his Cooper's Hill, has a loftiness and vigour, which had not before him been attained by any English poet who wrote in rhyme. The mechanical difficulties of that measure retarded its improvement. Shakespear, whose tragic scenes are sometimes so wonderfully forcible and expressive, is a very indifferent poet when he attempts to rhyme. Precision and neatness are chiefly wanting in Denham. He died in 1688, aged seventy-three.

Harrington's Oceana was well adapted to that age, when the plans of imaginary republics were the daily subjects of debate and conversation; and even in our time, it is justly admired as a work of genius and invention. The idea, however, of a perfect and immortal commonwealth will always be found as chimerical as that of a perfect and immortal man. He died in 1677, aged sixty-six.

Algernon Sidney was likewise a considerable writer, who, in his admirable discourses, not only recommended the republican form of polity, but enforced those noble principles of liberty which were so odious to a corrupt court, that the life of this able and intrepid patriot was sacrificed at the shrine of arbitrary power.

Harvey is entitled to the glory of having made, by reasoning alone, without any mixture of accident, a capital discovery in one of the most important branches of science. He had also the happiness of establishing at once this theory on the most solid and convincing proofs; and posterity has added little to the arguments suggested by his industry and ingenuity. His treatise of the circulation of the blood is farther embellished by that warmth and spirit which so naturally accompany the genius of invention. This great man was much favoured by Charles I. who gave him the liberty of using all the deer in the royal forests for perfecting his discoveries on the generation of animals. It was remarked, that no physician in Europe, who had reached forty years of age, ever, to the end of his life, adopted Harvey's doctrine of the circulation of the blood, and that his practice in London diminished extremely, from the reproach drawn upon him by that great and signal discovery. So slow is the progress of truth in every science, even when not opposed by factious or superstitious prejudices! He died in 1657, aged seventy-nine.

This age affords great materials for history; but did not produce any accomplished historian. Clarendon, however, will always be esteemed an entertaining writer, even independent of our curiosity to know the facts which he relates. His style discovers imagination and sentiment, and pleases us at the same time that we disapprove of it. He seems perpetually anxious to apologize for the king; but his apologies are sometimes well grounded. He is therefore often partial in his relation of facts, and in his account of characters. He died in 1674, aged sixty-six.

Notwithstanding the bigotry and superstition by which almost every party in the nation was guided, during the reign of the Stuarts, there were some few philosophers, who, in the retirement of Oxford, established conferences for the mutual communication of their discoveries in physics and geometry. Wilkins, a clergyman, who had married Oliver Cromwell's sister, promoted these philosophical conversations. Shortly after the Restoration these persons procured a patent, and having enlarged their number, were denominated The Royal Society. But though Charles the Second was a lover of the sciences, particularly chemistry and mechanics, he animated them by his example alone, not by his bounty. His craving courtiers and mistresses, by whom he was perpetually surrounded, indeed engrossed all his liberality, and left him neither money nor attention for literary merit.

During this period, there arose in England some men of superior genius, who drew on themselves and on their native country the regard and attention of Europe. Besides Wilkins, Wren, Wallis, eminent mathematicians, Hooke, an accurate observer by microscopes, and Sydenham, the restorer of true physic; there flourished during this period a Boyle and a Newton; men who trod with cautious, and therefore the more secure steps, the only road which leads to true philosophy.

Boyle improved the pneumatic engine invented by Otto Guericke, and was thereby enabled to make several new and curious experiments on the air, as well as on other bodies: his chemistry is much admired by those who are acquainted with that art: his hydrostatics contain a greater mixture of reasoning and invention with experiment than any other of his works; but his reasoning is still remote from that boldness and temerity which had led astray so many philosophers. Boyle was a great partizan of the mechanical philosophy; a theory which, by discovering some of the secrets of nature, and allowing us to imagine the rest, is so agreeable to the natural vanity and curiosity of men. He died in 1691, aged sixty-five.

In sir Isaac Newton this island may boast of having produced the greatest and rarest genius that ever rose for the ornament and instruction of the human race. Cautious in admitting no principles but such as were founded on experiment; but resolute to adopt every such principle, however new or unusual: from modesty, ignorant of his superiority above the rest of mankind; and thence, less careful to accommodate his reasonings to common apprehensions: more anxious to merit than acquire fame: he was, from these causes, long unknown to the world; but his reputation at last broke out with a lustre, which scarcely any writer, during his own life-time, had ever before attained. While Newton seemed to draw off the veil from some of the mysteries of nature, he shewed at the same time the imperfections of the mechanical philosophy; and thereby restored her ultimate secrets to that obscurity in which they ever did and ever will remain. His revival of the Copernican System has done more to furnish the minds of the intelligent with regard to the heavenly bodies, than had been done by all the philosophers before him, and perhaps is likely to be done by any that may come after him. He died in 1727, aged eighty-five.

This age was far from being so favourable to polite literature as to the sciences. Charles himself, though fond of wit, though possessed of a considerable share of it, though his taste in conversation seems to have been sound and just; served rather to corrupt than improve the poetry and eloquence of his time. When the theatres were opened at the Restoration, and freedom was again given to pleasantry and ingenuity; men, after so long an abstinence, fed on these delicacies with less taste than avidity, and the coarsest and most irregular species of wit was received by the court as well as by the people. The productions represented at that time on the stage, were such monsters of extravagance and folly; so utterly destitute of all reason or common sense; that they would be the disgrace of English literature, had not the nation made atonement for its former admiration of them, by the total oblivion to which they are now condemned. The duke of Buckingham's Rehearsal, which exposed these wild productions, seems to be a piece of ridicule carried to excess; yet in reality the copy scarcely equals some of the absurdities which we meet with in the originals (u). This severe satire, together with the good sense of the nation, corrected, after some time, the extravagancies of the fashionable wit; but the productions of literature still wanted much of that correctness and delicacy which we so much admire in the ancients.

The reign of Charles II. which some represent as our Augustan age, retarded the progress of polite literature in this island; and it was then found, that the unbounded licentiousness, indulged or rather applauded at court, was more destructive to the refined arts, than even the ignorance and enthusiasm of the preceding period.

Most of the celebrated writers of this age remain monuments of genius, perverted by indecency and bad taste; and none more than Dryden, both by reason of the greatness of his talents, and the gross abuse which he made of them. His plays, excepting a few scenes, are shamefully disfigured by vice or folly, or both. His translations appear too much the offspring of haste and indigence: even his fables are ill-chosen tales, conveyed in an incorrect, though spirited versification. Yet, amidst this great number of loose productions, the refuse of our language, there are found some small pieces, his Ode to St. Cecilia, the greater part of Absalom and Achitophel, and a few more, which discover so great genius, such richness of expression, such pomp and variety of numbers, that they leave us equally full of regret and indignation, on account of the inferiority or rather great absurdity of his other writings. His indigence likewise prompted him to accommodate both his political and religious principles to the times. He complimented the protectoral government, and hailed the return of Charles the Second; and, on the accession of the Catholic James, he renounced the Protestant faith, and adopted the sentiments of the church of Rome. He died in 1701, aged sixty-nine.

The very name of Rochester is offensive to modest ears; yet does his poetry discover such energy of style and such poignancy of satire, as give ground to imagine what so fine a genius, had he lived in a more happy age, and followed better models, was capable of producing. The ancient satirists often used great liberties in their expressions; but their freedom by no means resembled the licentiousness of Rochester.

Wycherley was ambitious of the reputation of wit and libertinism; and he attained it: he was probably capable of reaching the fame of true comedy, and instructive ridicule. Otway had a genius finely turned to the pathetic; but he neither observes strictly the rules of the drama, nor the rules, still more essential, of propriety and decorum. By one single piece, the duke of Buckingham did both great service to his age, and honour to himself. The earls of Mulgrave, Dorset, and Roscommon, wrote in a good taste; but their productions are either feeble or careless. The marquis of Halifax discovers a refined genius; and nothing but leisure and an inferior station seems wanting to have procured him eminence in literature.

Of all the considerable writers of this age, sir William Temple is almost the only one that kept himself altogether unpolluted by that inundation of vice and licentiousness which overwhelmed the nation. The style of this author, though negligent, and even infected with foreign idioms, from his intercourse abroad, is agreeable and interesting. That mixture of vanity which appears in his works, is rather a recommendation to them. By means of it, we enter into acquaintance with the character of the author, full of honour and humanity; and fancy that we are engaged, not in the perusal of a book, but in conversation with a companion. He died in 1698, aged seventy.

Though Hudibras was published, and probably composed, during the reign of Charles II. Butler may justly, as well as Milton, be thought to belong to the foregoing period. No composition that we are acquainted with abounds so much as Hudibras in strokes of just and inimitable wit; yet are there many performances which give us great or greater entertainment on the whole perusal. The allusions in Butler are often dark and far-fetched; and though scarcely any author was ever able to express his thoughts in so few words, he often employs too many thoughts on one subject, and thereby becomes prolix after an unusual manner. It is surprising how much erudition Butler has introduced with so good a grace into a work of pleasantry and humour: Hudibras is perhaps one of the most learned compositions that is to be found in any language. The advantage which the royal cause received from this poem, in exposing the fanaticism and false pretences of the former parliamentary party, was prodigious. The king himself had so good a taste as to be highly pleased with the merit of the work, and had even got a great part of it by heart: yet was he either so careless in his temper, or so little endowed with the virtue of liberality, or, more properly speaking, of gratitude, that he allowed the author, a man of virtue and probity, to live in obscurity, and die in want (v). Dryden is an instance of a negligence of the same kind. His Absalom sensibly contributed to the victory which the tories obtained over the whigs, after the exclusion of parliaments: yet could not this merit, aided by his great genius, procure him an establishment which might exempt him from the necessity of writing for bread. Otway, though a professed royalist, could not even procure bread by his writings; and he had the singular fate of dying literally of hunger, for he was starved to death. These incidents throw a great stain on the memory of Charles, who had discernment, loved genius, was liberal of money, but attained not the praise of true generosity.

BOOK X.

WILLIAM THE THIRD AND MARY THE SECOND.

CHAPTER I.

IT is natural to suppose, that the constitution of England, upon the accession of William to the throne, assumed a different aspect from that which it had before. As the right of this monarch to the crown was wholly from the choice of the people, they were undoubtedly led to load the benefit with whatever stipulations they thought requisite for their own security. The power of the king was limited on every side; and the jealousy which his new subjects entertained of foreigners still farther obstructed the exercise of his authority. The power of the crown was allowed to flow from no other fountain than that of a contract with the people. The representatives made a regular claim of rights in behalf of their constituents, which, previous to his coronation, William was obliged to confirm (w).

William

(u) The duke of Buckingham died on the 16th of April, 1688.

(v) Butler died in 1680, aged sixty-eight.

(w) This declaration of rights maintained, that the suspending and dispensing powers, as exercised by James the Second, were unconstitutional; that all courts of ecclesiastical commission, the levying of money, or maintaining a standing army in times of peace, without consent of parliament; that grants of fines and forfeitures before conviction, and juries of persons not qualified, or not fairly chosen; and, in trials for treason, who were not freeholders, were all unlawful. It asserted the freedom of election to parliament, the freedom of speech in parliament, and the right of the subject to bear arms, and to petition his sovereign. It provided that excessive bails should not be required, nor excessive fines be imposed

William was no sooner elected to the throne, than he began to experience the difficulty of governing a people who were more ready to examine the commands of their superiors than to obey them. From the peaceful and tractable disposition of his own countrymen, he expected to find a similar disposition among the English; he hoped to find them ready and willing to second his ambition in humbling France, but he was mistaken, for he found them more apt to fear for the invasion of their domestic liberties at home.

The reign of William commenced with an attempt similar to that which had been the principal cause of all the disturbances in the preceding reign, and which had excluded the monarch from the throne. He was himself a Calvinist, and consequently averse to persecution: he therefore attempted to repeal those laws which enjoined uniformity of worship; and though he could not entirely succeed in his design, a toleration was granted to such dissenters as should take the oaths of allegiance, and hold no private conventicles. The papists themselves, who had every thing to fear, experienced the lenity of his government; and though the laws against them were unrepealed, yet they were seldom put into rigorous execution. Thus what was criminal in James became virtuous in his successor, as James wanted to introduce persecution, by pretending to disown it; while William had no other design, but to make religious freedom the test of civil security.

Although William was acknowledged king in England, Scotland and Ireland were still undetermined. The revolution in England had been effected by a coalition of Whigs and Tories; but in Scotland it was effected by the Whigs almost alone. They soon came to a resolution that James had, to use their own expression, forefaulted his right to the crown, a term which, in the law-language of that country, excluded not only him, but all his posterity. They therefore, in the year 1689, recognized the authority of William, and took that opportunity to abolish episcopacy, which had long been disagreeable to that nation.

The only part that now remained to the deposed king of all his former possessions was Ireland; and he had some hopes of maintaining his ground there, by the assistance which he was promised from France. Louis XIV. had long been at variance with William, and took every opportunity to form confederacies against him, and to obstruct his government. On the present occasion, being either touched with compassion at the sufferiongs of James, or willing to weaken a rival kingdom, by promoting its internal dissensions, he granted the deposed monarch a fleet and some troops, to assert his pretensions in Ireland, the only part of his dominions that had not openly declared against him.

On the other hand, William was not backward in warding off the threatened blow. He was pleased with an opportunity of gratifying his natural hatred against France; and he hoped to purchase domestic quiet to himself, by turning the spirit of the nation upon the continual object of aversion and jealousy. The parliament, though divided in all things else, was unanimous in conspiring with him in this: war was declared against France, and measures were pursued for driving James from Ireland, where he had landed, assisted rather by money than by forces, granted him by the French king.

On the 7th of May, 1689, that unhappy monarch embarked at Brest, and on the 22nd arrived at Kinsale; soon after which he made his public entry into Dublin, amidst the acclamations of the inhabitants. He found appearances of things in that country equal to his most sanguine expectations. Tyrconnel, the lord-lieutenant, was devoted to his interests; his whole army was steady, and a new one raised, amounting together to nearly forty thousand men. The Protestants over great part of Ireland were disarmed; the province of Ulster alone denied his authority; while the papists, confident of success, received him with shouts of joy and superstitious processions, which highly gratified the infatuated zealot.

In this state of the public mind, as the Catholics were eight times more numerous than the Protestants, the latter experienced the most cruel and oppressive indignities. Most of those who were attached to the revolution were under a necessity of retiring into Scotland and England, or hid themselves, or accepted written protections from their enemies. The bravest of them, however, to the number of ten thousand men, gathered round Londonderry, resolved to make their last stand at that place for their religion and liberty. A few also rallied themselves at Inniskilling; and after the first panic was over, became more numerous by the junction of others.

In the present posture of affairs James continued for some time irresolute what course to pursue; but so soon as the spring would permit, he marched to lay siege to Londonderry, a town of small importance in itself, but rendered famous by the stand which it made on this occasion. Colonel Lundie, who had been appointed governor of the town by William, was secretly attached to the interest of James; and at a council of war prevailed upon the officers and townsmen to send messengers to the besiegers with an offer of surrender on the following day. But the inhabitants, being apprized of his intention, and crying out that they were betrayed, rose in a furious manner against the governor and council, shot one of the officers whom they suspected, and resolutely determined to maintain the town, though destitute of leaders.

The town was weak in its fortifications, having only a wall eight or nine feet thick, and weaker still in its artillery, there being not above twenty serviceable guns upon the works. The new-made garrison, however, made up every deficiency by courage: one Walker, a dissenting minister, and major Baker, put themselves at the head of these resolute men; and thus abandoned to their fate, they prepared for a vigorous resistance. The batteries of the besiegers soon began to play upon the town with great fury, and several attacks were made, but always repulsed with resolution. All the success that valour could promise was on their side; but after some time they found themselves exhausted by continual fatigue; they were afflicted also with a contagious distemper which greatly thinned their numbers; and as there were many useless mouths in the city, they began to be reduced to the greatest extremities by the want of provision. They had even the mortification to see some ships, which had arrived with supplies from England, prevented from sailing up the river by the batteries of the enemy, and a boom by which they had blocked up the Channel. General Kirke was not more successful, who attempted to come to their assistance, but was prevented from sailing up the river. All he could do was to promise them speedy relief, and to exhort them to bear their miseries a little longer, with assurances of a glorious termination of them all. They had now consumed the last remains of their provision, and were reduced to the sad necessity of supporting life by eating horses, dogs, and all kinds of vermin; and even this loathsome food began to fail them. They had still farther the misery of seeing above four thousand of their fellow Protestants, from different parts of the country, driven by Rosene, James's general, under the walls of the town, where they were kept three whole days without sustenance. Kirke, in the mean time, who had been sent to their relief, continued inactive, debating with himself between the prudence and necessity of his assistance. At length, receiving intelligence that the garrison sunk with fatigue and famine, had sent proposals of capitulation, he resolved upon an attempt to throw provisions into the place, by means of three victuallers, and a frigate to cover them. As soon as these vessels sailed up the river, the eyes of all were fixed upon them; the besiegers eager to destroy, and the garrison as resolute for their defence. The foremost of the victuallers at first shock broke the boom, but was stranded by the violence of her own shock. Upon this a shout burst from the besiegers, which reached the camp and the city. They advanced with fury against a prize, which they considered as inevitable; while the smoke of the cannon on both sides wrapped the whole scene in darkness. But to the astonishment of all, in a little time, the victualler was seen emerging from imminent danger, having got off by the rebound of her own guns, while she led up her little squadron to the walls of the town. The joy of the inhabitants at this unexpected relief, was only equalled by the rage and disappointment of the besiegers. The army of James was so dispirited by the success of this enterprize, that they abandoned the siege in the night; and retired with precipitation, after having lost above nine thousand men before the place. Kirke no sooner took possession of the town, than Walker was prevailed on to embark for England, with an address imposed, nor cruel nor unusual punishments be inflicted; and it concluded with an injunction that parliaments should be frequently assembled. Such is the substance of the Bill of Rights, which is calculated to secure the liberties of the people; but having been drawn up in a ferment, it bears all the marks of haste, insufficiency, and inattention.

of thanks to king William, for the seasonable relief they had received.

The Inniskilliners were no less remarkable than the people of Londonderry, for the valour and perseverance with which they espoused the interests of William: and indeed the bigotry and cruelty of the papists upon that occasion were sufficient to rouse the most quiet into vigorous opposition. The Protestants, by an act of the popish parliament, under king James, were divested of those lands which they had been possessed of since the Irish rebellion. Three thousand of that persuasion, who had sought safety by flight, were attainted, and found guilty of treason. Soldiers were permitted to live at free quarter; the people were plundered, the shops of tradesmen, and the kitchens of the citizens, were pillaged, to supply a quantity of brass, which was converted into coin, and passed, by order of James, for above forty times its real value. Not content with this, he imposed by his own authority, a tax of twenty thousand pounds a month on personal property, and levied it by a commission under the great seal: beside which, all vacancies in the public schools were supplied by popish teachers. The pension allowed from the Exchequer to the university of Dublin was cut off, and that institution converted into a popish seminary. Brigadier-general Sarsfield commanded all Protestants of a certain district to retire to the distance of ten miles from their habitations, on pain of death; many perished with hunger, but by far the greater number through being forced from their homes, during the most inclement weather.

But the sufferings of the Protestants were soon to have an end. William at length perceived that his neglect of Ireland had been an error which required more than usual diligence to redress. He was fearful of sending the late king's army to fight against him, lest it might be weakened by desertion, or lest it might altogether favour his cause: he therefore gave orders for twenty-three new regiments to be raised for that service. These, with two Dutch battalions, and four of French refugees, together with the Inniskilliners, were appointed for the reduction of Ireland; and, next to the king himself, marshal Schomberg was appointed to the command (x).
